CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

CONTAINING

THE PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

OF THE

FORTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

VOLUME XIII.

WASHINGTON:
GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.
1882.

VOLUME XIII, PART IV.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

from the President of the United States; which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication, dated the 14th instant, from the Secretary of the Interior, with draft of bill and accompanying papers, for the establishment of an Indian training-school on the site of the old Fort Ripley military reservation in the State of Minnesota. The subject is commended to the consideration of Congress.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 17, 1882.

SAN CARLOS RESERVATION, ARIZONA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary [of the Interior] of the 12th instant, with accompanying papers, in relation to coal lands upon the San Carlos reservation in the Territory of Arizona. The subject is presented for the consideration of Congress.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

PUBLIC BUILDING, SYRACUSE, NEW YORK.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill No. 4172, to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Syracuse, New York.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the post-office, United States courts, internal-revenue offices, and other Government offices, at the city of Syracuse, New York. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $200,000: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than forty feet, including streets and alleys; and no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of New York shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owners thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. There are about forty-five bills of this character now pending before the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I shall object to giving unanimous consent as to all of them; there ought to be some discrimination.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HISCOCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING, HANNIBAL, MISSOURI.

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 880) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Hannibal, in the State of Missouri, and that the bill be now put on its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] that the House adjourn.

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent to say a word. I have sat here during three years and have never objected to any bill of this kind; but if I cannot get this bill up when other members are allowed that privilege with reference to their bills, it is an end to unanimous consent during the Forty-seventh Congress. I want that distinctly understood.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion to adjourn.

Mr. DUNNELL. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to having this bill taken up now for consideration hereafter; but I must insist on the motion to adjourn after the bill has been taken up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know from the Speaker whether there was not a ruling insisted upon in the last Congress and readopted by the presiding officer of this House, which determined that bills appropriating money for public buildings should be taken up in their order upon the Calendar. If, Mr. Speaker, that is true, then the House having two weeks ago gone down the Calendar until it reached the bill for a public building at the capital of my State, and having there dropped the matter, I hope the House will not now, whether by suspension of the rules or by unanimous consent, do me the injustice of taking up out of their order bills for other public buildings. I do not want to take any advantage of any gentleman who has charge of any public-building bill in this Congress; I certainly do not want to make complaint in regard to my friend from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK,] who has had his bill passed; I certainly do not wish to antagonize the bill of my friend from Missouri, [Mr. HATCH;] but I do insist that the capital of a State in which the Federal Government has never owned a brick, but where the State has furnished to it as a pensioner without pay offices for clerks and rooms for courts for nearly a century, ought not to be treated after this fashion.

I have stood upon my rights as I had them declared by the Speaker of the last House and reiterated by the Speaker of this House. I ask no more than that; I cannot afford to take less than that. That bill was the fifth upon the calendar of public-building bills. Four were passed last Monday a week ago. There the public-building bill calendar was dropped; and now if it is to go further I insist that fair dealing and the unanimous-consent arrangement of the last Congress and of this Congress entitle me to have that bill called up.

Mr. CALKINS. Let me ask a question.

Mr. HATCH. I have been recognized and have unanimous consent.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not believe the House is opposed to the bill of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. HATCH. I insist I am not to be taken off the floor in this way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. CALKINS. I wish to say a word to the gentleman from Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri rises to ask unanimous consent. This does not affect the order of recognition or the order of consideration when the Calendar is reached, nor does it affect the question how recognition shall be made on suspension day. That question is not involved now. It is a question whether the House will give the gentleman from Missouri unanimous consent for the present consideration of his bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let it be taken up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 880) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Hannibal, in the State of Missouri.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of that bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it before the House?

Mr. HATCH. It is.

The SPEAKER. It is, if there is no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. We do not object to its being before the House, but I insist on the motion to adjourn after that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again put the question. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HATCH. No, there is not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HATCH. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Does this bill come up to-morrow as the unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. It comes up when we reach business of this class. It is up for present consideration, as the House has agreed by unanimous consent to take it up.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Let us put these bills through now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 26.

So the motion was agreed to; and then (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until eleven o'clock to-morrow morning.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ATKINS: The petition of A. Thompson, administrator of the estate of John A. Barnett, deceased, for compensation for property taken and used by the United States Army during the rebellion—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BAYNE: The resolutions of the Central Branch of the Land League of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, calling upon Congress and the Executive to take action to protect American citizens unjustly detained in British prisons, by demanding for them a speedy trial and insisting upon their immediate release—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BUTTERWORH: The petition of Frances Washington Finch, proposing to sell to the Government certain household effects of General George Washington now in her possession—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. GEORGE R. DAVIS: Papers relating to the claim of W. H. Reynolds—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McKENZIE: Papers relating to the claim of James C. Rudd—to the same committee.

By Mr. MOREY: Papers relating to the pension claim of J. S. Windsor—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MORSE: The petition of Barnes, Ward & Co. and others, merchants of Boston, praying for the passage of the bill providing for the permanent organization of the Signal Corps—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. PAGE: The resolutions adopted by the San Francisco Produce Exchange relative to the duty on barley—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, memorial of the Board of Marine Underwriters of San Francisco, asking for an appropriation of $100,000 per annum to increase the efficiency of the Hydrographic Office and for further surveys on the Pacific coast—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. RANDALL: Papers relating to the pension claim of John O'Neill—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. W. W. RICE: The petition of Washburn & Moen and others, of Worcester, Massachusetts, for the passage of the Lowell bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. W. E. ROBINSON: The resolutions adopted by the Irish National Land and Industrial League of Brooklyn, New York, relative to the imprisonment of American citizens in British jails, and demanding the recall or impeachment of James Russell Lowell—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. SHACKELFORD: The petition of 100 citizens of North Carolina, asking for an appropriation for the establishment of a light at the mouth of New River, in said State—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. SPAULDING: Paper relating to the pension claim of Martha Sewell, late Martha Frink—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. P. B. THOMPSON: The petition of James Wilson, administrator of the estate of Joshua Gilbert, for relief—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. H. G. TURNER: The petition of T. F. Jones and 45 others, citizens of Early County, Georgia, praying an appropriation by Congress for the cause of education in the States on the basis of illiteracy—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. B. W. HARRIS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported, under clause 2 of Rule XXII, papers relating to the Kennedy spiral punch; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 19, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 13th instant, a list of all Indian reservations upon which troops are stationed, and also information touching the destruction and consumption of timber by such troops, together with a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on the subject; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HAMPTON presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of Columbia, South Carolina, in favor of the construction of the proposed Chesapeake and Delaware free ship-canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOAR. I present a petition of the Woman Suffrage Association, praying "that neither Dakota nor any other Territory be admitted hereafter as a State except upon condition that the constitution of said State shall establish equal legal and political rights for all American citizens resident therein irrespective of sex." I ask the reference of the petition to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HARRISON. The bill on that subject has been reported from the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HOAR. The petition is general and applies to other Territories as well as Dakota. Perhaps the committee may reconsider the error of their ways as to Dakota.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. KELLOGG presented the petition of Rhoden Mitchell, of Washington, District of Columbia, praying to be compensated for services rendered by him as laborer in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the United States Senate; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL presented certain letters and papers concerning the proposed improvement of the Executive Mansion; which were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a petition signed by the governor of Ohio and I suppose all the members of the General Assembly, the great body of them at least, and other citizens of Ohio, praying for an appropriation by Congress of liberal sums of money to educate the illiterate people of the Southern States. I move its reference to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 490) for the relief of Mrs. Mary S. Porter, widow and sole heir-at-law of Samuel Stafford, deceased, late of New Orleans, Louisiana, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of S. R. Kramer, praying compensation for property taken by the United States Army, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 710) for the relief of Mrs. J. P. Williams, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William G. Ford, of Memphis, Tennessee, praying compensation for certain bales of cotton seized by the United States Government, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1746) for the relief of William G. Ford.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 624) for the relief of Frances E. Stewart, administratrix of Michael S. Stewart, deceased, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 385) for the relief of Frederick W. Ruggles, of Westport, Nova Scotia, reported it with an amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FAIR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 583) for the relief of William Beddo and others, submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and, on motion of Mr. FAIR, the bill and report were recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 386) for the relief of Mrs. Eliza E. Hebert, reported it with amendments; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 454) for the relief of James E. Montell, of Baltimore, Maryland, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

IOWA AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Finance instruct me to report favorably Senate bill No. 1677, and as it will take but a single moment, I ask that it may now be considered. It relates to the agricultural college in Iowa and the investment of the agricultural college fund.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 1677) to amend the act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It amends section 4 of the "act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, so as to permit the State of Iowa, which has provided a college in accordance with that act, to loan the endowment fund belonging to the college, upon real-estate security, under such rules and regulations for its safe investment as the General Assembly shall hereafter provide.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CATALOGUE OF GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred the bill (S. No. 329) to authorize the preparation and publication of a classified, analytical, and descriptive catalogue of all Government publications from July 4, 1776, to March 4, 1881, have directed me to report it with amendments. As this is a bill which relates to the convenience of the Senate and House of Representatives, I venture to ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Printing with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 16, to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$10,000;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be prepared and published, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, a classified, analytical, and descriptive catalogue of all publications made by the authority of the Government of the United States and the preceding government of the Colonies, and all departments, bureaus, and offices thereof, from July 4, 1776, to March 4, 1881; and upon the request of the said joint committee, the officers of the Senate and House of Representatives, and the heads of all the Executive Departments and of all the bureaus and offices thereof, shall furnish to said joint committee all such information and assistance in reference to said publications as will facilitate or assist in the completion of said work; and the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated for the purposes of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add at the end of the bill:

Which sum may be expended as additional pay or compensation to any officer or employé of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3830) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. J. C. BURROWS of Michigan, Mr. GEORGE M. ROBESON of New Jersey, and Mr. S. S. COX of New York, managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2744) to regulate the carriage of passengers by sea; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4172) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Syracuse, New York.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 185) for the relief of the captain, owners, officers, and crew of the late United States private-armed brig General Armstrong, their heirs, executors, administrators, agents, or assigns; and

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRIS asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1747) to amend section 829 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the fees of marshals; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HARRIS. I introduce the bill by request. I move that the bill, with the accompanying letter of the marshal of West Tennessee, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1748) for the relief of Harriet Ann Walker; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on file in the case, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BUTLER asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1749) for the relief of William McNamara; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SEWELL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1750) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Ann W. Mulvey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FRYE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1751) for the relief of Reuben B. Clark and Sayles J. Bowen; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FAIR (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1752) for the relief of John Leathers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HARRISON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1753) to restore and fix the Inspector-General's Department of the Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. MCMILLAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 5812) to establish post-routes; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

TEXAS BOUNDARY LINE.

Mr. MAXEY. I beg leave to call the attention of the Senate for a moment to a motion which I will make, which I think will be adopted without any difficulty. Senate bill No. 954 was referred to the Committee on Territories, it being a bill to complete the boundary between Texas and the territory of the United States, and it was reported favorably, and is on the Calendar. Under the constitution of Texas the Legislature in special session can only consider such measures as are submitted to it. The governor has called special attention to this bill, and the Legislature is now acting upon the question. It can only sit for thirty days. The purpose of the bill is to create a joint boundary commission to settle the boundary between the territory of Texas and that of the United States, and to run a line which the reports from the Interior Department show was not completed. The act of 1858, as is shown, created a joint boundary commission, which went on with its work, but the final report was never made. A portion of that line has never yet been run, and the purpose of the bill is to complete the line. In view of this special reason, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill now and put it upon its passage.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 954) to authorize the President of the United States, in conjunction with the State of Texas, to run and mark the boundary lines between a part of the territory of the United States and the State of Texas, and to complete the survey of said lines authorized to be surveyed, run, and marked under the act of Congress approved June 5, 1858.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Territories with an amendment, in section 3, line 1, to fill the blank by the insertion of the words "ten thousand" before "dollars," so as to make the section read:

That the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry out the provisions of this act: Provided, That the person or persons to be appointed and employed by the State of Texas are to be paid by the said State.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. I will state that the first section follows the verbiage of the treaty of 1820 as to the boundary, and it is simply to carry out that treaty. The one hundredth degree of west longitude is a necessary part of that boundary. Therefore, after the word "Texas," at the end of line 20 of section 1, I move to insert "the one hundredth degree of west longitude may be definitely established and;" so as to read:

Said joint commission will report said survey with all necessary notes, maps, and other papers, in order that in settling definitely this part of the boundary between the Territories of the United States and the State of Texas the one hundredth degree of west longitude may be definitely established and the question may be definitely settled whether the North Fork of Red River or the Prairie Dog Town Fork of said river is the principal or true Red River.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the preamble.

The preamble was read, as follows:

Whereas no final report of the lines and boundaries authorized to be run and marked between the Territories of the United States and the State of Texas under and by virtue of the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 5, 1858, has ever been made by the joint commission authorized by said act; and

Whereas it is important to have said lines run, marked, and definitely established by suitable persons appointed to act on behalf of the United States in connection with suitable persons to be appointed by the State of Texas to act on behalf of said State: Therefore,

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest that the preamble be omitted. It is bad legislation to encumber the statute-books with the reasons for passing a bill, and it is unnecessary here.

Mr. MAXEY. I will not object to striking it out, but the preamble does give the real reasons for the passage of the bill.

The preamble was rejected.

OMAHA INDIAN RESERVATION.

The bill (S. No. 1255) to provide for the sale of a part of the reservation of the Omaha tribe of Indians, in the State of Nebraska, and for other purposes, was announced as first in order upon the Calendar, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments, which will be stated in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to understand the bill before we pass upon the amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report can be read.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no report accompanying the bill, and that is the reason why I ask the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. SAUNDERS] to make an explanation of the necessity for this legislation.

Mr. SAUNDERS. This subject has been in various shapes before the Senate for some length of time, the effort being to get a bill that would meet the wants of the Indians and at the same time give satisfaction to the Government. After making several efforts, the Committee on Indian Affairs authorized the reporting of this bill with the amendments that will now be stated from the Secretary's desk. The bill authorizes the sale of not exceeding fifty thousand acres, to be taken from the west part of the Omaha reservation. This land has no settlers upon it, as we are able to show from the papers and from the agent himself, and is yielding nothing to the Indians, nothing to the Government, and nothing to the country. It happens to be one of those few cases where I believe everybody is satisfied to have a bill of this kind passed. The Indians want it passed so as to put the money derived from the sale on interest. The white people are there ready to buy the land and put it in cultivation. The Indian Department is satisfied that it is best for the Indians and for the country to have the land sold. Therefore, unless some amendment should be suggested by some one to the bill, there is no objection to the passage of a bill of this kind. When the amendments have been acted on, if the Senator from Missouri or any other Senator has any suggestions to make I shall be very glad to hear them. We want to get the bill as nearly perfect as we can.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the Committee on Indian Affairs will be reported.

The ACTING SECRETARY. In section 2, line 4, after the word "bidder," it is proposed to strike out the words "between the hours of twelve meridian and two post meridian on a given day in each month at," and to insert "through;" so as to read:

That after the survey and appraisement of said lands the Secretary of the Interior shall be, and he hereby is, authorized to offer the same for sale, for cash, to the highest bidder, through the United States public land office, at Neligh, Nebraska.

Mr. ALLISON. What is the object of that amendment?

Mr. SAUNDERS. It is to effect the sale through the agency instead of at the agency, by sending an agent from the land office to receive the bids on the ground.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "Nebraska," in section 2, line 6, to insert "under such instructions as the Secretary of the Interior may issue."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 6, in the following words:

That the Secretary of the Interior may, with the consent of the Indians expressed in open council, secure other reservation lands upon which to locate said Indians, cause their removal thereto, and expend such sum as may be necessary for their comfort and advancement in civilization, not exceeding $100,000, including cost of surveys and expense of removals, the same to be drawn from the fund arising from the sale of their reservation lands under this act.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The reason for striking out section 6 is that it was found entirely unnecessary. The Indians are not proposing to leave that part of the country and settle elsewhere. They have plenty of land left, and propose to remain there; so that it was found entirely unnecessary to provide for their being settled in any other part of the country.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section:

SEC. 6. That in addition to the purchase-money, each purchaser of said Omaha Indian lands shall pay $2, the same to be retained by the receiver and the register of the land office at Neligh, Nebraska, as their fees for services rendered.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I move, at the end of section 2, to add the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That not more than one hundred and sixty acres of said land shall be sold to any one person.

I think there will be no objection to the amendment on the part of any Senator.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. As one member of the committee that reported this bill, there is a provision to which I could not give my assent. It involves a very important question, and in order to test the sense of the Senate upon the point involved I move to strike out, in section 4, that portion of the proviso between lines 6 and 11 proposing to exempt these lands from taxation. The proviso reads as follows:

Provided, That patents issued to Indians shall expressly state that the lands conveyed shall, for the period of twenty-five years from the date thereof, be inalienable and exempt from incumbrance and taxation, and that the title in its descent shall conform to the laws of the State of Nebraska.

It will be observed that this bill practically breaks up that portion at least of the reservation which is to be sold, and provides that it shall be disposed of to private purchasers. It also enables Indians who may desire to possess their lands in severalty to acquire a qualified private title. The lands that they occupy are segregated from the remainder of the reservation, and the allottees receive patents to the separate tracts, so that the interest and control and jurisdiction of the United States is absolutely relinquished. So far as the laws are concerned, so far as the authority of the constitution and statutes of the State of Nebraska are concerned, these lands hereafter to be occupied by the individual Indians are like those held by any other private title from the Government of the United States. The question is whether this land, being so held, the Government having relinquished its jurisdiction, it is competent for Congress, without the consent of the authorities of the State of Nebraska, to say that this land shall be for twenty-five years subject to the protection of the laws of that State and entirely exempt from taxation. I say that obviously upon the plainest principles of law it is not; and in order to test the sense of the Senate upon that proposition I move to strike out the words "and exempt from incumbrance and taxation" after "inalienable," in lines 9 and 10 of section 4 of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas, I think, stated when he moved the amendment that it was an important one, and correctly. It strikes directly at the efforts which are being made to civilize the Indians by means of making them agriculturists upon land of their own. It is an attempt to push the Indian out into the world without any care of him or any superintendent exercise of authority over him and over the property upon which he is to be placed. Without the Senator from Kansas intending any such result, his amendment is in its effect a provision by which an Indian can be most quickly and effectually deprived of his land; it is, in the language of one of the clearest-headed of all the Indians I have met, a method by which he would be in a very few months stripped as naked as a bird. That was the manner in which he expressed it.

There may be exceptions, but a majority of the Indians who are not as yet upon land in severalty are not so far advanced that putting them upon a portion of land with a patent in fee without any restrictions would enable them to take care of what they have and thereby of themselves. If we are to set an Indian up in severalty we must throw some protection over him and around him and aid him for awhile in this effort; we must countenance the effort; we must hold up his hand; we must instruct him how to maintain himself and how to regard the property through which he is to become self-sustaining. I know the Senator from Kansas does not desire to facilitate the preying upon the Indians by white men; but nothing can be so easy as to obtain from an Indian incumbrances upon his land which are equivalent to a conveyance of it.

Mr. INGALLS. My object is purely to test the question upon the right of Congress to exempt property from taxation within the limits of a State.

Mr. DAWES. I am aware of that.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not wish to include voluntary incumbrances; I think they ought to be excluded; but I want to come down to the simple naked proposition whether, under the Constitution and laws of this Government, Congress can exempt property in a State from taxation when vested in private hands.

Mr. DAWES. Perhaps the amendment of the Senator from Kansas goes beyond that and includes incumbrances by which as I understand him he does not mean any other except those involuntary incumbrances that come from enforcing the payment of debts and the like upon the Indian's land, which is another method of allowing him, an improvident, weak-minded man, unable himself at present to take care of himself, yet to be supposed to be in a condition where he can be led up to it and be made the prey of a sharper or any one with whom he may deal, to incur an obligation for the very purpose of using that obligation to despoil him. Unacquainted with the methods of meeting taxation and paying taxes, and redeeming lands sold for taxes, he can be stripped in that method of his lands. If it be worth while to make the experiment of trying to make an Indian self-supporting by means of teaching him the value of property and the indirect beneficial results that come from earning a livelihood upon property which is his own, it is worth while to use these ordinary instrumentalities that will keep him a ward of the nation let out from under our care only so far as his progress will show him capable of doing it.

The Senator from Kansas wants to test the power of the United States to exclude from taxation and from involuntary incumbrance any land which is now theirs, when they part with it to an Indian.

Mr. INGALLS. Not so broad as that.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator does not intend it, I know.

Mr. INGALLS. I said expressly within the limits of a State.

Mr. DAWES. Of course I mean within the limits of a State.

Mr. INGALLS. I did not speak of the power of the Government over land in the Territories. That is not touched.

Mr. DAWES. I am aware of that. The Senator wishes, if I may state it again, to test the power of the United States in any State to exempt, when it parts with land to an Indian, from taxation or involuntary incumbrance for a certain number of years that land which, while the United States does own it, is confessedly so exempt. If the United States has the power in the States to keep its own land for the use of the Indian free from taxation or involuntary incumbrance, then it seems to me that it can, whenever it conveys to the Indian that land which is held for that purpose, convey it upon such terms as it pleases.

I am not aware, Mr. President, of any decision of the Supreme Court adverse to the position of this bill. I have not been able to find any.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Massachusetts is up.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senate will indulge me, that I may say a few words more, I move to indefinitely postpone the bill. I will not trespass long upon the indulgence of the Senate.

The committee have not been able to find any authority to question the position taken in the bill. It has been one uniformly adopted. The Omahas occupy this land under treaty stipulations with the United States, equivalent to holding it by a grant from the United States, not in so many words, but equivalent in effect, and in that very treaty is a stipulation that they shall have their land in severalty whenever they desire. This provision in this bill is recognizing that authority in the treaty, and if the Senate shall decide now that it is beyond their power in the States to do this they reverse their uniform and unquestioned action in this matter for a long series of years, and they will do what in my judgment will be fatal to the success of the experiment of setting up an Indian upon land in severalty in the hope that he will be taught in that way to become a self-supporting citizen of the United States. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will not prevail.

I withdraw the motion to postpone indefinitely.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, in respect to this power of taxation it will be observed that in all the land States it was expressly stipulated in their acts of admission into the Union that they would not tax the public lands of the United States, and I presume that if these stipulations had not been made it might have been a question whether these lands could have remained exempt. Mr. Sumner was of opinion in his day that they could not. He took the ground, and there was great reason for it, that the lands held by the United States as a public proprietor, not needed for pub lic uses, were just as much in equity bound to contribute to the burden of taxation of the State as any other lands within the State; and in a great argument which he made in the Senate in behalf of the struggling Western communities who were seeking aid to build railroads there, he was in favor of extending to them liberal donations of public land, and he put his argument on the ground that the States of the West had, in derogation of their right, given up their power of taxation in favor of the General Government, and the General Government as a great landed proprietor was just as much bound in equity to contribute to the support of the State government and to the building of roads and things of that kind as any other proprietor.

In every act of admission, certainly in the case of Florida and, I think, Alabama and all the land States of the South, it was stipulated that in consideration of a certain amount to be paid to the States, 5 per cent., I believe, of the net proceeds of the public lands, those States abandoned their right of taxation, and upon that ground it has stood in the nature of a compact between the States and the General Government ever since. The General Government has not attempted, in respect to its own public lands in the States, to claim the absolute right of exemption of those lands from taxation, but it put it on the ground of agreement with the States. The States in nearly every instance agreed that they would not tax the public land in consideration of the payment of 5 per cent. of the net proceeds to the States when sold. In some instances it was stipulated that they should remain exempt for some time after the sale to the purchaser; but that was all matter of agreement. There is nothing in those laws which goes to show that the Government ever set up its absolute right of exemption from taxation with respect to anything which was not necessary to the carrying out of the functions of the Government. Of course, in the great case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, the Supreme Court held that any agency which might be necessary to the Government in the discharge of its functions and powers no State could tax; but the principle of that decision never extended to public lands held by the United States as a landed proprietor, because those lands in no sense have ever been necessary to the performance of the powers or the functions of Government.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I have looked over this bill, and I do not see that this proviso is a practical one in connection with the remainder of the bill. There is no provision here that these Indians shall be permitted to take these lands in severalty unless they do as other people, pay for them. Now, I would ask the Senator from Nebraska if it is contemplated in this bill that Indians will become the purchasers of any portion of this tract of land? This bill contemplates the very reverse, because it provides that the fund received in payment of these lands shall go directly into the Treasury of the United States, the interest only to be paid to the Indians.

Mr. SAUNDERS. In answer to the question propounded by the Senator from Iowa I will say that I do not think an acre of this land will be sold to the Indians, and hence I allowed this report to come in in this way through my own hands because of that fact. The other day we argued this same question on the bill to provide for the sale of the remainder of the Otoe reservation, and there it was decided by the Senate that they would leave this clause in, and on that account I was ready to leave it in here, although I did not think as a matter of fact a single acre of the land would go into the hands of Indians.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will allow me. I think the Senator from Nebraska has overlooked the fact that underlying all this the treaty stipulations with these Indians is that any one of them can go on any part of all the present reservation, and is entitled to a patent, or what is equivalent to a patent; it is not called in the treaty a patent, but is equivalent in effect to a patent for 160 acres of land. Now, thirty-two at least of them have been here this winter representing that they are located on lands there and are entitled to a patent, and lest it may turn out that some of them are on this very land and are thus entitled, this provision is put in here.

Mr. ALLISON. Then a further provision ought to be inserted, excepting the rights of the Indians to the 50,000 acres, for the sale of which this bill provides, because here is an absolute direction that these 50,000 acres shall be set apart by metes and bounds, and appraised and sold. If a portion of this land is already occupied by individual Indians under the treaty stipulation we should except and reserve so much of said lands as are so occupied.

Mr. DAWES. I do not mean to assert that any of them are upon this land; but it was thought wise to provide that if any Indian had located there he should be taken care of and not thrown out.

Mr. ALLISON. In many of the laws providing for the admission of States into the Union a provision is reserved that the United States shall have absolute control of Indian reservations. I see no such reservation in the act admitting the State of Nebraska into the Union. I think there is no such reservation. Therefore, it seems to me it is a very grave question whether or not we can, under the laws of the United States, provide that these persons shall not be taxed under the laws of the State of Nebraska, in case they buy these lands as other people buy them. So it appears to me, under this bill, it is not a practical question, although it may be a very important one in other cases where we propose to allow Indians to settle in severalty upon reservations now within the boundaries of States already in the Union.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I do not understand——

Mr. SAUNDERS. The Senator will allow me to send up a letter to be read, to settle one question, probably, that has been raised here.

Mr. MORGAN. I will yield if it does not come out of my time.

Mr. SAUNDERS. When the question was first brought before the Senate inquiry was made of the Interior Department to ascertain whether any Indians were living upon this land. This letter is an answer made by the agent at the Omaha agency to the Interior Department. It will settle that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

UNITED STATES INDIAN SERVICE,
Winnebago Agency, Nebraska, December 30, 1881.

To the honorable Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: In answer to your letter of December 22, 1881, I respectfully state that there are no Indians living on the western portion of the Omaha reservation; that no land has been allotted to any of them so far as I can ascertain; and furthermore, that there are no improvements, such as houses, fencing, &c., upon the 50,000 acres of land alluded to in your letter. This land has a stream of water running through it, called the Logan, hence it is known as the Logan Valley.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

ARTHUR EDWARDS, Agent.

Mr. MORGAN. The part of section 4 which the Senator from Kansas desires to strike out, I understand relates exclusively to the Indians who may become purchasers of this land at public sale, and there is no provision in this bill to exempt from taxation so much of the land as may fall into the hands of other persons under the sale. It relates only to the Indians. Then the question is presented whether Congress, in making this disposal of land reserved to the Indians, have the right to annex to the disposition the condition which is provided for in this fourth section. Congress has uniformly exercised that privilege, both in the States and in the Territories. My eye happens to fall on a case that occurred in the State of Wisconsin, the Stockbridge-Munsee tribes of Indians, residing in the county of Shawana, in the State of Wisconsin. One of the sections of that law provides as follows:

The homestead secured by virtue of the preceding section shall not be subject to any tax, levy, or sale; nor shall it be sold, conveyed, mortgaged, or in any manner encumbered, except upon the decree of the district court of the United States, as provided in the following section.

We have uniformly exercised this amount of control over lands belonging to tribes of Indians in whose favor reservations have been made, so as to protect the Indian against a thriftless disposition of his land after he shall acquire the right in severalty.

Mr. INGALLS. That question is not involved here.

Mr. MORGAN. It seems to me so, and it is the only question involved, because the Indian by purchasing the land which is now a part of the reservation, as he has the right to do as I understand the bill, acquires a title thereto subject to a condition that does not operate on the title of the white man, which is that it shall not be sold or encumbered for a period of twenty-five years, nor shall it be taxed by the State. We merely annex that condition to the disposal of this land which is yet within the jurisdiction and power of the United States Government. Surely, in conceding a title that does not now exist in favor of the State of Nebraska or in favor of the Indian reservee to him in severalty, we certainly have the right to annex this condition to him for the protection of the Indian; and it seems to me that if we yield this policy in this bill and all the others that are to follow it, this being a test question in the Senate, we shall expose the Indians to such an extent in respect to the land they will receive in severalty from the Government of the United States under the policy we are now trying to adopt, as that we had better not venture upon any such course. It is better to let them keep the lands in common than undertake to divide them in severalty between the Indians at all. Beyond all question, if the policy now insisted on by the Senator from Kansas is adopted by the Senate and carried into effect in the future disposal of public lands for the benefit of the Indians within their reservations, the property of the Indians will be swept away from them before they have a sufficient knowledge of affairs to be able to protect themselves.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to commit the bill, for the purpose of enabling me to say a few words more on this question, because it involves really a question of great magnitude, and one that deserves a more elaborate discussion than it can receive under the rule under which we are now operating.

The act admitting the State of Nebraska provides that—

No taxes shall be imposed by said State on lands or property therein belonging to or which may hereafter be purchased by the United States.

Therefore, with the exception of all land belonging to the United States or purchased by the United States, the right of taxation does affirmatively inure to the people of Nebraska. I quote now from the section of the constitution of the State of Nebraska upon the subject of eminent domain, article 6, section 3:

The people of the State, in their right of sovereignty, are declared to possess the ultimate property in and to all lands within the jurisdiction of the State.

Now, sir, the right to tax is the paramount right that arises from eminent domain. Unless there is the right to tax society cannot exist. If the Government can release one section of land from taxation by an act of Congress within the limits of the State of Nebraska it can attach a similar provision to all land that ever has been occupied as an Indian reservation or military reservation whenever it is offered for sale. There is no more right in the Government to exempt land that is sold, from an Indian reservation, from taxation because it is sold to an Indian than there is because it is sold to a white man. The only question is, whether the Government releases its jurisdiction by giving a patent for a certain portion of this land to a private individual who is to live as a constituent member of that community, to receive the protection of its laws, to be allowed to travel over its roads and send his children to its schools, and at the same time to be entirely exempt from any impost upon the property on which he lives and to which this Government has no title whatever.

Mr. President, it appears to me that this is a very serious question, and when the Senator from Massachusetts states that this is an effort made to rob the Indians I should like him to state why. What robbery is there about imposing taxes like those which every other person pays upon the land that he owns and occupies? Is that robbery? What wrong is there about it? What rights has an Indian more than a white man to be exempt from bearing his burden of taxation upon the property that he owns and cultivates, and from which he obtains his support? If he is entitled to receive that land, if he has sense enough to take a patent for it and occupy it, he has sense enough to pay the taxes on it, and if he has not he ought not to be allowed to possess it.

I withdraw the motion to commit.

Mr. MORGAN. I renew the motion, Mr. President. I do not understand that the landed property of the United States Government in Nebraska is liable to taxation under the law as it exists. In order to bring it within the right and the power of the State to tax it, we have to part with the title, not with the eminent domain, but part with the fee-simple title into the hands of some person. We may part with that title conditionally, we may make a provisional arrangement by which the patent is to issue which contains within its four corners the express provisions that these lands are not to be subject to taxation, are not to be subject to be alienated or encumbered within the period of twenty-five years. The question, therefore, is whether we have the right to make such a provisional or conditional arrangement in favor of an Indian who we think needs and deserves such protection. May we dispose of land otherwise than by granting the fee-simple title absolute and eo instanti? That is the question. I think that the owner of land can certainly dispose of it upon condition; and that is all that Congress proposes to do in this bill.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me that this is a very interesting question indeed. I should like, without having formed an opinion myself, to put a question to the Senator from Alabama. Does he claim that the United States might, for the purpose of enhancing the amount it should receive for its public lands, sell its public lands to white men only in any State? Suppose the United States should say in the State of Minnesota, "all the public lands we will sell on condition that they shall be exempt from taxes for the next twenty-five years," would that be lawful?

Mr. MORGAN. I understand that Congress has uniformly attached as a condition to the sale of all public lands that they should be exempt from taxation for a period of five years.

Mr. HOAR. I do not speak now of where they have reserved that right in the act admitting a State; but suppose they have not?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not understand that that provision of our laws has grown out of an agreement between the States and the Federal Government, but it is a power exercised in behalf of new settlers so that they may have a better opportunity to clear up their ground, build their houses, and establish themselves in living on the public lands.

Mr. ALLISON. I will call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the act to enable the people of Nebraska to form a constitution and State government. I find in the third section of that act it is provided—

> That the people inhabiting said Territory do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within said Territory, and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the doctrine to which I desire the Senate to adhere, that the public lands belong entirely to the Government of the United States, and are subject solely to their disposal, without contract or agreement with any one.

Mr. INGALLS. Not after they have sold them and given a patent.

Mr. MORGAN. If they sell them and put it in the patent that the grantee is to have a perfect title subject to taxation and with the right to encumber and the right to sell after a period of twenty-five years, I see no difficulty, either constitutional or in policy, in adopting a course of that kind.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator hold the United States to have the right within the limits of the State of Kansas to give a patent to a white settler, providing that the land shall not be taxed for twenty-five years by the State of Kansas?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know whether we have a right to discriminate between classes of persons in legislation. That is a different question entirely. But I think that in providing for the sale of a reservation which we secured to the Indians by treaty, and in which treaty it is said that they may hold their lands in severalty and receive patents, we have the right to provide that the patent shall inure to the party in full fee-simple title after the lapse of twenty-five years, and that there shall be an intermediate stage of the title which shall not be a complete fee-simple.

Mr. INGALLS. Take the case of this bill, where the land is confessedly land in an Indian reservation, and is to be sold to whites or Indians; does the Senator hold that the Government has the right to sell a portion of that land to a white man and put that condition in the patent that it shall not be taxed for twenty-five years?

Mr. MORGAN. I think the Government might have the right to do it. I would not undertake to commit myself, however, deliberately upon that proposition; but unquestionably where there is a right established by treaty in favor of the Indians under which provision a member of the tribe has the right to a location in severalty upon the identical land, when we come to execute the treaty——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time is up.

Mr. MORGAN. Just allow me to——

Mr. INGALLS. I move to postpone the bill until to-morrow. That takes precedence, and the Senator from Alabama can take the floor on that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If a Senator allows gentlemen to interrupt him, it must be taken out of his time. If he would simply declare that he would not allow any interruption, he could say a good deal in five minutes.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to postpone the bill until to-morrow, and that takes precedence of the motion to commit.

Mr. MORGAN. A weakly man has not much chance among the giants of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Alabama can go on on that motion and speak.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

Mr. MCMILLAN. I regard this as a very interesting and important question, although I incline to think that the position of the Senator from Kansas is incorrect. If I recollect the provisions of the homestead law passed by Congress, there is contained in that law a provision exempting a homestead from sale under an execution for any of the debts of the person who makes the homestead existing at the time the homestead right accrues. That provision I think involves the same principle that the Senator from Kansas supposes is involved in this question.

Mr. INGALLS. It would involve the same if the homestead law provided that it should not be liable for debts contracted after the title passed. That is exactly the difference.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Why that distinction?

Mr. INGALLS. Because this provides that after the title has passed from the Government by a patent still the land shall be exempt from taxation for twenty-five years after that.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The condition is imposed, however, at the time the Government parts with the title, and the exemption from levy and sale on execution continues after the party obtains his title.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator from Minnesota think that a private grantor could put such a condition, and would it operate in his grant, that the land granted should not be taxable for twenty-five years?

Mr. MCMILLAN. No, sir.

Mr. HOAR. Then this cannot be supported on the ground suggested by the Senator from Alabama, that the United States, as owner, has a right to make such conditions on its grant as it sees fit. You must dismiss that consideration if that be true. Therefore it must come that the power, if at all, must arise from the legislative authority of the United States, from its authority as a Government. Now, where does the Senator from Minnesota find the authority of the national Government to impose a perpetual or limited exemption from taxation on any real estate which is owned by a person who in all other particulars is like every ordinary citizen of a State, merely because it once owned it itself?

Mr. MCMILLAN. These are public lands.

Mr. HOAR. I put the question not to express an opinion, but to call out the view of the Senator.

Mr. MCMILLAN. These are public lands owned by the Government of the United States. The Indians by reason of their relation to the Government occupy this particular land at this time as the wards of the Government, and not as citizens of the United States. The Government does not part with the title in fee-simple, but permits the Indians, retaining still their relation to the Government, not as citizens, but as the wards of the Government, to enter upon the occupancy of this land under a qualified title. The conditions of that title are determined by the Government when the title, whatever its character, is acquired. The title is still in the sovereignty of the Government of the United States; and it can impose conditions.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I think there is probably not a full understanding with some Senators as to exactly how this matter stands. The Indians have in their reserve some one hundred and fifty thousand acres of land. They are living on the eastern part of it, what is called the Missouri part, and enough of land is reserved besides what we are offering to sell here to give the usual amount to them and a little more than is provided in the other bills for dividing up lands in severalty. So far as I am concerned, I am in favor, when Indians want to take land and have it divided up and become citizens and take title to land to live upon, of giving them the advantages that are proposed by this bill. But this land is not occupied by the Indians. It is occupied by nobody. It is vacant land, so far as anything in the way of improvements is concerned, and they are proposing to sell it, and sell it for their own benefit. The money goes into their own pockets or into the Treasury of the United States for their benefit. It is different, therefore, from what it would be if it were now land divided up in severalty or if it were giving title to Indians being citizens of the United States and being self-sustaining. This, as I say, is done for their benefit, and every dollar of the proceeds goes into their own fund. So, then, if they want to buy any of it they ought to be treated really just like any other persons, so far as the land is concerned. So far as the land reserved, that which is not to be sold, is concerned, these other questions will come up, and I think I shall be in favor then of putting this clause in a subsequent bill as to that, as I am in favor of doing it in the Territories, and I shall do it in the States if it can be legally and properly done.

I wanted to make this statement to the Senate to show that this land has nothing to do with the land on which the Indians are living and residing at the present time.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand the Senator has no objection to my amendment.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. I think it ought to prevail.

Mr. SAUNDERS. But I went with the majority of the committee in presenting the bill, and therefore I wanted to make this statement to the Senate to show that I am not treating the committee unfairly by presenting the bill and reserving to myself the right to vote as I choose on such an amendment as this.

Mr. MORGAN. I understood the Senator from Kansas to say that this was a test question, and he intended to test the opinion of the Senate on it; otherwise I should not have interfered with the case, because it is a very small matter if one or two Indians should buy small tracts of land that that land should be exempt from taxation and incumbrance for a period of twenty-five years in the State of Nebraska; but treated as a test question it is a very important one. I understand that the power of Congress to do this thing is challenged, and I understand also that the power of Congress has been expressly affirmed by the Supreme Court to do this thing, and upon the ground, if I understand the decision, that the Indian while he occupies or holds a tribal relation is not a citizen of the United States. We do not treat him and regard him as a citizen of the United States, and we have not extended our tax laws, perhaps, over the property of those persons who are within our domain but are not citizens of the country. In the case of the Kansas Indians it was decided by the present President of the Senate while he was on the Supreme Bench. I read the syllabus:

The State of Kansas has no right to tax lands held in severalty by individual Indians of the Shawnee, Miami, and Wea tribes under patents issued to them by virtue of the treaties made with those tribes respectively in 1854, and in pursuance of the provisions of the eleventh section of the act of March 3, 1859. (11 Statutes at Large, p. 431.)

That in all cases where by the terms of any Indian treaty in Kansas Territory said Indians are entitled to separate selections of land, and to a patent therefor, under guards, restrictions, or conditions for their benefit, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to cause patents therefor to issue to such Indian or Indians, and their heirs, upon such conditions and limitation, and under such guards or restrictions as may be prescribed by said Secretary: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to apply to the New York Indians, or to affect their rights under the treaty made by them in 1838, at Buffalo Creek.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator will observe that the distinction between these two cases was that the contract with the Shawnee Indians was made while Kansas was a Territory, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. Afterward, when Kansas became a State, however, it undertook to exercise the power of taxation over these very lands, and the Supreme Court held that they were protected by that treaty, not because the terms of the treaty or the act of Congress gave them lands in severalty and expressly prohibited that the lands should be taxed, but merely because they held their relations to the tribe, and not being citizens of the United States or of Kansas, their lands were not liable to taxation. I read the second branch of the syllabus to show that that is true:

If the tribal organization of Indian bands is recognized by the political department of the national Government as existing; that is to say, if the national Government makes treaties with and has its Indian agent among them, paying annuities and dealing otherwise with "head men" in its behalf, the fact that the primitive habits and customs of the tribe when in a savage state have been largely broken into by their intercourse with the whites—in the midst of whom, by the advance of civilization, they have come to find themselves—does not authorize a State government to regard the tribal organization as gone, and the Indians as citizens of the State where they are, and subject to its laws.

And the court held in that case that the lands were not liable to taxation, although neither in the patent nor in the act of Congress was there any express exemption from taxation. I think that is a broad doctrine; it is a generous one, and one that we ought to uphold in respect to these Indians. They are under our guardianship and care, and we owe it to them as well as to ourselves that we should preserve them against such persons of our own race, or any other race, as may find occasion to maraud upon their possessions and to deprive them of their lands, patented to them, before they have proper intelligence to take care of them.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know that I am in order in speaking at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending motion is to postpone until to-morrow. The Senator from Massachusetts has not spoken on that motion.

Mr. DAWES. I regret very much that the right of the United States to exempt land held in severalty by Indians under patent should be determined upon this bill, because the whole purpose of this proviso in the bill was to save such rights as possibly might exist to any individual Indian upon this territory growing out of this provision of the treaty made in 1866:

The Omaha Indians being desirous of promoting settled habits of industry and enterprise among themselves by abolishing the tenure in common by which they now hold their lands, and by assigning limited quantities thereof in severalty to the members of the tribe, including their half or mixed blood relatives now residing with them, to be cultivated and improved for their own individual use and benefit, it is hereby agreed and stipulated that the remaining portion of their present reservation—shall be set apart for said purposes, and that out of the same there shall be assigned to each head of a family not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, and to each male person, eighteen years of age and upward, without family, not exceeding forty acres of land—to include in every case as far as practicable a reasonable proportion of timber. Six hundred and forty acres of said lands, embracing and surrounding the present agency improvements, shall also be set apart and appropriated to the occupancy and use of the agency for said Indians. The lands to be so assigned, including those for the use of the agency, shall be in as regular and compact a body as possible, and so as to admit of a distinct and well-defined exterior boundary. The whole of the lands, assigned or unassigned, in severalty, shall constitute and be known as the "Omaha reservation."

It then goes on to stipulate that the Indian may have a paper or certificate that shall give him and his descendants exclusive occupation of this land. It was supposed by the committee, upon the information derived from the Nebraska Senators, that there were no Indians upon this land, either in common or in severalty; but it was known to the committee that a portion of the Indians, thirty or forty of them, had gone upon the land somewhere and made a location which entitled them to these certificates which gave that exclusive occupation to them and their descendants.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The Senator is mistaken about their going on to this land.

Mr. DAWES. In order to perfectly protect their rights, although it was said and believed to be true by the committee that none of them were upon this land, yet, lest it might turn out that we were mistaken, it was provided that any Indian under these circumstances upon this land should be preserved in his rights by a patent. No one supposed, no one intended that if an Indian, like a white man, should go and purchase this land offered for sale and pay for it, such an Indian should have a patent exempting his land from taxation. No one intended any such thing as that. It was left to the Senator from Nebraska to draw an amendment that would cover and protect the possible rights which no one knew existed, and the Senator from Nebraska supposed he had done it.

And, therefore, while I am not disposed to yield the proposition of law suggested by the Senator from Kansas, who was present when this bill was formed and came out in its present shape, nevertheless it would be a great misfortune to the Indians elsewhere, though it might not affect these, if the Senate should decide that the United States had not authority to exempt land from taxation for twenty-five years which they have the power, while they hold themselves for the Indian, to keep from taxation or incumbrance any number of years. It was deemed by the committee, and has always been so considered by the United States, that the Government parts with but a portion of the title, holding a portion of that title within itself for the very purpose of taking care of the Indians, holding in some sense the title for the purpose of the protection and the uses of the Indian, still holding enough to take care of him. That is the sense in which a patent exempts it from taxation.

I have no interest in this bill further than that the Senate shall not commit itself to a ground that will embarrass us in the future.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I think it will be well for us to understand this question, for it is an important one. For one, I do not question the right of the Government of the United States by treaty to secure to a tribe of Indians the right to hold a tract of land independent of State authority; and when I was in the debate the other day my friend from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY,] not now in his seat, referred to the Cherokee decision in the case of the State of Georgia as affording an illustration against what I contended for then. But that decision only bore out what I said and what I propose to stand by now. In the case of the Cherokee Indians against Georgia, the Supreme Court held distinctively that they were an independent power in that State, and that the State of Georgia had no right to extend her laws over them, Marshall giving the opinion of the court. So in this case I do not question the right of the General Government to set apart a body of land for the Indians and to maintain them there as a distinct tribe, permitting them to hold their lands either in severalty or in common. But if it is the object of this bill to break up the tribal organization and to resolve those savage elements into the great body of the civilized community, then a very different principle must prevail. They cannot be pasmitted to have the principle extended to them in a civilized state which was applicable to them in a barbarous state.

If it is the purpose of the General Government to throw this body of Indians among the civilized masses of Nebraska and to enable them to obtain titles to this land in severalty by patent, they must hold this land upon the same condition as other citizens of that State. If it proposes to keep them apart from the white community and maintain their tribal relation, it can permit them to hold their land in severalty or in common for that purpose, and they are not subject to the laws of Nebraska at all. But the moment it undertakes to reverse this order of things, and to throw these savages into a civilized state, to sell their land to the highest bidder, enabling the Indian to come forth, if he thinks proper, and pay money and take the title, he can only take the title upon the same conditions as a white purchaser, and he must submit to every law and authority in that State the same as a white citizen.

Mr. DAWES. I think the design of the Senator from Nebraska will be reached by an amendment, and I offer as a substitute for the proviso the following:

Provided, That any right in severalty acquired by any Indian under existing treaties shall not be affected by this act.

If that meets the views of the Senator from Nebraska I will move to strike out the proviso and insert it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. As far as I am concerned, I will accept the amendment.

Mr. DAWES. The phraseology of the bill is open to the construction that if any Indian purchases like a white man he can have a patent exempting him from taxation. It does not mean that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the proviso in section 4, and in lieu thereof to insert:

Provided, That any right in severalty acquired by any Indian under existing treaties shall not be affected by this act.

Mr. DAWES. If by chance any Indian has gone under existing treaties upon any portion of this land that it is proposed to sell, and acquired under the treaty the right to have a certificate in severalty, it will not be affected by this, and when the land comes to be sold his right to one hundred and sixty acres must be exempt from the sale.

Mr. INGALLS. That is satisfactory.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to inquire whether, under that provision, Indians now having the right to take any part of this land in severalty will continue to have that right?

Mr. DAWES. Not after the sale.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose that would defeat the object of the bill, for the part that is to be sold embraces the cream of all that reservation, the Logan Valley, and it is the part which any intelligent white man would select his right of severalty upon if he had it, and not among the bad lands bordering on the Missouri, which are left for the Indians. I am opposed to this continual attempt by legislation not only to take away the fairest and richest portions of the Indian reservations by such laws as this, but to still further diminish any right that the Indian may have by compelling him to take from the poor remainder in severalty the one hundred and sixty acres of land, and to the young man eighteen years old, who does not want a farm himself, a little pittance of forty acres, in lieu of his right to all this domain. I am very much surprised that the Senator from Massachusetts, so zealous for the rights of the Indian, permits this bill to pass without knowing, perhaps, as I happen to know, that the very desirable part of all this reservation, the part which white men want to-day, is this Logan Valley. I thought it was the most beautiful piece of land I had ever seen in the United States, as I passed through it a year ago.

It may be all for the best that this land be given to our white Nebraska friends, that piece after piece of the best farming land in that region be taken from the Indians. I know that this bill says it is to be with the consent of the tribe; but the wards of the nation are protected even against their consent by the theory of the Government. They want to be near the river; in their ignorant condition as to farming and agriculture, they want to be where they can throw their lines into the muddy river and draw out the catfish. That is all they live upon, I am told. They will not select the land best adapted for agricultural purposes first; but intelligent men would select this beautiful Garden of Eden which is to be given to the white people from the part of the reservation now proposed to be sold.

I submit to the Senator from Nebraska whether in point of fact the very cream of that reservation is not to be sold under this bill, and whether the Indian's right to take land in severalty is not left to apply to the broken, unfertile portions of the reservation because of the timber there and the gullies there, and the river in which the Indians now fish?

Mr. SAUNDERS. The Senator says that the Indians are by the river for the purpose of catching cat-fish alone.

Mr. CONGER. There may be other kinds of fish; I do not know about that. I do not confine my remark to cat-fish; I enlarge it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. There are more successful farms at those two agencies worked by Indians than anywhere I know of in any part of the country. The members of the other House who were with me visiting these Indians a few years ago found several of these Indians selling four or five hundred bushels of corn, and they have just as good lands left as these are. They want to sell this land, and the tribe have wanted to sell it for the last ten years. About ten years ago a bill was passed for the purpose of selling this same land, but it was limited to $2.50 an acre, and they could not make sale of the land at that time at that price. Lands are more valuable now than then, and can be sold for more. So I have put in the same clause, that they shall be sold at not less than $2.50 an acre.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. CONGER. I am compelled to yield.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. CONGER. No; I had a word or two more to say, but I wanted to arouse the attention of my friend to this proposition. This bill proposes to give the Indians their rights, it is said. Why not make this bill as in other cases so as to give these Indians the right to make their selections after they are informed, after the nation has instructed its wards as it generally does by driving them away from their lands? Why not allow them to make their selection from the land along the Logan Valley, and then sell the residue of their reservation? That is the way we have done in other parts of the country; that is the way we did among the Indian tribes in Michigan. They first made their selection; they were not confined to the paltry little strip of forty acres for each male eighteen years old. But this fertile land in Nebraska, that part of the reservation which is really valuable, must first be taken off, and then a little pittance of land, one hundred and sixty acres to one, forty acres to another, given, and I do not know but twenty to some of the Indians——

Mr. SAUNDERS. No.

Mr. CONGER. I am glad to hear that it is not down to twenty acres.

Mr. SAUNDERS. And it is not down as low as forty acres each for individuals.

Mr. CONGER. I understand the bill to say forty acres.

Mr. SAUNDERS. To be sold in tracts of forty acres, but the land that is to be left for the Indians after this is sold will be more than eighty acres to each individual Indian, great and small.

Mr. CONGER. I may have been mistaken in regard to that. It would be in keeping with the bill to confine it to forty acres, and I thought naturally the bill was consistent with itself.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan seems to be surprised that I have given my assent——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts is not in order.

Mr. DAWES. I wanted to relieve the Senator from Michigan from his surprise; but I can do it to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. Let us vote.

Mr. DAWES. I want to state to the Senate the ground on which I gave my assent to this bill. I have not had the benefit of personal knowledge of the ground as the Senator from Michigan, nor have I had any special claim——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts is speaking on his own amendment, the Chair is informed, and therefore in order.

Mr. DAWES. Last summer I saw the representatives of this tribe, and I heard them myself state that, while they were unwilling to take upon their ground any other Indians, they were very anxious to sell a portion of their real estate and obtain the money, so that the interest of the money they could use for the improvement of the residue of their property. They had more land than they could occupy, as I heard them state myself.

When this bill came in I was troubled lest the sale of 50,000 acres would leave the reservation too small. I went personally to the Indian Bureau to satisfy myself upon that point, and by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs I was assured that it would leave an ample reservation, as much as, if all the Indians should take in severalty, would give each one a farm and have some left for such increase of numbers as might probably be expected in the next twenty-five years; that there was no apprehension on the part of the Department; they were satisfied. He said that it would be for the interest of these Indians to have a portion of their lands converted into money the use of which they could have.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of two o'clock has arrived, and the Chair will lay before the Senate——

Mr. DAWES. I wish the Senate might dispose of this bill. If there be no objection, I ask the Senate to continue the consideration of it.

Mr. INGALLS. Regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is called for, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President yesterday approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

An act (S. No. 699) granting an increase of pension to Saint Clair A. Mulholland;

An act (S. No. 1558) to amend section 2569 of the Revised Statutes, in relation to appraisers at the port of New Orleans, Louisiana; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 56) providing for the erection of a monument over the grave of Thomas Jefferson.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2744) to regulate the carriage of passengers by sea was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 4172) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Syracuse, New York, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

MISSISSIPPI AND MISSOURI RIVERS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1572) for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President, while as a member of the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River and its Tributaries I gave my consent that the bill now before the Senate should be reported I yet reserved my right to support the amendment to be offered by the honorable Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND,] and to offer myself another amendment partly in the same line, that of declaring it to be the policy and duty of this Government, both to maintain and improve the navigation of the Mississippi River, and at the same time to guard against and prevent the destructive and periodical overflow of its banks.

Both the bill and amendments provide that the money to be appropriated shall be expended "under the direction of the Mississippi River commission," and "in accordance with plans recommended by said commission," and I propose to show not only that these plans include, and recommend to a large extent, measures for the protection of the alluvial lands in the Mississippi Valley from overflow, but that the river commission were expressly charged with the duty of inquiring into and maturing such plans and submitting them to Congress for action.

The fourth section of the act of Congress, approved June 28, 1879, by which the Mississippi River commission was created, provides that—

It shall be the duty of said commission to take into consideration and mature such plan or plans and estimates as will correct, permanently locate, and deepen the channel and protect the banks of the Mississippi River, improve and give safety and ease to the navigation thereof, prevent destructive floods, promote and facilitate commerce, trade, and the postal service; and when so prepared and matured, to submit to the Secretary of War a full and detailed report of their proceedings and actions, and of such plans, with estimates of the cost thereof, for the purposes aforesaid, to be by him transmitted to Congress: Provided, That the commission shall report in full upon the practicability, feasibility, and probable cost of the various plans known as the jetty system, the levee system, and the outlet system, as well as upon such others as they deem necessary.

And section 5 of the same act provides that—

The said commission may, prior to the completion of all the surveys and examinations contemplated by this act, prepare and submit to the Secretary of War plans, specifications, and estimates of costs for such immediate works as, in the judgment of said commission, may constitute a part of the general system of works herein contemplated, to be by him transmitted to Congress.

Thus Congress has expres ly appointed a commission charged with the duty not only of maturing plans and furnishing estimates of the cost of works for deepening the channel of the Mississippi River, but also for protecting its banks in order to prevent destructive floods. Yet, when plans have in great part been matured and submitted to Congress, which plans include recommendations for levees and an indorsement of the levee system, we find a disposition to treat this as a new and original question, and as such to deny the right of Congress to make an appropriation for the purpose.

In the bill reported by the committee the following proviso has been inserted:

Provided, That no part of the sum herein appropriated shall be used in the construction or repair of levees for the purpose of preventing injury to lands by overflow, or for any other purpose whatever, except as a means of deepening the channels or improving the navigation of said rivers.

This proviso embodies in a modified form the prejudice and hostility which has long existed, both in and out of Congress, to any measure for the improvement and development of this magnificent natural water-way which, while accomplishing that object, shall afford protection to the alluvial lands through which it flows to meet the sea.

This objection is urged even now, in the face of the great misfortune which has befallen the lowlands of the Mississippi Valley, and which has reduced one of the most prosperous agricultural districts of the earth to a comparative waste, and thrown many thousands of contented and well-to-do laborers upon the generous charity of the Government for bread with which to maintain life.

Many Senators and Members of Congress are willing to vote liberal appropriations for the purpose of preserving a proper depth of water in the channel of the river during the low-water season who cannot see their way to the expenditure of a dollar for the purpose of restraining the water within the banks of the river during the season of high water. Hence this proviso.

But, Mr President, as I said before, this is not a new question. It was settled in the passage of the bill creating the Mississippi River commission.

That commission was charged by its organic act with the duty of preparing plans for the protection of the banks of the river and for preventing "destructive floods." They have made their surveys, they have determined upon plans both for deepening the channel and protecting the banks of the river, and for preventing destructive overflows. They have performed in part the duty assigned them, and have reported their plans and estimates to Congress as directed, and now when we come to make an appropriation to carry out those plans we are about to say that not a dollar of that appropriation is to be used for the purpose of preventing injury to lands by overflow, at least by the construction and repair of levees, which, in the opinion of the commission as well as of nearly all engineers and practical men, is the only mode of preventing destructive overflows.

I do not think, Mr. President, that we should take such a step backward; certainly the country does not expect it of us; certainly not when the whole valley of the Mississippi is deluged with its waters, and the riparian proprietors, as well as the States affected, are powerless to stay its ravages.

The Mississippi River, Mr. President, is a great highway belonging to the nation, and extending from its northern frontier to the Gulf of Mexico. Its waters wash the shores of ten States, and it receives the water-shed of nineteen States and all of our Territories east of the Rocky Mountains. It is too great for individual control, and its waters pass from the jurisdiction of any one State. No corporation can be formed grand enough to control it even if the policy of our Government and the interest of the people would permit that it should be submitted to such control. No State has power to bind it or place limit on its flow of waters, or to make treaties with her sister States in order to secure united action for that purpose. The great States of the Northwest, along which it flows, safely intrenched between hills and highlands, demand that it should bear their rich products of wheat and corn and pork and cattle to the markets of the South and of Europe, and ask the Government to improve and maintain its channel so that the cost of such transportation may be reduced and its efficiency increased.

The people of the Southwestern States, along whose alluvial banks the mighty river wends its way to the sea, join in this prayer, for they are purchasers and consumers of the breadstuffs and provisions produced by their brethren, for which they pay with the price of their great staple which clothes half the world and forms the great medium of exchange between this country and Europe.

Shall one interest be protected and another destroyed? Shall the channel be deepened to the sea so that the produce of the North and West may be safely and cheaply conveyed to market, and shall the waters be permitted to overflow and desolate the magnificent country between Cairo and the Gulf? Shall the great river be made a benefaction and a blessing to one portion of our people and be permitted to carry ruin and desolation to another? And is it to the interest of the great grain and food producing North and West that their best home market should be impoverished and destroyed?

President Garfield said in his letter accepting the nomination for the Presidency:

The Mississippi River, with its great tributaries, is of such vital importance to so many millions of people that the safety of its navigation requires exceptional consideration. In order to secure to the nation the control of all its waters, President Jefferson negotiated the purchase of a vast territory extending from the Gulf of Mexico to the Pacific Ocean. The wisdom of Congress should be invoked to devise some plan by which that great river shall cease to be a terror to those who dwell upon its banks and by which its shipping may safely carry the industrial products of twenty-five millions of people.

And in his eloquent remarks on the Mississippi River commission bill in the House of Representatives, June 21, 1879, he said:

I believe that one of the grandest of our material national interests—one that is national in the largest material sense of that word—is the Mississippi River and its navigable tributaries. It is the most gigantic single natural feature of our continent, far transcending the glory of the ancient Nile, or of any other river on the earth. The statesmanship of America must grapple the problem of this mighty stream. It is too vast for any State to handle; too much for any authority less than that of the nation itself to manage. And I believe the time will come when the liberal-minded statesmanship of this country will devise a wise and comprehensive system that will harness the powers of this great river to the material interests of America, so that not only all the people who live on its banks and the banks of its confluents, but all the citizens of the Republic, whether dwellers in the central valley or on the slope of either ocean, will recognize the importance of preserving and perfecting this great natural and material bond of national union between the North and the South—a bond to be so strengthened by commerce and intercourse that it can never be severed.

Years before, in his speech at Memphis in 1845, Mr. Calhoun, the leader of the school of strict constructionists, said:

The invention of Fulton has in reality for all practical purposes converted the Mississippi with all its tributaries into an inland sea. Regarding it as such, I am prepared to place it on the same footing with the Gulf and Atlantic coasts, the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays and the lakes, in reference to the superintendence of the General Government over its navigation. It is manifest that it is far beyond the power of individuals or of separate States to supervise it.

In discussing a bill making an appropriation for the repair of levees on the Mississippi River, in the United States Senate in 1866, Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, said:

I was not discussing the question whether Congress can fence farms. That is not exactly the question. The question is whether Congress can aid to reclaim a country which the Government bought in 1803, without the express letter of the Constitution authorizing it. This is to reclaim a whole section of the country and to restrain the Mississippi River within its natural limits. That river is under the control of the Government for almost every purpose. It is a great channel of commerce; it is the nation's river; it does not belong to Louisiana; it does not belong to Mississippi; it is the river of all the States; and when it has broken beyond its bounds, why may we not restrain it by some little aid which the Government of the United States may give to the people along the border?

But I was saying, when the Senator interrupted me, that there is no portion of the country more interested in this particular measure than the region of country that he and I represent. Let us have again that country restored to a condition of productiveness, that our people, the men of Indiana and of Illinois, may find there the market that they did before these dreadful crevasses destroyed that country.

In the same debate Mr. Howard, of Michigan, said:

It is a great channel of commerce. Have we not a right to protect it as such? Have we not a right to dredge it out for the purpose of facilitating trade and navigation upon its bosom? I think no gentleman will deny it; and if we have a right to dredge it, have we not, upon the same principle, a right to establish embankments upon it for the purpose of keeping the waters within their proper channels? These levees, I understand, were erected there mainly for that purpose originally.

I vote for this as a great national improvement. It may incidentally inure to the benefit of proprietors upon the banks of the river. If it does, I should be entirely content with it. But the great object is to afford facilities for commerce and navigation upon that stream, an object in which not only the States mentioned in the amendment are particularly interested, but in which Illinois, Ohio, Wisconsin, Iowa, Michigan, all the States of the Union, have an interest as part and parcel of this great nation; and I will not limit or confine my views to the small benefit which it may possibly confer upon the few persons who are immediately interested as planters and owners of farms upon this great river. I vote for it as a national object, as a national undertaking worthy of Congress, and I hope to see the amendment passed.

As I said, this is not a new question. The action of Congress in the passage of the bill creating the Mississippi River commission was not its first legislation in favor of building levees in order to prevent inundations of the Mississippi River.

In the general appropriation act of September 30, 1850, the Government directed the application of $50,000 to "a topographical and hydrographical survey of the delta of the Mississippi, with such investigations as may lead to determine the most practicable plan for securing it from inundation," &c. Fifty thousand dollars additional were applied under the law of August 31, 1852, for a continuance of that survey of "the Mississippi bottom and such investigations as may lead to determine the most practicable plan for securing it from inundation."

Private enterprise in Louisiana had brought into market swamp lands held by the Federal Government to the extent of two millions of acres. In consideration of this gain to the Treasury, the act of March 2, 1849, granted the remaining swamp lands in Louisiana to that State for the uses of her levees. On similar grounds Congress extended the provisions of that law in the act of September 28, 1850, to Arkansas and all other States having lands of that character belonging to the Federal Government.

It was largely with the proceeds of these lands that the States of Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana constructed the very excellent system of levees which they maintained before the war, and the enhanced value of the lands reclaimed within those levees afforded basis for taxation sufficient to keep them in repair. The surveys authorized by the appropriations made in 1850 and 1852 were continued until the war, and a report was made upon them in August, 1861, by General Humphreys and Colonel Abbott.

In 1865 Mr. Stanton, then Secretary of War, directed General Humphreys to make an examination and survey of the Mississippi levees and report where and what repairs were most urgently required to prevent great injury to the agricultural interests of the alluvial region of the Mississippi. This Mr. Stanton did with a view of repairing the ravages of war and restoring the levees which had been destroyed as a military necessity. Since repeated reports of a favorable character have been made by committees of Congress on bills favoring appropriations for building levees as a part of a scheme for general river improvement, and these bills generally failed for want of concert of action, proper information, and a recognized and official plan of improvement. In order to secure such a plan the act creating the Mississippi River commission was passed with singular unanimity. Distinguished engineers were appointed upon that commission, and after elaborate examination and surveys they have made two reports to Congress—a preliminary report in 1880, and one fuller and more comprehensive in November, 1881. In the latter report the commission say:

The utility of levees as a means "to prevent destructive floods," which is one of the ends enumerated in the act creating the commission, is too obvious to require comment. The importance to be attached to that object is a matter wholly within the discretion of Congress, and not suitable to be discussed here.

The utility of levees as a means to "deepen the channel" of the river and "improve and give safety and ease to the navigation thereof," which are other ends enumerated in the act, is a subject on which differences of opinion exist, and in respect to which the facts collected do not carry equal weight as evidence to the minds of all the members of the commission. It is considered by all that levees, by confining the flood waters of the river within a comparatively restricted space, do tend, in some degree, to increase the scouring and deepening power of the current. But the extent and potency of their influence in the improvement of the low-water channel, in respect to which, for the purpose of navigation merely, improvement is most needed, and their value, for that purpose, as compared with other methods of improvement, and as compared with their cost, are regarded as subjects requiring further observation and study, and the accumulation of further and more comprehensive data, before final conclusions can be reached concerning them. In the mean time, and in the existing state of knowledge on the subject, the present judgment of the commission cannot be better expressed than in the words of their report of February 17, 1880, from which the following extract is submitted:

"Levees have never been erected upon the banks of the Mississippi River except for the special purpose of protecting the alluvial lands from overflow. They have, therefore, always had reference to the high-water stage, and the degree to which levees might prudently be relied upon 'to improve and give safety to navigation,' 'promote and facilitate commerce, trade, and the postal service,' has not hitherto entered into the question of the construction and maintenance of a levee system.

"There is no doubt that the levees exert a direct action in deepening the channel and enlarging the bed of the river during those periods of 'rise' or 'flood,' when by preventing the dispersion of the flood-waters over the adjacent low lands, either over the river banks or through bayous or other openings, they actually cause the water to rise to a higher level within the river-bed than it would attain if not thus restrained.

"It would seem to follow, from the law that the volume of water flowing in the bed determines the size, that, prior to the construction of levees, the area of the mean cross-section of bed of the Mississippi River must have been less than it was after the levees had reached their most efficient condition, assuming, what is believed to be true, that the average rainfall in the Mississippi Valley has not materially changed within the last hundred years.

"There is some evidence, in a comparison of the results of Young, Poussin, and Tuttle's examination of 1821 with later surveys, that the width of the river has increased since that date.

"As silt-bearing streams in alluvial districts have a tendency to assume in the straight reaches cross-sections which are arcs of circles, and in the bends curves of deeper forms, it follows that any general widening of the river resulting from concentration or increase of volume which may have taken place would, as a rule, be accompanied by a general and corresponding deepening as the result of such general enlargement, although local shoalings, temporarily injurious to navigation, might occur.

"There is reason to believe that during the period when levees were in their most perfect condition, from 1850 to 1858, the channel of the river was better generally for purposes of navigation than it has been since that time.

"It is known that during the last twenty years the levee system has been continuously interrupted by a great number of crevasses between Cairo and Red River.

"Before the levees were built a large portion of the flood-waters spread out over the banks of the river in a thin sheet, of which the average depth at the margin of the stream, where it escaped, did not probably exceed a few inches, or, at most, a foot. The immediate effect of the levees would be to increase the volume and height, and accelerate the velocity of the flood-waters between them, resulting in an erosion and deepening of the river-bed, and ultimately in a corresponding lowering of the flood-slope, in accordance with the general law already quoted—that an increase in the normal volume of discharge in a sedimentary stream, flowing through alluvial deposits, results ultimately in a lowering of the flood-surface. It would seem, therefore, that a closure of the crevasses might be expected to accelerate the removal of those shoals which have been produced by them, and if their closure be accompanied by the requisite contraction of the channel to a more nearly uniform high-water width, a lowering of the flood-level may be expected to such extent as will ultimately render the maintenance of the levees as an aid to navigation practically needless above Red River, and greatly lessen the necessity of their permanent maintenance for that purpose below Red River, even at a reduced height.

"While it is not claimed that levees in themselves are necessary as a means of securing ultimately a deep channel for navigation, it is believed that the repair and maintenance of the extensive lines already existing will hasten the work of channel improvement through the increased scour and depth of river-bed which they would produce during the high-river stages. They are regarded as a desirable, though not a necessary, adjunct in the general system of improvement submitted.

"It is obvious that levees are, upon a large portion of the river, essential to prevent destruction to life and property by overflow. They give safety and ease to navigation and promote and facilitate commerce and trade by establishing banks or landing-places above the reach of floods, upon which produce can be placed while awaiting shipment, and where steamboats and other river craft can land in times of high water.

"In a restricted sense as auxiliary to a plan of channel improvement only, the construction and maintenance of a levee system is not demanded. But in a larger sense, as embracing not only beneficial effects upon the channel, but as a protection against destructive floods, a levee system is essential, and such system also promotes and facilitates commerce, trade, and the postal service.

"A levee system aids and facilitates the postal service by protecting from injury and destruction by freshets and floods the various common roads and railways upon which that service is conducted to and from the river bank, and generally within that portion of the alluvial region subject to overflow. Moreover, the permanent maintenance below Cairo of a connected levee system—a system of sufficient strength to inspire confidence in its efficiency, or the demonstration by the achieved results of an improved river that overflow need no longer be seriously apprehended—would act as a prompt and powerful stimulant in rapidly developing a largely increased trade and commerce in all the products of agricultural industry indigenous to that region and in those branches of manufacturing enterprises related thereto."

In the report of the sub-committee on outlets and levees upon the degradation of the banks of the river and its effect upon navigation, will be found many strong arguments in favor of the levee system, and also the theory, supported by an irresistible array of facts, "that the elevation of the banks of the river before the lands adjacent to the main stream, and in the basins of its tributary streams, were cleared and cultivated, conformed much more nearly to the flood plane of the river than they do at present, and they are now so degraded by causes to be cited hereafter that the building of levees originally undertaken for reclamation has now become a question of maintaining artificially the former height of banks to preserve navigation;" and this decay of the banks is shown to be the natural result of the deforestering and cultivation of the country, and the sub-committee continue—

The time has passed when we can deal with the causes of change and deterioration heretofore cited. We cannot arrest the continued settlement of the basins and of the immediate banks of the stream, nor the attendant processes of clearing, draining, reclaiming. In any plan of improvement it must be recognized that the banks of the river have been lowered from their normal height several feet by causes that will increase for many years; that this former elevation of bank is restored, and the dispersion of flood-waters restrained by artificial embankments; that these are in precarious condition, requiring constant repair, and an extension, of more or less importance, in the plan recommended in our previous reports.

Therefore, apart from this extension, which has been partially discussed in previous reports of the commission as a work that would be of auxiliary importance, does not the question of levees, in view of the foregoing discussion, assume greater importance than has been allowed heretofore?

Would not the navigation of the river be most seriously obstructed if the normal banks were lowered seven or eight feet, as they now would be by the obliteration of levees, so as to allow the dispersion of flood-waters at a stage that much lower than the height which the river established, in compliance with the laws of its regimen?

Do not the present levees, instead of being only supplementary works built on top of the banks, stand as a part of the normal bed, giving that height of bank and maintaining that restraint upon the flood-waters which were established as conditions of its regimen? (See page 125, Report Mississippi Commission.)

The commission of engineers appointed under the act of June 22, 1874, "to investigate and report a permanent plan for the reclamation of the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River subject to inundation," in their report, after describing the incomplete levee system after the war, say:

In fine, then, the experience of over one hundred and fifty years has utterly failed to create judicious laws or effective organization in the several States themselves, and no systematic co-operation has ever been attempted between them. The latter is no less important than the former, for the river has no respect for State boundaries, and deluges Arkansas through breaks in the levees of Missouri, and overflows Louisiana by floods passing across the Arkansas line.

It is a common and apt figure of speech to personify the Mississippi, and to speak of the conflict waged to protect the country against the inroads of a terrible enemy, and yet the army of defense has always been content to remain a simple aggregation of independent companies, with here and there a battalion under the command of a board of officers. That victory has not more frequently perched upon their banners is surely not surprising.

The British administration of the Indian lines is in striking contrast. The government takes the initiative, and sends its engineers to survey and estimate for levees at such localities as promises to be remunerative. The reports with detailed maps, plans, and estimates of costs are sent to the collector, who publishes the same and calls for reasons why the improvement shall not be ordered. Unless good reason is shown by the owners of the land to be benefited, the levees are built by the Government and a tax sufficient to pay for the same is laid upon the lands reclaimed thereby. If the sum is large an annual tax for a term of years is collected; if small, immediate payment is required. The enhancement of the value of his land thus precedes any raising of money by the proprietor.

This system is not suggested for adoption on the Mississippi, but is mentioned simply as an illustration that other nations have found by experience that individual efforts cannot successfully combat nature on a grand scale.

In the report of Humphreys and Abbott, made to the Secretary of War in 1861, (to which I have already alluded,) it is stated:

As the result of the careful investigation the subject had received, that the only method of protection against inundation that could be resorted to with success was the levee system, but that the levees as then constructed were not high enough by several feet. The additional heights that should be given at different points in the course of the river are there pointed out.

It is further stated that if there were no levees whatever, the cost of constructing them of such height and dimensions as would give complete protection against inundation to the whole alluvial region would amount to about twenty-six million dollars.

That to bring the levees then standing to this perfection, supposing them to be properly located, would cost $17,000,000.

The area thus protected amounts to 31,700 square miles, of which a mere narrow strip along the banks of the river and along a few bayous has been opened for cultivation.

Of this area, 12,300 square miles is below Red River, and belongs to the sugar region. Under a proper system of protection and drainage one-third of it may be eventually opened and cultivated, or 2,500,000 acres.

There are now under cultivation in this region about one million acres.

Of the remaining 19,400 square miles, perhaps 3,000 square miles may be north of the cotton-growing region, leaving some sixteen thousand square miles within that region of the most fertile alluvion, two-thirds of which may be finally rendered cultivable under a proper system of leveeing and draining. This would give 7,000,000 acres of cultivated land, capable of giving a bale of cotton to the acre, or about double the whole cotton crop of the United States in 1860.

The levees constructed under such a system would not, when greatest, exceed in magnitude those on the right branch of the Rhine below Arnheim, which protect the most fertile part of Holland. These levees are exposed at high water to as strong a current as that of the Mississippi in flood, and also to the destructive effects of ice. But the occurrence of crevasses such as take place with every great flood of the Mississippi are there unknown. Should they happen, the ruin of a large part of the most productive portion of Holland would follow, as extensive tracts protected by the levees are lower than surface of the sea, and their reclamation from overflow could only be effected by a drainage similar to that which has been applied to the lake of Harlem. The supervision, watching, and repair of the levees is costly, but effective and remunerative. The levees of the Mississippi as now existing are trifling compared to the interests they protect, and to the levees of the delta rivers of Europe, the Po, the Rhine, and the Vistula.

Some indication of the great wealth that would flow from the establishment of a proper levee system is given in what proceeds; such a system will probably be introduced gradually, and, as experience proves to those who must pay for it, that it is more and more necessary.

There have been great changes since the war; much of the country under cultivation and protected by levees at the time this report was made has been abandoned. The lands have depreciated in value because of insufficient protection and periodical overflows, and to some extent from scarcity of labor.

Little or no new land has been opened to cultivation, swamps remain undrained and forests uncut, and thousands of acres of land more fertile than the delta of the Nile are not able to bear the burden of taxation. The States, the counties, and parishes are impoverished and crippled with ante-bellum debts or with new ones created in a futile attempt to establish a levee system. Thrice in fifteen years have the waters deluged our lands, each time sweeping away all that has been accumulated by the intervening years of labor and thrift, and leaving nothing but the naked lands, enriched perhaps with a deposit which might be valuable to some more arid soil, but which is of little value when added to a bed of inexhaustible alluvion. The planters of the Mississippi Valley are men of elastic temperament and the most untiring energy. Again and again they have arisen superior to adversity, and have battled nobly to rebuild their fortunes and to protect their lands against new inundations.

But, Mr. President, the unequal war must cease. No individual efforts, whether of planter, county, district, or State, will longer avail. Either the Federal Government must take charge of this gigantic work, so truly national in its character, or this vast alluvial country must be relegated to the wilderness from which it was redeemed.

We have unfortunately no estimates from the Mississippi River commission of the cost of a complete levee system.

In the brief remarks which I made upon this subject on the 15th of March I read an estimate made by a member of the commission, Major Harrod, which I will not read now, but will print with my remarks.

NEW ORLEANS, December 2, 1881.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your request for information relative to the cost of a levee system, I give you my personal views. They cannot strictly be called an estimate, as such can only be based on surveys, and those of the Mississippi River commission are not yet sufficiently advanced to afford all the data necessary. I give you, however, the facts on which I base my opinion, and from which I think you will perceive that the figures are ample.

The levee commission of 1874 estimated that the aggregate length of breaks in the Arkansas and Mississippi fronts was 192 miles, which would require for closing 4,000,000 cubic yards, or 20,833 cubic yards per mile. It is, therefore, certainly more than sufficient to assume that the entire alluvial front of these two States, say from the Louisiana-Arkansas line to Commerce, Missouri, a distance of 600 miles, will require leveeing. This distance, at the above rate in cubic yards, amounts to 12,499,800 yards.

The Mississippi State levees have been put and maintained in good order since 1874. The same is partially true of Louisiana. An allowance of 2,500,000 yards would certainly be sufficient, apart from maintenance, to close existing breaks in these two States. This, added to the requirements in Missouri and Arkansas, would be 15,000,000 cubic yards.

But it is probable that the entire line, thus repaired, might need raising. The Mississippi River commission, as you will see in the last report, probably now before the Senate, does not consider the bed of the river practically incrosible, as has been heretofore assumed. Its reasons are derived from more extended and exact information than has been available. It is not certain that any great elevation of grade will be necessary for a continuously completed line. I am very sure that the additional elevation heretofore recommended, amounting as a maximum, to eleven feet, will never be required. For purposes of estimate I will assume that the present levees range in height from four to twelve feet, and that this must be increased to from five to fifteen feet over the entire length, on both banks, say 1,670 miles. While there are now heights exceeding twelve feet, there are also many localities where no levees, or levees less than four feet high, are required.

The amount of earthwork required for this additional grade is about 44,000,000 cubic yards, giving the following total:

Entire new levees in Arkansas and Missouri	12,500,000
Breaks in Louisiana and Mississippi	2,500,000
Raising grade throughout	44,000,000
Total cubic yards	59,000,000

The State of Louisiana has built her levees for the past two years at an average price of 19.4 cents per cubic yard. For the two years previous to that period, when supplies and labor were cheaper, the average cost was a fraction over 17 cents. The payments for this work have not been in cash, some warrants usually running as much as a year before settlement. The work also was divided into such small parts that contractors were not justified in purchasing the labor-saving machinery necessary for the economical execution of such work. It seems to me entirely certain that levee building could be done for 20 cents per yard for cash and in such large contracts as would admit the purchase of a suitable outfit. Assuming this rate, and the quantities before stated would make the cost of a complete levee system $11,800,000, or about one-quarter of previous estimates, namely, $46,000,000.

Now concerning maintenance. The States of Louisiana and Mississippi have about 1,070 out of 1,670 miles of front requiring levees, or where the hills do not approach the river. This is kept in tolerably good order. There is spent annually for maintenance in these two States a sum not exceeding $400,000; $500,000 would suffice to do it well. Prorating this sum over the entire length would give $773,000. I believe that with the better locations and dimensions that would be given by the Government to a systematic line, and with the protection to caving banks by revetment and other works of channel improvement, and with the greater security resulting from increased height, the maintenance could be accomplished annually for the sum of $600,000.

The part that this levee work would play in securing the objects enumerated in the act creating the Mississippi River commission is declared in our reports. With the other vast advantages that would flow from it you are as familiar as I am.

Very respectfully,

R. M. HARROD.

Hon. B. F. JONAS.

Mr. Harrod's estimate is $11,800,000. It was made before the overflow, and the repairs of the levees now made necessary would add probably $2,000,000 to the cost.

Fifty millions, Mr. President, would be a cheap expenditure to protect this magnificent country from destruction, and it would be repaid tenfold to the general wealth of the country in the great increase of values, of population, and of valuable agricultural products.

But we are told by Senators who desire to vote appropriations for the improvement of the Mississippi River that they cannot vote for levees to reclaim the alluvial lands upon its banks. This though they have voted for initial surveys and estimates for this very purpose, and although the commission of engineers have reported in favor of levees, not only for that object, but as a mode of contracting and deepening the channel.

Where, Mr. President, are the banks of this river now, and who are the riparian proprietors? In Arkansas the waters spread to the hills, over an area of fifty miles in width. In Mississippi the flood extends over the whole Yazoo Valley, more than a hundred miles from the Mississippi River. In my State the devastating flood has buried the riparian parishes out of sight, and the waters of the Mississippi are spread over the La Fourche, the Teche, the Atchafalaya, the Courtablean, in short over the whole southern portion of the State, overflowing sections of country in some instances two hundred miles from its ordinary banks and supposed to lie beyond all danger of inundation.

Are these people riparian proprietors who are not to be protected because the value of their lands may be enhanced? Are the valleys of the South to be deserted and their people to be compelled to flee to the hills? Is the money of the nation to be used only to deepen this vast river, so that it may bear the productions of the North and West to the sea, and not a dollar to be used for the purpose of controlling its swollen waters and preventing it from emptying itself in death and desolation over a country equally as fair and more than equally productive? Is one object more national in its character than the other? Will one add more to the general prosperity and happiness of the country than the other?

No, Mr. President, in the language of President Garfield again:

The wisdom of Congress should be invoked to devise some plan by which that great river shall cease to be a terror to those who dwell upon its banks, and by which its shipping may safely carry the industrial products of twenty-five millions of people.

These objects should be common to us all, and should be included in any bill we may pass, as they are included in the plans recommended by the Mississippi River commission.

But it is said, Mr. President, if the commission should deem it best to build levees for the purpose of deepening and improving the channel, that they have the power to do so, and that the alluvial lands would receive incidental benefit therefrom. If so, why not declare it, and why couple the appropriation contained in this bill with a proviso which would seem to limit this power or make it doubtful whether it exists at all? I am told that in view of this proviso, which was attached to the appropriation made last year, the commission entertained doubts as to their power to spend a dollar for levees, even for the purpose of contracting the channel, and I know that the people of the Mississippi Valley read it with the same doubt.

If these people are to have even incidental relief we should tell them so. They are waiting in their desolate homes for a rift in the sullen sky; waiting to be encouraged by a hope that Congress will grant them some aid and security for the future. If the levees are to be rebuilt, if the destructive overflows are to be controlled by efforts of the General Government, then they can once more go to work with hope. Their lands will have some value; they can obtain credit for provisions, farming utensils, and supplies; they can re-employ and feed their laborers, restore their fences, rebuild their cabins, and cultivate their crops. If we are going to give them even this incidental aid let us say so, and inspire them with hope and energy, so that as their lands emerge from the water they may commence the work of restoration.

It is with this view I have offered my amendment.

I am, as I have said, in favor of a direct appropriation for building levees, and shall vote for the amendment of the honorable Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.] Should that fail I will ask the Senate to adopt my amendment, which, meaning what the friends of the "proviso" say that it means, speaks out in language which cannot be misunderstood.

The amendment proposes to strike out the proviso and to insert, so as to read:

> And so much thereof may be applied to the immediate repair or construction of such levees as in the judgment of the said Mississippi River commission will assist in deepening the channel and improving the navigation of said rivers: Provided, That no part of the sum herein appropriated shall be used in the construction or repair of levees for the sole purpose of preventing injury to lands by overflow, or otherwise than as a means of deepening the channel or improving the navigation of the rivers.

The adoption of this amendment will make the meaning clear both to the commission and to the people most interested.

I do not care to discuss the question of outlets, as they have not been adopted in the plans of the Mississippi River commission, and find little or no favor among engineers or the people of the Mississippi Valley. A respected citizen of my State, Captain Leathers, has been before the committees of Congress advocating the outlet proposition of Captain Cowden, and opposing the plans of the Mississippi River commission. I find, however, that on another occasion, before a committee of Congress, Captain Leathers testified strongly in favor of a levee system as the best means of preserving the banks and deepening the channel of the Mississippi. I quote from his testimony:

> I came on the river in 1836. The river was very low that year. The average depth of water on the shoalest bars from the mouth of the Ohio to the mouth of the Arkansas, a distance of about four hundred and fifty miles, was about four feet. From mouth of Arkansas to mouth of Yazoo, about two hundred and twenty-five miles, there was about five feet. From that to the mouth of Red River, about the same distance, the average depth on the shoaled bars was seven feet. Below Red River levees had been built; I do not know how long; but thence to the Gulf there was deep water.
> Then levees began to be built above Red River in the parishes of Concordia, Tensas, Madison, and Carroll, the result of which was that in 1857, a period of twenty-one years, while the river was twenty inches lower in its banks, there was not less than eight and a half feet of water on the shoalest bars in the formerly unleveed district between the Red and Arkansas Rivers, showing an increased depth of four feet scoured out by the current created by concentration of the water.
> I am convinced from my observations that if the levees were rebuilt and kept up on the lowlands, the concentration of volume and consequent accelerated current would soon wash out a channel large and deep enough for any purposes of commercial navigation. I am thoroughly satisfied that in the last ten years the frequent breaks in the levees and crevasses, dispersing the water over the country and diminishing the current, have caused the river to begin to shoal again. It always shoals near these breaks, evidently in consequence of the slackened current and natural deposit of sediment on the bottom which follows.
> I am confident that the only way of deepening the channel and getting reliable navigation is to concentrate the current, and if the great river accommodates itself by scouring out the bottom there will be no necessity for higher barriers at the top, and the levees will become more solid and reliable, because relieved in a measure from the great pressure to which they are subjected.

In the discussion of this bill, Mr. President, some opposition, or at least criticism, has come from the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] and the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CAMERON,] principally on the ground that the present appropriation is asked by the commission for the river below the mouth of the Ohio. The river commission have only made a "progress report," as authorized by the fifth section of the act under which they were appointed, which says:

> They may, prior to the completion of all the surveys and examinations contemplated by this act, prepare and submit to the Secretary of War plans, specifications, and estimates of costs for such immediate works as in the judgment of said commission may constitute a part of the general system of works herein contemplated to be by him transmitted to Congress.

It is usual to commence the work of river improvement from the mouth and work upwards, and certainly the most immediate necessity exists between the mouth and the Ohio River. If the policy of contraction is to be adopted, and the work should commence at the headwaters, what would become of the concentrated volume of water when it reached the lowlands, where no work had been done? Manifestly it would spread over the whole country, producing a flood in high-water season and a wide, shallow stream, full of sand-bars, in the season of low water.

It appears from the report that the surveys and levels have been completed to Keokuk, Iowa, and that observation parties have been at work at Prescott, Winona, Clayton, and other points on the Upper Mississippi during the past year.

I feel, Mr. President, the same interest in the improvement of the Upper Mississippi as in the Lower, and I am prepared to vote for all appropriations for that purpose as soon as the commission submit their plans and estimates.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Louisiana pardon an interruption for one moment?

Mr. JONAS. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator whether it is not true that the work of improvement on the upper river is going on and has been going on simultaneously with the work of the commission on the lower river, under engineer officers placed specially in charge of sections of the upper river? I understand that it is not intended at all that the appropriation provided for in this bill shall apply to the whole river, or be the only appropriation for the river. It is the purpose of the commission, if I understand it, to leave those works on the upper river and even between Saint Louis and Cairo in charge of those engineer officers who have had them in charge, and that by special appropriations works on the upper river shall be made in addition to the amount provided for in the bill.

Mr. JONAS. I am glad to hear the explanation of the Senator, because I favor every one of these appropriations, and shall vote cheerfully for them when they come before the Senate. My impression was the other day that these appropriations were perhaps provided for in the river and harbor bill which is now being formed in the House, of which of course we have no information and to which we have perhaps no right to allude.

I live on the same great river as the Senator from Minnesota, although more than eighteen hundred miles of water-way separate our homes. My people are as much interested in its navigation and improvement from the source to the mouth as his.

We desire that the products of his great State shall find cheap and easy transportation to market, foreign or domestic, on the bosom of the Mississippi, and through our gates. We are natural commercial allies and friends, and it is to our mutual interest that every foot of the mighty stream which stretches its great length between us should be made available for the uses of commerce by the expenditure of whatever of talent, energy, or money may be necessary. I stand ready to vote with the Senator for all appropriations that may be required in order to perfect the low-water navigation of this river so that there may be a permanent channel maintained from the head of the river to the jetties, at all times and seasons, when not impeded by ice, and to this end I desire and ask him and other Senators interested in such improvement to stand by and support the recommendations of the Mississippi River commission.

The friends of this bill are attacking no other appropriation for any other locality or national purpose. We are criticising no other appropriations either now proposed or hitherto made for the development of our great national water-ways, harbors, and lakes. We claim that the friends of all these measures are interested in the improvement of the Mississippi, and in the great commercial results and interchange of commercial relations which must follow.

I shall not take time, Mr. President, in dilating upon the products and commerce of the Mississippi Valley, all of which should and will be tributary to the Mississippi River if permanent low-water navigation is secured. It has been hitherto stated on this floor—

> That fourteen States, which lie wholly within the valley, contrasted with the entire Union, produced, in 1879, 81 per cent. of the corn, 64 per cent. of the wheat, 60 per cent. of the oats, 49 per cent. of the cotton, 55 per cent. of the tobacco, and contained 66 per cent. in value of the live hogs.
> That the whole nineteen States intersected by the navigable portions produced, in 1879, 90 per cent. of the corn, 73 per cent. of the wheat, 83 per cent. of the oats, 64 per cent. of the tobacco, 77 per cent. of the cotton, and contained 81 per cent. in value of the live hogs.
> That the value of the annual internal commerce of the valley is about twelve and one-half times that of the total foreign commerce of the United States, and therefore about $18,000,000,000, or larger than the total foreign commerce of the whole world.

Since the success of the jetties has been assured the movement of grain by river for export from New Orleans increased in the single year ending August 31, 1880, as follows: Corn, 92 per cent. and wheat 186 per cent., and this in spite of low water and dangerous navigation.

> The transportation rates on a bushel of wheat shipped from the center of the valley, at Saint Louis, by river to the seaboard at New Orleans, during the three years 1877, 1878, and 1879 ranged all the way from ten to fifteen cents less than by rail to the seaboard at New York.
> If half of the grain produced in the fourteen valley States in 1879 had to be shipped from that center by river to New Orleans instead of by rail to New York the annual saving to the seaboard at ten cents per bushel would be $90,381,552, and at fifteen cents per bushel $135,572,328.

Mr. Nimmo, the distinguished statistician of the Treasury Department, in his report of this year on the "competition between the Mississippi River and the trunk railroads from Saint Louis to the Atlantic seaboard," gives the following statement of the comparative freight charges as between Saint Louis and Liverpool, via New Orleans and via New York, from January 1, 1880, to July 1, 1881:

Mr. Nimmo continues:

In view of the fact that ocean rates fluctuate from day today, and that no agreements as to those rates prevail, as in the case of railroad transportation, it is difficult to present a schedule showing the relative rates from New Orleans and from New York, respectively, to Liverpool. It is stated by Mr. George H. Morgan, secretary of the Merchants' Exchange at Saint Louis, that the ocean rates from New Orleans to Liverpool are, on the average, about 25 per cent. greater than the rates from New York to Liverpool. Ocean rates at New Orleans are shown in Appendix No. 42.

Mr. Morgan also states that upon the opening of navigation in the month of March, 1881, and for some time thereafter, the through rate from Saint Louis to Liverpool was as high as 26½ cents per bushel on wheat, while the rate by rail via New York and thence by steamer to Liverpool was about thirty-five cents. He states, however, that since the first rush ended, freights have gradually declined until on the 31st of May the rate from Saint Louis to Liverpool via the Mississippi River was only 18½ cents per bushel on wheat, whereas at the same time by the rail route via Atlantic seaports it was about thirty cents per bushel, a difference of 11½ cents per bushel in favor of the river route.

Mr. John King, jr., late first vice-president of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, in his report to the joint executive committee of east-and-west trunk lines, under date of April 27, 1881, states that on the 20th of March last the total charges for transporting grain from Saint Louis to Liverpool via New Orleans, including river rates, ocean rates, insurance and transfer charges at New Orleans, amounted to 46.74 cents per 100 pounds, or 28 cents per bushel, and that at the same time the total charges for transporting grain from Saint Louis to Liverpool via New York, including rail and ocean rates and all incidental charges, amounted to 60.44 cents per 100 pounds, or 36¼ cents per bushel. This shows the charges on the route via New Orleans to be less than the rates via Atlantic seaports by 8¼ cents per bushel.

At the time this statement was made by Mr. King the river rate was eight and a half cents per bushel from Saint Louis to New Orleans. It is believed, however, by well-informed persons that grain can thus be transported in barges at a profit for four cents per bushel.

These statements show the great advantages offered by the river route for western transportation to the seaboard, even with the present difficult navigation. It is easy to see how much greater would be its capacity and how much less would be the cost of transportation with permanent low-water navigation. It is even now a matter of almost common occurrence for a single tug to tow from Saint Louis to New Orleans, in barges, a cargo of three hundred and seventy-five thousand bushels of grain and accomplish the trip in ten days. To carry this cargo by rail would require over nine hundred freight-cars and test the capacity of railroads to carry it in double the time.

Such being the great national advantages of this river improvement so successfully inaugurated by the construction of the jetties, and in view of the demand made from nearly all sections of the country for its continuance and perfection by Congress under the plans of the Mississippi River commission, I sincerely trust that this bill may receive the approval of the Senate and that the amendments offered may also be adopted.

The honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HARRISON,] in his speech yesterday, while advocating channel improvements for the river, devoted most of his time to an attempt to show that the levee system has no relation to the work of river improvement, and opposed with great earnestness any proposition to expend a dollar for the purpose of preventing destructive floods, or, as he styles it, "land reclamation."

The honorable Senator might have approached the discussion with less bitterness and indulged, with good taste, in less misrepresentation of the arguments of his opponents.

This is no place for bitterness or partisanship, and I am at a loss to see any occasion for such frequent allusions to the rebellion. The losses and poverty of which the people of the Mississippi Valley complain are not the results of war, but of constant inundation, which sweep away the proceeds of their crops, leaving them always in debt, and always, like Sisyphus, recommencing their weary task, except that, unlike that unfortunate, they have no hill up which to roll their burden. They have State governments, but their treasuries are impoverished, and these State governments are unable to make treaties with each other for the adoption of a general levee system.

I see no reason why the honorable Senator should have said that the "War Department, which once sent armies and gunboats to destroy and kill, became the quick and gracious agent of Congress to convey food and shelter to the hungry and homeless." Why should the recollections of the war be evoked and connected with the generous action of Congress? Does not the honorable Senator know that nine-tenths of those whom we have fed and sheltered with this benefaction are colored people who had no part in the war except to receive the benefit of freedom. We have fed and clothed these people since the war, and have bought their food in Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio. Their wages and employment have continued whether crops were good or bad, and as long as bread and meat were in the storehouse it has been divided among them.

It has been twenty years since the war, Mr. President. The War Department has become one of peace. Let it perform the errand of mercy with which it has been charged by Congress without the display of ancient banners or the thunder of ghostly artillery. In the few remarks which I made when the bill of Senator GARLAND was first introduced, in drawing a distinction between the condition of the planters in the Mississippi Valley before the war and since, I stated that before the war 300,000 slaves, representing a taxable value of nearly $300,000,000, were held and assessed as property.

On this statement it has pleased the honorable Senator to make the following sneering comment, coupled with an innuendo unworthy of this place and of his position. He says:

Plainly stated, it is that the planters are now unable to pay the necessary taxes because they have lost slave property of the value of $300,000,000, and therefore the United States ought to build the levees. A middle premise in the argument, not stated by the Senator, suggests itself to me as necessary to its completeness. It is this: the United States destroyed this slave property, therefore, &c.

I treat the innuendo with the contempt which it deserves.

The amendments offered to the pending bill, Mr. President, ask for no appropriation except to carry out the plans of the commission. I contend that levees are an important part of their plan of improvement, and on that question take issue with the Senator.

The honorable Senator says that the river commission have not recommended the building or repair of levees as a part of their plan for river improvement. He admits that they have adopted their former report, made in 1880, upon that subject as their present judgment, and he read a portion of that report, but did not read it all, as I have done. He must have changed his opinion as to the meaning of the river commission in the report referred to, for he joined with General Comstock in a minority report, in which he dissented from the opinion of the majority of the committee on three points.

The second ground of dissent was as follows:

2. We do not concur with the majority of the commission in their estimate of the value of the closure of gaps in existing levees as a factor in the improvement of low-water navigation; this estimate being derived in part from the theoretical views already referred to.

Existing evidence seems to show that during low-water stages the bars below Cairo are usually cut out by the river, and that when the period of low river in the following season approaches, these low-water channels are found filled up, the low-water bed of the river in these shoal places having risen, to be again cut out by the low river. (See Major Suter's report in Report of Chief of Engineers, 1875.)

At the Horse Tail Bar, below Saint Louis, the bed of the river has been observed to rise eight or ten feet above low-water in the interval between two low river periods. (See General Simpson's report in Chief of Engineer's report, 1876.)

If, then, the final effect of a flood which rises from thirty to fifty feet above low water is to raise the low-water bed of the river at shoal places, may it not be possible that if the height of this flood be somewhat increased by levees the bed may rise still further instead of being depressed, thus injuring instead of improving navigation?

But even if a rise or fall of a foot or two in the bed of the river were produced by levees, it is difficult to see how this would sensibly affect the low-water width of the river. Bad navigation arises from excessive low-water width at certain places, and is to be cured by contracting that low-water width to about three thousand feet. This contraction must be effected by works in the bed of the river, and not by levees on top of its banks, out of contact with the low-water river.

For these reasons we are of the opinion that levees are of very little value in improving the low-water navigation of the river. Of their necessity in protecting alluvial lands against destructive floods there can be no doubt, and to obtain such protection the first step would be the closure of gaps in existing levees. The regulation of the low-water river, including the fixation of the river banks, would be of the greatest aid to the levees, since it would secure them from destruction by caving.

If the majority of the commission at that time "favored the closure of gaps in existing levees as a factor in the improvement of low-water navigation," they are of the same opinion now, for they reiterate that report as their present judgment, and they have been strengthened by new recruits, for the report is signed by General Comstock, who dissented last year, and by Mr. Taylor, the successor of the honorable Senator.

How can the honorable Senator assert with so much confidence that the commission do not include the use of levees in their recommendations and plans, when their original estimate of this year (in which all concur) calls for the sum of $1,010,000 for closing existing gaps in levees, and when they have made a supplemental report, forwarded to the Senate with the special recommendation of the President, asking for $1,010,000 more for the same purpose, rendered necessary by the overflow.

Certainly the honorable Senator does not expect to convince the Senate that the Mississippi River Commission does not include the levee system in their plan of improvement when they ask an appropriation of over $2,000,000 for the purpose of building levees.

Captain Eads is a distinguished member of the Mississippi River commission, and his very able statement, (the honorable Senator objects to its being called a report,) which was published in the speech of my colleague, certainly shows the great advantage of the levee system to the work of channel improvement and may have some influence in the country, even when opposed to the results of the great experience of the honorable Senator.

Major Harrod, of Louisiana, is a member of the river commission and is an accomplished and experienced engineer. I find in the New Orleans Picayune of the 16th the following answers of Major Harrod to a reporter of that paper, showing that he too believes that levees are essential to the improvement of the navigation of the river:

Question. Do you regard levees as absolutely necessary for the purpose of carrying out the plans of the commission to improve navigation?

Major H. I think levees are essential to the improvement and even the maintenance of the navigation of the river. The data derived from the observations of the commission have strengthened the opinion I originally held on this subject, and I think the results obtained this year will satisfy every one of the absolute necessity for levees to carry out the objects of the bill organizing the commission.

Question. In case that a million, or say two millions, are available for levee purposes this year, at what points will the work of constructing levees begin?

Major H. This question must be decided by the commission. As for my individual views, I suppose it would be good policy to close recent gaps, so as to maintain the present condition of affairs. Afterward the older gaps could be closed, but under any circumstances it will be essential for the riparian States to maintain their levee organizations. The prompt action of Mississippi in this regard is very commendable. The closing of gaps will be effected by levees, all of a higher grade than those previously standing. It will be necessary for the States to raise the grades of levees remaining to the height that this flood shows is required to restrain the water.

In short, Mr. President, I am informed that such is the testimony of all of the members of the commission, as given recently before a committee of Congress, which testimony is unfortunately not yet printed. Major Suter signed, with Major Harrod, the report of the sub-committee on levees and outlets, to which I have previously referred.

The honorable Senator lays much stress upon the language used by the commission, that levees "are regarded as a desirable, though not a necessary adjunct in the general system of improvement submitted," and he seemed to derive much comfort from its frequent repetition. If they are a "desirable" adjunct, why should they not be built, even if not absolutely necessary? Why should the commission be restrained from using this desirable mode of improvement, which certainly must be superior to the bare requirements of necessity?

The honorable Senator furnished an answer. It pervaded his speech. Because the levees thus built may afford incidental protection to the alluvial lands; because they may save a fertile and cultivated country from inundation and destruction. These are sufficient reasons with the honorable Senator why the "desirable" adjunct should give way to bare necessity.

I trust reasons of such a narrow character may not prevail with the Senate.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to present again to the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 3548) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, which, with the amendments, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations yesterday. I now report it back, and move that the Senate insist on its amendment, and agree to the request of the House of Representatives for a new conference. I wish to say in connection with the motion that if the Senate shall adopt it, the committee of conference on the part of the Senate will construe it as practically an instruction to adhere to the former action of the Senate in making an addition to the appropriation for special mail facilities. I make this statement now, so that if there be any dissent from the proposition it may be expressed. The conferees on the part of the Senate, as well as the Committee on Appropriations, desire to know what the view of the Senate is, after the discussion yesterday, upon the proposition upon which practically the conferees of the two Houses have divided

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope the Senate will insist upon its amendments. It is a question I think of considerable importance. As is well known to all Senators who have given thought to the subject, there is now appropriated annually $500,000 to expedite mail facilities, or in other words to run fast trains over different railroads in the country. As that appropriation has heretofore been distributed, it is almost entirely given to railroads starting from New York, while the rest of the country gets very little. Of the $500,000 allowed heretofore to aid mail facilities I believe three-fourths are distributed from New York. On some roads probably $50,000 is given to a single division, while other cities both West and South and in the Middle States are entirely without increased mail facilities, or if they have them they must pay the bills themselves in some form or other. Such a distribution is unfair and unjust.

I think I may say that the Committee on Appropriations would not have recommended to the Senate the $500,000 given by the House had it not been with the understanding that there should be a redistribution and a more equitable division of the money throughout the whole country instead of giving it to one city, as is now done. A train leaves New York this morning or this evening; it does not make any difference; another leaves Baltimore; and by the payment of the Government the New York train overtakes the Baltimore train a few hundred miles south of us here, and then the two mails go together, practically giving an advantage to New York over her sister cities in the Southern and Middle States of two hundred miles, and the Government paying for it.

As I stated yesterday, the distribution is now made so that not one cent is allowed to the cities of Baltimore and Washington in any form. Not a train aided by the Government in any way leaves either of those cities, when in fact, as stated by the superintendent of the railway mail-service, a train leaving New York in the evening and coming by way of Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington is the fastest train to all the southwestern cities that we have; yet that train is running without aid from the Government while other trains which are making the same time and go in other directions get the bulk of the $500,000.

The Committee on Appropriations added $150,000 to the appropriation of the House, making it $650,000, with the distinct understanding, as I believe, and as I think the rest of the committee will bear me out in stating, that there should be a more just and equitable division to the whole country, to the Northwest and Southwest and to the South, and especially to the Middle States, where there is nothing now paid.

I hope the motion of the Senator from Kansas will be agreed to by the Senate; and while we of course cannot instruct the conferees, the committee ought to consider that the Senate means to insist upon its amendment or strike the whole thing out, and let us all be on a par.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the Senate insist on its amendments and grant the further conference asked by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

The Chair being authorized, by unanimous consent, to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, Mr. PLUMB, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. BECK were appointed.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I ask consent to make a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5804) to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese, to report it with amendments. I wish to say that the report is that of a majority of the committee, and is not a unanimous report, the chairman of the committee having reserved the right to support or oppose amendments which may be offered. I give notice that I shall ask to take up the bill to-morrow at two o'clock.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. GROOME, it was Ordered, That John Hogan have leave to withdraw his papers from the files of the Senate, upon the condition imposed by the rule.

MISSISSIPPI AND MISSOURI RIVERS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1572) for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to submit some remarks to the Senate on the amendment which I have offered to the bill; but if any Senator wishes to speak in opposition either to the amendment or to the bill, or both, I prefer that he should do so; if not, I will proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, on the 8th of last month I introduced a bill, and had it referred to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River, for the purpose of repairing, rebuilding, and keeping in repair the levees upon the Mississippi River. The committee, after full and proper deliberation upon the subject, and also upon a kindred bill introduced by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] reported them both back with a substitute, which substitute is now the subject-matter of consideration before the Senate. In substance the substitute appropriates $6,000,000, $1,000,000 of which is to the Missouri River, and $5,000,000 to the Mississippi, to be used by the Mississippi River commission in the improvement of the navigation of those rivers, but with a prohibition contained in the nature of a proviso against the use of any of the fund for the purpose of building levees, unless those levees are necessary to the bettering or improving of the navigation of the river.

When that bill came in from the committee I gave notice of an amendment which I afterward submitted, which, briefly stated, increases the general appropriation from $6,000,000 to $15,000,000, applying $2,000,000 of the amount to the Missouri River and $13,000,000 to the Mississippi, and submitting the entire appropriation to the disposal of the Mississippi River commission according to the dictates of their best judgment, to be used by them under the act of June, 1879, which created that board. My first impression was to insist in the Senate upon the bill I had originally introduced looking to the building of the levees specifically, but in deference to the mature opinion of the committee, which is composed of experienced gentlemen, and gentlemen who have considered this subject before, I have deemed it best to insist upon a general appropriation for the purposes for which the board of commission was brought into existence, and submit my own opinions to the existing law on the subject of the improvement of the Mississippi River.

I was in hope that if our Mississippi River Improvement Committee, so called, did not approve the levee system specifically, they would at least have limited their appropriation under the law which created the board of commission and not put in obnoxious restrictions upon it so far as the disbursement of the money was concerned in the hands of the commission.

The Senate now I hope understands the amendment and its purpose. It is to appropriate this sum to be disbursed by the Mississippi River commission as they see proper from their observation and experience in the discharge of the duties assigned to them under the law which created them. There can be no reasonable objection of this idea attaching to the expenditure of the money, because if there is, the law which created the board should be repealed at once, or it should be modified, for we have a general law directing the commission to make surveys, to investigate all the different subjects looking to the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River, and to report such plan as in their judgment they think should be reported. In the law the different plans are specified—the jetties, the levees, the outlet, and all other plans that have been mentioned by man at any time.

The inquiry then necessarily is, why put this restriction upon the expenditure of any of this money, because section 4 of the law which I have here upon my desk, and the following section 5, impose as one of the duties upon the commission that they shall report upon the feasibility, the advisability, and the practicability of the levee system, or any other plan? I desire some member of the committee to make an explanation on that point. When the direction was given to the commission in one way, why do you slap them in the face by putting this restrictive provision upon the bill, and say, "Notwithstanding you may consider the levee system as a necessary adjunct, yet you must not use any of this money for the improvement of the Mississippi unless in your judgment it is absolutely necessary for the navigation of the river?" That is a suggestion which I desire to have answered, for the law is without restriction on the part of the commission to examine into the various projects and make their report. They have made their report. I shall not detain the Senate by referring to it again, because what I omitted to refer to when I introduced the bill in regard to levees has been amply supplied by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. JONAS,] who but a few moments ago addressed the Senate. However, I will call the attention of the Senate to one paragraph in the report which the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HARRISON,] when he had the report before him yesterday, or the extracts from it, probably on account of not seeing it, failed to cite the attention of the Senate to. Upon page 11 the commission say——

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator will allow me, it is the last report of the commission, the report of 1881, from which he is about to read?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes, sir; the report of the commission of 1881, referring to the previous report, from which the Senator from Indiana read yesterday. What I now read is copied from the previous report. This is a material point, and if the Senate wants to hear anything at all in reference to this matter, I beg that it will pay attention to the paragraph I read. Says the commission on page 11 of the report of November 11, 1881:

> There is reason to believe that during the period when levees were in their most perfect condition, from 1850 to 1858—

The time that they were in their "most perfect condition"—

> the channel of the river was better, generally, for purposes of navigation than it has been since that time.

If this be true, and it must be assumed to be true, we can appeal with the utmost good faith and the utmost confidence to the Senate and to the Congress of the United States, and say, "Help us restore those levees that are broken, and your navigation of the Mississippi River will be better than it is at present." The argument of the Senator from Indiana is answered in that one paragraph. Take it in its most restrictive sense, take it that you could not improve these lands, or that you could not make these levees save and only for the purpose of navigation, there is the complete answer to it. The Senator admits that you can take snags from the Mississippi River; the Senator admits that you can cut trees which fall across into the river; and yet, with the report of the commission before him, the Senator denies that it is necessary to make levees in order to improve or better the navigation of the Mississippi River. Then follows what I need not read; the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] having read it.

Mr. HARRISON. Would the Senator be interrupted if I should ask him a question just at that point?

Mr. GARLAND. I would not be interrupted in the least.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not desire to inconvenience the Senator in his argument. The statement which he has read is that in the opinion of the commission, upon the information which they have obtained, in a certain period, I believe from 1850 to 1858, the navigation of the river was in a substantially good condition, and at that period the levees were at the best. I ask the Senator whether in his judgment or whether the commission there say that in their judgment the single coincidence of the levees at a given time and a better navigation at that time, without considering any of the other changes that have affected the navigation of the river, is sufficient evidence that levees are essential to navigation?

Mr. GARLAND. I think it is most indisputably. There is no trouble in answering that question at all, because this statement is either a foolish thing or it was meant to convey just that idea.

> There is reason to believe—

> that during the period when levees were in their most perfect condition, from 1850 to 1858, the channel of the river was better, generally, for purposes of navigation than it has been since that time.

Then it has been since the time that these levees were not in their best condition, because we know that within a few years after 1858 the levees with everything else in the Southern country fell. This statement is corroborated and bolstered up by an after-statement made by the commission, which has been read by the Senator from Louisiana. They say the levee system not only improves the navigation of the river, but also the commercial and the postal service of the United States.

The question recurs all the time, and it has been suggested once or twice, why this talk for the special improvement of the Mississippi River, why this demand constantly for a special appropriation? Lest I might not be believed, or might be discredited, I will read to show the necessity that existed a long time ago for this improvement; and if it existed a long time since, it exists now in tenfold and a hundredfold proportion. I will read from an author who was State-rights and strict-construction enough even for the Senator from Indiana, or the Senator from Maine, or any other Senator, or any other man. I read from the report of Mr. Calhoun, made in 1846, upon this very subject, when he was examining into it and when his mind was directed specifically to the very question that we are talking about here, the improvement of the Mississippi River in every conceivable shape. I find this language in his report made to the Senate June 26, 1846:

> Of these several objects, the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi, including its great navigable tributaries, is by far the most important, and has accordingly received their particular attention. That great stream is the channel through which, by the aid of steam, cheap and speedy transit and intercourse are effected, not only between all parts of its immense valley, but also between it and the rest of the Union and the commercial world. And to this cheap and speedy transit and intercourse are to be attributed, even more than to its fertile soil and great resources, its almost miraculous increase in population, wealth, and improvement. So great have they been, that what sixty years ago was one vast region, with little exception, of forest and prairies, over which a few hundred thousand savages wandered, has now a population but little less than nine millions, with great and flourishing cities, abounding in opulence, refined in manners, and possessed of all the comforts and even elegance of old and polished communities.
> But, as great as this increase and improvement have been, they are nothing compared to what may be expected in the next sixty years.

It is thirty-six years since that report was made. The prophecies of John C. Calhoun at that time, which follow on here in his estimates, have been more than realized twice over. They have been more than substantiated as sound and unbending and stern and rigid facts in thirty-six years, although he gave sixty years. He says further on:

> Great changes have since occurred. We have acquired the entire valley of the Mississippi, and have the exclusive control of its commerce. What was then an almost uninhabited wilderness now contains nearly one-half of the population of the whole Union, many great and flourishing States. Its commerce, then of small amount, and carried on in frail boats of small tonnage, and impelled by a power too weak to ascend its stream, now rivals that of the coast in amount, the cost and size of the vessels by which transported, cheapness of freight, rapidity of transit, and the force by which they are impelled—a force so great as to completely overcome its turbid and rapid current. It has done more. It has so intimately united the navigation of the river and the Gulf that vessels navigating the one may the other, so as to pass and repass to and from each other in one continuous voyage, just as if (for all practical purposes) the Mississippi was a part of the Gulf or an inland sea.

That is why we speak in reference to the improvement of the Mississippi River and ask that it be taken out of the category, out of the list of improvements on other rivers in this country. As Mr. Jefferson said, in his celebrated argument in defense of himself as President for seizing the Batture at New Orleans at the suit of Livingston, (to be found in the ninth volume of Jefferson's works,) there was no river on earth like it. He was another strict constructionist, and he preached the doctrine strong enough for the Senator from Indiana, or the Senator from Maine, or any other man. He said in that document, which is a text-book now, I believe, in all schools on this subject, that the king or sovereign, whatever you may call him, owned the navigable waters, the bed, the beach, and the banks of the river; and when he purchased the Mississippi River he purchased all; he did not purchase merely the bed of the river; and though there are riparian owners, yet they cannot own the land upon the bank and use it to obstruct navigation, for the purpose of obstructing commerce, for that is one of the principles of sovereignty which is never surrendered to anybody or by any government. Mr. Calhoun continues in his report:

In consequence of these great changes, the reasons which influenced the framers of the Constitution to delegate to Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States are now as applicable to the States bordering on the Mississippi and its great tributaries as—

What? Hear:

As it was then to those bordering on the Atlantic coast.

That is what makes this an exceptional case. We ask to make this appropriation amount to something. We ask to have an appropriation made that will do the work, so that we shall not be coming back to Congress year after year and from time to time to have the appropriations renewed. I wish to show from the river and harbor act which I have now in my hand that taking the appropriations adopted in the last river and harbor act, if they are samples, (and I voted for them; I believe them just and fair and right,) the civilized kingdoms of the world have not money enough, they have not credit enough to raise money to appropriate to the Mississippi River. Let me commence:

Improving Wabash River, Indiana, $50,000.

Improving White River, Indiana, from Wabash River to Portersville, and to falls on West Fork, $20,000.

If that is a sample, a thousand millions of dollars ought to be voted without the wink of an eye to the Mississippi River. Here are appropriations for the Raritan River, the Delaware River, the French Broad River; the Kanawha River, Bayou Bartholomew in Arkansas, of $8,000, $10,000, $15,000, and $20,000. If this is a sample, I say the Government of the United States has not money enough to make sufficient appropriations for this river, or credit enough to raise it. We propose now to eliminate the Mississippi River from the river and harbor bill, and make it, as Mr. Calhoun calls it, a specialty, an exception, and appropriate sufficient to do that work.

Now let me read something which is a little instructive upon this subject. In 1828 we commenced appropriating money to take the raft out of the Red River. The debates at that time show that the friends of that measure insisted that $50,000 would be more than ample to do the work. In May, 1828, $25,000 was appropriated. Congress went on then regularly every year making an appropriation, sometimes $50,000, sometimes $60,000, sometimes $75,000, $80,000, and so on, until by March 3, 1875, $833,137.50 had been appropriated; money enough to have bought a Red River, if there had been one for sale; money enough to have dug a Red River; and yet, according to the report from which I shall read directly, the raft is still there, and the Government is making annual expenditures in still completing the removal of that raft. The first appropriation was made three years after the decision in the case of The Thomas Jefferson, in 10 Wheaton, which limited the admiralty jurisdiction to the ebb and flow of the tide, and sixteen years before the case of the Genessee Chief, in 12 Howard, was decided, which overthrew the decision in the case of The Thomas Jefferson, in 10 Wheaton, and said the jurisdiction existed wherever there was navigation, regardless of the ebb and flow of the tide. This is a part of the instructive lessons of the past. What does the report say in regard to the Red River improvement? I read from Appendix P, in the report of Benyaurd, on removing the raft in Red River:

This work is for the maintenance of an open channel in Red River above Shreveport, formerly entirely blocked by the Red River raft, and the original project embraced the entire removal of this great obstruction.

There is now a good navigable channel through the raft region at all seasons of the year, though it is liable to be temporarily blocked during the flood stages of the river.

* * * * * * *

Three large rafts which entirely blocked the river, and eighty-three side jams, and one hundred and ninety-three snags were removed.

* * * * * * *

Closing Tone's Bayou, Louisiana: The object of this work is to close Tone's Bayou, which now takes away from Red River fully three-fourths of its volume to the injury of the low-water navigation of that stream. The original project embraced the entire closure of the bayou.

The amount expended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, was $5,452.12.

During the coming season it is proposed to build Tone's Bayou Dam, and employ the steamer Florence in keeping the river open during the flood season, and in removing certain portions of the old raft.

With the appropriation of $18,000 asked for, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, it is proposed to keep the river open and remove the old raft.

Then they go on and make estimates for this work to remove the Red River raft. We are now on the very same work, probably but a little more removed than we were in 1828, when the first appropriation was made, and the cry is still for more with the coming and going of each year to remove that raft. We are asked now by this committee to appropriate just enough for the Mississippi River to assure us at the end of a year, when another high water may come, how fruitless, how useless these small expenditures are.

Here is an instructive lesson. I can find many more items if it is necessary. I am told that the commission say that this is enough. The commission made their report in November, 1881, before this flood came; and when they go back upon this river and look upon the work that has been done there, and survey the ground again, they will never know that they have been upon that ground before. The late unprecedented flood has made new presentations; it has left new marks and new evidences there for the commission to consider since their report in November, 1881, was presented to Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Arkansas allow me to ask him whether the sum mentioned in the bill as reported by the committee is not the total amount asked by the Mississippi River commission, including the sum called for in their last suggestion?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes; that is probably true; but what I am saying now is that, whether it be an addition or not, we have evidences before us that the sum is not sufficient. It may do to run to the end of the fiscal year, but the end of the fiscal year may be the beginning of another period of distress. We want the work that they have surveyed completed as near as may be. We do not wish to go through with this business as the faithful Penelope, who would weave with her hands in the day and take it apart at night.

The commission will find their work undone, they will find their cloth unwoven, when they go to survey it. If this driblet of $5,000,000 is given now to restore the work, next year we shall have the lesson of removing the Red River raft repeated. It is economy to appropriate a sum sufficient, and I am rejoiced to see that the President has come in and said, "I will see you and go you better, even to twenty or thirty million dollars," as he has done in his communication, to which I will allude a little more fully after awhile. That is business. It is a day of joy to the country that the President, to use the language of the Senator from Indiana, has turned his face to the sun. He turned his face to the sun in his annual message when he failed to mention North or South or rebellion, and now he is walking full-eyed right toward the sun to meet it, when he asks that that part of the country may be restored which was ravaged and the people conquered, if you please. He asks that it may be restored to the Union. He has risen above the idea of rebellion. Mr. Lincoln said to his band after he had taken Lee's sword, "Play us Dixie, we have captured that too; it is ours also." He was not like the Senator from Indiana, afraid of shadows; he could hear that song played which had stirred men to battle and caused valorous hearts to kill his comrades. So President Arthur is not afraid of any scarecrow of the rebellion, and is willing to restore that country, ravaged by the rebellion, if you please.

So much now for this driblet system, this economy of the Senator from Indiana, that would save at the spigot and lose at the bunghole. Is it economy to ask us to dribble on here from time to time with a little appropriation as though we were clearing out a duck-pond or a catfish-pond in Arkansas?

The Senator from Indiana reported a resolution for the benefit of the sufferers on account of the flood, and supported it, I was glad to see. Where did he get his constitutional authority for that? Under what clause of the Constitution did he derive any authority to do that? I introduced another resolution, and was glad to see him support it. If you can relieve people from their suffering on account of the want of levees, can you not build levees to prevent that suffering in the future? The statement answers itself.

In 1874 we appropriated for the sufferers from the Mississippi overflow in the neighborhood of $500,000. For what purpose? To relieve them from overflows brought upon them on account of the want of levees. At the present Congress we have voted $350,000 for the same purpose, making in the neighborhood of $800,000 in the two years. In the course of time, at this rate we shall have expended more than enough to levee the river from head to foot. Yet Senators talk about the constitutional authority to make this big appropriation, when year after year we are called upon to do what we would not have to do if the levees were built, if the navigation were improved by an appropriation sufficient at once to be done with it. I repeat, if we could do that which we all voted we can do the other thing, because the one is but the consequence of the failure to do the other.

I wish now to call attention to the President's message which was laid before the Senate yesterday. It is such good reading that I am going to read it all. It is refreshing when a paper can at last come into the Congress of the United States upon this subject without mentioning war, rebellion, negro, scalawag, or any of those terms that lie back almost in the dim antechambers of the past. The President says:

I transmit herewith a letter dated the 29th ultimo, from the Secretary of War, inclosing copy of a communication from the Mississippi River commission, in which the commission recommends that an appropriation may be made of $1,010,000 for "closing existing gaps in levees," in addition to the like sum for which an estimate has already been submitted.

The subject is one of such importance that I deem it proper to recommend early and favorable consideration of the recommendations of the commission.

He does not transmit the letter with any milk-and-cider statement that he refers it to the better judgment of Congress, but he recommends "an early and a favorable consideration" of the appropriation.

Having possession of—

Yes; they whipped us, and they have got it—and jurisdiction—

Yes; as the Supreme Court has decided repeatedly—over the river, Congress, with a view of improving its navigation and protecting the people of the valley from floods—

"The people of the valley," not merely the navigation of the Mississippi River, but the people of the valley, the people who live upon its banks. Why? Because they are citizens of this country. If they fought for what they honestly believed to be right they have been overcome, and they have quit. Here is a great man standing now at the head of the Republican party who says so, and whether either House of Congress allows it or not the country will applaud it to the echo. Congress—has for years caused surveys of the river to be made, for the purpose of acquiring knowledge of the laws that control it, and of its phenomena. By act approved June 28, 1879, the Mississippi River commission was created, composed of able engineers. Section 4 of the act provides—

And that is recited in the very words given in my amendment, to submit the disbursement of the appropriation to the commission.

The constitutionality of a law making appropriations in aid of these objects cannot be questioned.

What objects? Levees. He differs from the Senator from Indiana; he differs toto cœlo, longo vallo with the Senator from Indiana. He is said, outside of being President of the United States, to have been a tolerably good lawyer in the city of New York, where they do have good lawyers.

While the report of the commission submitted and the plans proposed for the river's improvement seem justified as well on scientific principles as by experience and the approval of the people most interested, I desire to leave it to the judgment of Congress to decide upon the best plan for the permanent and complete improvement of the navigation of the river and for the protection of the valley.

The immense losses and widespread suffering of the people dwelling near the river induce me to urge upon Congress the propriety of not only making an appropriation to close the gaps in the levees occasioned by the recent floods, as recommended by the commission, but that Congress should inaugurate measures for the permanent improvement of the navigation of the river and security of the valley.

Not for the navigation of the river entirely, but the "security of the valley."

It may be that such a system of improvement would as it progressed require the appropriation of twenty or thirty millions of dollars.

Amen! says the President.

Even such an expenditure, extending as it must over several years, cannot be regarded as extravagant in view of the immense interest involved. The safe and convenient navigation of the Mississippi is a matter of concern to all sections of the country, but to the Northwest—

The Senator from Indiana has heard that expression "the Northwest" before—with its immense harvests, needing cheap transportation to the sea, and to the inhabitants of the river valley, whose lives and property depend upon the proper construction of the safeguards which protect them from the floods—

Not navigation merely, but to protect the people of the valley—

it is of vital importance that a well-matured and comprehensive plan for improvement should be put into operation with as little delay as possible. The cotton product of the region subject to the devastating floods is a source of wealth to the nation and of great importance to keeping the balances of trade in our favor.

There is the argument. Now further:

It may not be inopportune to mention that this Government has imposed—

Senators, I desire you to hear this. "Time, at last, makes all things even;" no question of that—

It may not be inopportune to mention that this Government has imposed and collected some seventy millions of dollars by a tax on cotton, in the production of which the population of the Lower Mississippi is largely engaged, and it does not seem inequitable to return a portion of this tax to those who contributed it, particularly as such an action will also result in an important gain to the country at large, and especially so to the great and rich States of the Northwest and the Mississippi Valley.

That is the message of the President which came in yesterday. A case was made in your town, Mr. President, [Mr. HARRIS in the chair,] the case of Rolfe vs. Saunders, to test the constitutionality of the cotton tax. The court below decided that it was valid and constitutional. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court and the decision was affirmed by a divided court—four to four. The country at large, or a great portion of it, believed the tax to be unconstitutional. It is not for me to say whether it was or not, and I do not care for the purpose of this argument what my opinion may be about that; but the Supreme Court was divided upon it and no opinion was ever published. The decision of the court below in the district of West Tennessee stood.

Now, we have from the Treasury Department a statement of that fund. Making allowance for amounts refunded on account of erroneous collections and as taxes collected on rope and bagging, the total not exceeding $72,000,000, the amount paid into the Treasury as internal-revenue tax on cotton is $68,000,000. That tax may have been levied as a necessity for governmental purposes, or it may have been levied for punitive purposes to punish the rebellion. I know not, and I care not; but here is the amount of money remaining in the Treasury that a large amount of people, a great number of people, the best cultured people in the country, believe was illegally put there. We ask you to restore to us one-fourth of that, a mere pittance, only $15,000,000 to be restored to the valley of the Mississippi, and the valley of the Mississippi cannot be redeemed without it. With that, the valley of the Mississippi can be redeemed for the benefit of mankind.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that if he puts the application for aid in the construction of the levees on the ground that an unlawful tax was collected upon cotton, would it not be best to reach that question directly by a bill to restore to all of those who were unlawfully taxed the amount taken from them, rather than to make use of this argument in favor of an appropriation for levees.

Mr. GARLAND. I do not make the appeal on account of the unconstitutionality of the tax, because the Senator must not misunderstand me. I do not say it was illegal; I make the appeal upon the direct right and law and justice and morals and common sense and conscience; I appeal upon the ground of the tax to show this, and nothing else, that the money is there in the Treasury, received from this great valley, and we ask you simply to give a part of it back. It cannot be any injury to the Government. I am showing the capacity and ability of the Government to do this without suffering. I have given you the language of the President of the United States to guide me in that; he speaks of it, and he talks on this subject wisely. There are $68,000,000 in the Treasury, collected from the tax on cotton. Give us a mere pittance of one-fourth of it to engage in this great work, as the President says. I ask for but $15,000,000; he speaks of twenty or thirty millions. We are entitled to it, as the President says in his message. I do not ask it because the tax is illegal; I say no such thing. I will vouch for one thing, however, that if that much is voted to the people of the Mississippi Valley there will be no clamor for the restoration of the proceeds of the cotton tax. The people who are interested in the improvement of this river and its navigation will be satisfied.

The Senator from Indiana yesterday stated that it was a somewhat extraordinary argument that I should insist that the swamp-land grant had anything whatever to do with this matter. Now, if I do not show from the language of the law and from as good authority as can be found that it has something to do with it, you can spit in my face and call me a hawk or anything else. The act of March 2, 1849, "An act to aid the State of Louisiana in draining the swamp lands therein," grants the swamp and overflowed lands in Louisiana—

To aid the State of Louisiana in constructing the necessary levees and drains to reclaim the swamp and overflowed lands therein.

It is not to improve the navigation of the Mississippi River. And then it is provided:

That the proceeds of said land shall be applied exclusively, as far as necessary, to the construction of the levees and drains aforesaid.

That is in 9 Statutes at Large, page 352. They go on at page 519 and make the grant to the State of Arkansas and all the other States for the same purpose, and put the same restriction that the proceeds of the sale must be devoted to the leveeing and draining of the lands. In this same report of Mr. Calhoun, made in 1846, from which I have already read, he says:

As fertile as this great body of land is, by far the greater part is at present of little or no value in consequence of its swampy character and being subject to inundation, and must remain so, alike unprofitable to the public and individuals, so long as they may remain in their present condition.

But they must remain so until reclaimed—

By what?

by embankments. To meet the expense of making them the convention recommends—the grant of lands or appropriation of money by Congress.

That is, the Memphis convention—

Your committee are of the opinion that something ought to be done toward bringing this great body of fertile land into cultivation.

"Your committee," speaking through Mr. Calhoun, think something ought to be done to bring this great body of land into cultivation. The report he was making was on the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River.

While it remains in its present state, with one—and that the larger—portion held by the Union, another (that granted for schools and other purposes) by the States, and a third by individuals, and these several portions not held in parcels or bodies separate and distinct from each other but intermixed one with the other, nothing can well be done toward reclaiming them.

Reclaiming the lands.

It would require the co-operation of the parties interested, each in proportion to the extent of his interest, to accomplish the object. To obtain such co-operation and fix satisfactorily the amount that each should contribute toward making the necessary embankments would obviously be a work of too much difficulty and complication to be undertaken. The only remedy is to diminish the number of the parties interested; and for that purpose your committee are of the opinion that Congress ought to adopt measures to dispose of its portion of these lands, with as little delay as a just regard to the public interests will permit. And to effect that they are of the opinion the most advisable cause would be to reduce the price of the portion belonging to the public gradually, say at the rate of one-fifth at intervals of four years, until it shall be reduced to the rate of 25 cents an acre, and to cede to the States in which they may respectively lie all not sold at the expiration of four years thereafter.

This report was what gave birth at last to the acts of 1849 and 1850; and yet the Senator from Indiana says Congress has got nothing to do with reclaiming those lands. Why, the great head-light of strict construction said we had. He made his report, he analyzed the Constitution from A to Z on this subject, and here is what he says in reference to it——

Mr. HARRISON. Allow me to ask the Senator under what clause of the Constitution, or did Mr. Calhoun refer to any specific clause?

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Calhoun referred specifically to the clause empowering Congress to regulate commerce between the States, and to do those things needful for the welfare and protection of the people of the Mississippi Valley. Now, if the Congress of the United States can give the States land to redeem the overflowed and swamp land, can it not give money for that purpose? If she could give land held in the Land Office for a dollar and a quarter per acre, could she not give a dollar and a quarter in money? It does not need any person skilled in arithmetic or constitutional lore to answer that question. So said Mr. Calhoun.

Mr. HARRISON. Then do I understand the Senator from Arkansas to express the opinion as a lawyer that it is within the constitutional power of Congress to appropriate money to drain the swamp-lands that remain in Indiana undrained?

Mr. GARLAND. I do most indisputably, and I hope the Senator is satisfied with the answer.

Mr. HARRISON. I am, of course. It is very frank.

Mr. GARLAND. Because the great head-light of the school of politics to which the Senator from Indiana seems to belong said they could. I never belonged to that school. I never belonged to the school of strict construction of the Constitution. I have belonged to that school that always fought for a sensible construction of that instrument, and there is a sensible construction reached by Mr. Calhoun. If you can give land, why can you not give money? A man then could not buy the land at the Land Office of the United States for less than a dollar and a quarter an acre. If you could give 50,000 acres of land, could you not give so much money as was equivalent to the price of the land? There is no difficulty about the question. The argument is made in this report, much of which I cannot take time to read, though it would be interesting and instructive.

Now, does the Senator from Indiana suppose the argument is a light one or a trivial one that the grant of swamp lands expressly to redeem this land by drains and levees has something to do with the question before us? I accept the proposition and meet the Senator right there. I am as willing to accommodate him on this as it is possible for anybody to do. The argument was made before I came to the Senate. There is a sensible construction reached by Mr. Calhoun at that time, reached by Congress in its acts of 1849 and 1850, and reached by the present Executive to-day. And in this connection let me say of him that he is the first President since the war who has not in his annual message referred to "the North and South" and made sectional allusions.

Mr. MAXEY. May I ask the Senator from Arkansas, in the line of his argument, if by reason of the improvement made by Congress at the mouth of the river the outflow of water has been obstructed whereby the danger of flood has been increased above and the land has been overflowed, has not Congress the right to repair the effect of its own act?

Mr. GARLAND. Most unquestionably, and I am very glad the Senator from Texas has made the suggestion.

Mr. HARRISON. In that connection, shall I understand the Senator from Texas to suggest that the improvements of Captain Eads at the mouth of the river have increased the flood-line above? If so, the Senators will be found crossing the path of that distinguished engineer upon whom they have relied so much in this argument.

Mr. MAXEY. I have only to state that a great many very good engineers do believe that that has been the effect. I do not say whether it has been or not.

Mr. GARLAND. If it has, the question of the Senator from Texas is very applicable and worthy of consideration, and I hope it will be considered. But without regard to that there are ample reasons furnished by the commission, and reasons furnished by the commission when the Senator from Indiana was one of it; whether he agreed with it or not I do not know. Many of us in the Senate have been over the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers. I have traveled the Mississippi River at all hours of the day and night in skiffs and canoes, but I have never been at the mouth of the Mississippi. I cannot speak from personal observation of the effect of the jetties there.

I want now to take all the chances there are under the report of the commission. I want to do what old Ben Hardin did when he expected to die and sent for all the preachers. One of them said to him: "You have had a Catholic priest; you have had a Presbyterian minister; you have had a Methodist parson; I am a Campbellite. What do you mean by it?" "Well," said Hardin, "Mr. Preacher, I am on my last legs, and about to go, they tell me; and I have heard that heaven is a very good place to go to, a desirable place to go to, and I want to take all the chances of getting there." Now, I do not care whether it be true or not that the jetties have helped to cause this overflow of the Mississippi River; but under this report I want to take all the chances. Let the commission expend the money as they see proper, a commission that the Senator from Indiana once honored, a commission that makes its reports here annually. I want them to come up to the grand line laid down by the President to-day if it takes twenty or thirty millions. Let us do it and be done with it, make it complete.

I heard on the floor some Senator say that he was for levying a tariff for protection's sake, for protection per se; that it was a good thing to have, constitutional or unconstitutional. If you can protect the shoe-shops and the hide-shops and the woolen-shops for protection's sake, can you not protect this wonderful country for protection's sake? Can you not reach out an arm and protect this wonderful country, the parallel of which, as Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Calhoun following him stated, does not exist? Can you not protect the people of the Mississippi Valley from overflow, from disaster, from destruction, from ruin?

Mr. President, I have on my table letters that would draw tears of blood from the hearts of men if they were read, relative to the disastrous scenes which have accompanied the overflow that has come upon the country. Since the commission made their very valuable report in 1881 new light on the subject has come up. We live to learn, and let us not cast aside any advantage. We are poor; we may be poorer on account of our own mismanagement and on account of our own faults and mistakes, but we are poor. The States cannot build these levees as they did in 1858; the States cannot improve the river; and this commission says that one system in Mississippi, one in Louisiana, one in Arkansas, and one in Tennessee, all differing, is very little better than no system at all. What is needed is one uniform system, one compact system, under the same authority, and the United States is that authority under the Constitution to do it; she is capable of doing it and she is only asked to give back one-fourth of the $68,000,000 received as tax on cotton for that purpose. That completes the job, and it is enough. We vote railroad grants here to States lavishly; we build canals for people and ask no questions; and here is a small sum of $15,000,000 asked for this wonderful river with all the commerce floating on its bosom every year.

The necessity no one disputes. The only question is what amount shall be voted. The commission asks, and the President indorses it, $2,020,000 for levees especially. Give us an appropriation sufficient to do this work under the judgment of the commission; that is all I ask. Let them disburse it as they think proper, whether for levees, outlets, jetties, or what not.

As a matter of course if the $15,000,000 amendment fails, I shall support the bill as it is, for I shall take whatever I can get; but from the past experience, let us not do it piecemeal, let us go at it manfully as if we meant something, and eliminate the Mississippi River from the river and harbor bill. I am no enemy of river and harbor bills. I have voted for every one since I have been in the Senate and expect to vote for the rest of them. I know nothing the Government can do better for its credit than to contribute a part of its money to improve the navigable waters needed by those who pay its taxes. I beg Senators who object to this to come now and take a patriotic and magnanimous view of this whole subject. We are not working for to-day; we are not working for one section of the country; we are working for all time and we are working for all the peoples of the earth. I want no sectional ideas to be interposed. I vote for your Wabash, for your Delaware, and for your inlets and outlets and all those things that the Government is working on all over the country.

If there has been anything of a sectional feeling put into this debate or into this inquiry, I regret it. I have not done it; in that every one will bear me out. I ask the Senator from Indiana to say, when he comes to look at this question a little more, if he cannot relieve some of the rigid, of the unbending features of his speech when he said that we were limited alone and solely to the improvement of this river as affecting the navigation. I think I have shown that even under that restriction we have the authority under the Constitution and under the precedents which I cited to do this work. Events move rapidly. It is only thirty-six years since Mr. Calhoun made a prophecy which he thought it would take sixty years to fulfill, and it is more than fulfilled now. The life of man is short, and events come thick and fast, and hurry on. In ten years from this day, if this appropriation is not made or something equivalent to it, my prediction is that the Congress of the United States will vote $50,000,000 as cheerfully as they would vote $5,000,000 now.

Mr. President, there is a crying, there is an urgent necessity for this work. Abide by the law as it is, and let the commission disburse the money. That is my view of the subject. I have spoken without reservation, and I regret having detained the Senate as long as I have.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] in the course of his remarks asked a question of members of the committee which I wish to answer. He called attention to the law creating this commission, and stated that the purposes of the commission were defined by Congress with a full understanding, and that they were "to improve, give safety and ease to the navigation of the river, prevent destructive floods, promote and facilitate commerce, trade, and the postal service," and then asked the committee where they found the authority to make an appropriation to be expended by that commission for the improvement of the navigation alone.

Mr. President, as I read that law—and I speak as a member of the committee—there were two duties assigned that commission, one to report a plan for the prevention of destructive overflows, and the other a plan for the improvement of the navigation of the river; that these two were distinct; and I cannot see for the life of me why it was not in the power of the committee and in their discretion to determine whether the money appropriated in this bill should be expended on the one or the other object.

Now, sir, I wish to inquire of the Senator from Arkansas if he gives to the words "promote and facilitate commerce, trade, and the postal service" any significance beyond the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River?

Mr. GARLAND. Does the Senator ask for an answer now?

Mr. FRYE. I do.

Mr. GARLAND. Most certainly I do; and the Senator will bear in mind that when I made my speech on the levees specifically during last month, I read from the report of the commission to show wherein it did benefit the postal service of the country outside of the mere matter of navigation or commerce. The language of the report was quoted in my speech at the time.

Mr. FRYE. Then, if I understand the Senator, there were three duties assigned the committee; one to improve the river for navigation, another to improve it for postal purposes, another to prevent destructive overflows; and yet the Senator cannot see how the committee had a right to make an appropriation of $6,000,000, and then call upon this commission to expend that $6,000,000 in improving the navigation, thus selecting the use of one of the three powers which were conferred upon the commission by law.

Mr. President, I had one single purpose. I recognize the importance of the Mississippi River; I recognize its importance in the control of the railroads of this country. There has been great discussion, almost boundless, here for the last ten years over the question of the regulation of railroads, their freights, &c. A score of propositions have been made, reported from committees, for the control of the railroads by commissions. Sir, I hold that the only regulation possible and practicable is water competition. You may start to-day from New Orleans for my own State, and the lowest freights and fares between New Orleans and the city of Portland are after you reach Boston, where we have constant communication by water. I believe that is due to the communication by water, which is continuous through the year.

Now, if there was no other purpose to be served I would vote to appropriate all the money necessary to improve the navigation of the Mississippi River that it might exercise to a certain extent a control over the railroads of this country. Why, sir, the canals and the lakes between the West and the East have an immense effect upon the freights carried between those sections.

Having that idea in my mind, I was willing to vote any amount of money that, in my judgment, could be economically expended in one year for the improvement of the navigation of this great river. The Senator complains that we have not appropriated enough for that purpose; and yet the commission having all three purposes in view, as the Senator said, to prevent overflow, to increase postal facilities, and to improve navigation, have only recommended $6,000,000, the exact amount which we have appropriated in this bill for expenditure this year, and this includes a supplementary report which has been made since the flood and after these gentlemen had secured all the information in their power touching the effect of the flood upon the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers.

Has the Senator a right to complain of the committee as to the amount of the appropriation? I say again that the committee appropriated first $5,000,000, and then when the supplementary report of the commission came in they adopted that and appropriated every dollar that the commission recommended for any purpose, whether it be improvement of the river in navigation, or repairing breaks in the levees, or improving the postal facilities. They appropriated every dollar that was asked by the commission, only they limited them in its expenditure to the improvement of navigation.

Mr. President, if any gentlemen know what that river requires, if any gentlemen understand how much money is needed this year, and how much can be economically expended; surely those are the gentlemen to whom the Senator is willing to intrust this whole question, and complains because we have not shown like confidence but have placed limits upon their discretion. Surely no complaint can be made that they have not recognized all the necessities, and have not asked for all the money which it is the duty of this Congress to grant at their asking. And yet their plans, according to the Senator from Arkansas, included three great projects or purposes, and we have given them this money to be expended on one. Is this reasonable?

Mr. President, the Senator compliments the President of the United States, and I am delighted to hear it, because I have great confidence in the President myself. I call his attention to what the President did say. He did not say in this message or intimate that we should appropriate fifteen, or twenty, or thirty million dollars to be expended this fiscal year. The President did say that you ought to appropriate enough money for the purpose, even though in the progress of years it took twenty or thirty million dollars. Why, sir, the Senator from Arkansas proposes to take $15,000,000 of that this very year.

Now, I contend respectfully that no commission can expend the $15,000,000 in one year on the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers with any degree of economy or prudence. I contend that it is not in the power of the commission to do it, and I do not believe that a single commissioner would come before any committee of Congress and say that, in his opinion, $15,000,000 could be expended economically on the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers in one fiscal year. I know it was the opinion of a majority of the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River and its Tributaries that $6,000,000 imposed a heavy task on that commission in economical expenditure and effective work in one fiscal year. I do not think the Senator from Arkansas has reason to complain of that committee as to the amount of the appropriation.

Now, sir, a word as to the limitation; I do not announce any opinions of the committee in what I say now, and I do not raise any constitutional question, and I do not reply to the statement of the gentleman, that protectionists per se sometimes ask great things of the people of the country which are not allowable under the Constitution. I have no discussion touching it whatever; but I do myself believe that if the United States once enters upon building levees on the Mississippi River, $20,000,000, or $30,000,000, or $100,000,000 will not be the ultimate limit to which they will be compelled to go. I see no reason whatever in the rebellion, or in the condition of the South before the rebellion, or in the result of the rebellion, or in the overflow which the Almighty has sent down upon the Mississippi River this last year, under which the people have suffered so terribly—I see nothing in any of these which gives me the slightest reason for appropriating the money of the United States to recover or protect the lands of Mississippi and Louisiana and Arkansas, or any other State up or down the Mississippi or Missouri Rivers.

I do not believe that the Congress of the United States would be justified in making any appropriation for that purpose, and I never heard from any other section any request made for an appropriation of money for any such purpose. I believed when I authorized by my vote so far as I could this commission to make use of $6,000,000, that they would improve the levees on the Mississippi River, and that it would be impossible to make that expenditure without improving those levees. I do not believe you can improve the navigation of the Mississippi in any way without improving the banks of the river. Surely, if you lower the channel, if you increase the current, if you narrow the limits of the river, and thus compel it by erosion to lower itself in its bed, you are hardening and raising and building levees and banks every inch and every part of an inch that the river settles.

Now, sir, I am delighted that, in improving the navigation of the river, Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, and the other States on the Mississippi River can receive benefit to their lands; that the people owning the farms there can be benefited. I make no complaint of that whatever. The committee provided that this money should be expended by this commission; how? The Senator from Arkansas says there is a limitation; the Senator from Louisana says there is a limitation. There is no more limitation in this bill than there would be if the amendment which the Senator from Louisiana proposes should be adopted. The only difference would be that adopting his amendment would be an invitation to the commission to expend money for the purpose of improving the levees; adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas and you compel the commission to expend money for the improvement of the levees and the recovery of the lands; adopt the bill which this committee have reported, and you authorize the commission to go on and expend $6,000,000 according to their plan.

The only limitation is that they shall not expend the money for the purpose of repairing the banks to prevent overflow, nor for the purpose of building levees to recover land, but they shall build levees, they shall repair breaks, they shall repair banks, they shall do whatever they say in their report and according to their plan and according to their specifications will improve the navigation of the Mississippi River. I do not see why any gentleman can ask for more than that unless he asks for more money. The judgment of the committee was that $6,000,000 was enough; and in arriving at this conclusion they were assisted by the recommendations of the commission.

I do not think that the North or the East is entitled to any taunt for being niggardly about making appropriations for the South, or for any other section of the country. I can say for New England that you cannot point to an instance where improvements have been called for in the West, or in the South, or anywhere else in this country, where her representatives have not responded by affirmative votes. The record will show that for the last twenty years New England has had the hardihood, if it required any, to vote for the largest appropriations for improvements in the great West and in the South, for improvements of the great rivers now under discussion. And, sir, that the taunt should come to us that we are niggardly in our appropriations for the South, and that it is because the South was once in rebellion!

Several SENATORS. Oh, no.

Mr. FRYE. I so understood it.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator is mistaken if he attributes any such observation to me. I expressly disavow anything of this sort, because I know the Senator, and everybody else from the North I may say, has been extremely kind and liberal in these things. It is because he has been so just in that respect that I want to have him go on in that direction.

Mr. FRYE. I will refrain from saying what I was proposing to say, and instead will say that the South will ultimately understand the feeling of the North. I think they are getting to understand it now. I have never seen a day or an hour since the war closed that southern gentlemen would not have been received in any city, in any town, in any hamlet in New England with open arms, and I defy any Senator from the South who has been in the North to point to an instance where every courtesy has not been extended, even beyond the courtesies that would have been extended to our own.

Why, sir, even during the heat of that mad war, there was an underlying feeling of profound admiration for the manhood and the bravery, the endurance and the determination exhibited by the South in fighting for what they believed to be their rights. We did have bitter feelings in the North against men, not against men in the South, but in our North, in the Democratic party, men who were daily defying and decrying the armies of the Union in their attempts to save the country, and glorying in successes at the South, men sympathizing against their own and for you. We did hate those men with a bitter, deep, abiding hatred, but never was there the slightest evidence of that feeling toward the men of the South who were in arms for what they believed to be right. We hated their cause, their purposes, and their mad attempt. To-day when the South appeals to us for aid against the scourge of yellow fever, do we hesitate?

Our men and women take their lives in their hand and go down there to fight the deadly scourge for the good of man; and when floods come and you appeal to us, do you find us refusing an answer? Eight hundred thousand dollars in this very Congress, and not a voice raised against it nor a thought felt against it by the members of Congress from the North. Sir, we are glad to do it; not for the South; it is time there was no South; we are glad to do for our countrymen anywhere, North, South, East, or West, what we believe to be for their good, the upbuilding of their country, and the glory of their nation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.]

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me a moment? I understand he desires to speak upon this bill; and as it is late in the day, if it be agreeable to him, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, so that the Senator may have the floor for to-morrow.

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I submit several amendments to this bill which I ask to have printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendments will be printed.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and forty-eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 19, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

FREMONT, ELK HORN VALLEY AND MISSOURI RIVER RAILROAD.

Mr. VALENTINE. Mr. Speaker, I move by unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2997) granting right of way to the Fremont, Elk Horn Valley and Missouri River Railroad Company across the Niobrara military reservation, in the State of Nebraska, and authorizing the sale of a portion of said reservation, in order that it may be taken up and passed at this time.

Mr. ATKINS. Does it grant any land?

Mr. VALENTINE. It permits the sale of forty acres for depot purposes, and is recommended by all the Departments of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the regular order of business.

PRESIDENT GARFIELD'S SICKNESS, ETC.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of submitting a privileged report from the select committee to audit all claims for services and expenses growing out of the illness and burial of the late President James A. Garfield. I am directed to report back, as a substitute for House bill No. 1227, a bill (H. R. No. 5889) for the relief of Lucretia R. Garfield, and to move that the bill and report, together with the views of the minority, be printed. I also give notice that, at the proper time, I shall call the bill up for consideration. In the mean time, I ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that the bill and report, together with the views of the minority, be printed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is impossible to hear what the gentleman from Ohio is saying.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio submits from the select committee to audit all claims for services and expenses growing out of the illness and burial of the late President James A. Garfield a substitute for the bill referred to that committee, and moves that the substitute and the report, together with the views of the minority, be printed; and he gives notice that at an early day he will endeavor to call the subject up for consideration and action.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Before submitting the views of the minority, I desire to ask whether the chairman of the committee will indicate now when it will be his wish to call the matter up for consideration?

Mr. TAYLOR. I cannot. But I will say this to the gentleman, that it will only be when the gentleman is present.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is all I ask.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to say in this connection, Mr. Speaker, that I wish all points of order reserved upon it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I submit the views of the minority of the committee, and ask that the same order be made as to this that is made with reference to the majority report, and ask to reserve all points of order upon the bill as reported.

The SPEAKER. The report of the committee, and the views of the minority, as well as the substitute of the gentleman from Ohio for the bill, will be ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The bill was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JOYCE. I desire to ask consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bills reported from the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay be made a special order for Thursday, May 11, after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, not to antagonize general appropriation and revenue bills.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to reserve all existing orders. If this special order is entered upon it will prevent the consideration of the bill of the gentleman from Massachussetts [Mr. CRAPO] and that of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE,]——

The SPEAKER. Under the practice it would necessarily have to give way to all prior orders.

Mr. SPRINGER. But it could antagonize them. If, however, they are excepted from the operation of this resolution, then, of course, the question of consideration cannot be raised against them; otherwise that question could be raised as to which special order the House would consider.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Vermont accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, that the resolution shall be modified so as not to antagonize prior orders?

Mr. REAGAN. I object.

Mr. JOYCE. I think I will accept that modification.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Texas as objecting to present consideration.

Mr. CALKINS. Then I call for the regular order. I want to say that there are five hours' debate yet to take place on this contested-election case, and in order to get it out of the way to-day we must proceed with its consideration. Therefore, let us have the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the privileged question, the contested-election case under consideration on yesterday.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does that take precedence of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It does. It comes up as the unfinished business this morning.

Mr. SPRINGER. Under the rules does the unfinished business take precedence of the morning hour, or is it not to be taken up after the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. This comes up before the morning hour. It did on yesterday and has been so held.

Mr. BUCKNER. Is that only applicable to privileged questions, or does it relate to any other question?

The SPEAKER. To privileged questions merely.

Mr. BUCKNER. Then, as I understand it, privileged questions do take precedence of the morning hour, but that would not be true of any other than a privileged question?

The SPEAKER. Certainly not.

Mr. HOOKER. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will give way for a moment to enable me to submit a report from a committee.

Mr. CALKINS. I would be very glad to yield to the gentleman, but I have refused the same courtesy to others, and I think it important to proceed at once with the contested-election case.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 1045) to accept and ratify an agreement with the Crow Indians for the sale of a portion of their reservation in the Territory of Montana required for the use of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same; and a bill (S. No. 1598) to authorize the Secretary of War to donate to the Ladies' Soldiers' Monument Association of Portsmouth, Ohio, four condemned cannon.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 4466) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883; in which bills and amendments the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

UTAH CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Mr. Speaker, this important contest is fortunately free from all partisan considerations, and will therefore be determined upon its merits and the plain principles of right. The election out of which it arises was held on November 2, 1880, for the choice of a Delegate from the Territory of Utah. The returns, which were duly filed with the secretary of the Territory, were opened and canvassed by him in the presence of the governor of the Territory on December 14, 1880. The canvass of the votes, which was concluded on January 8, 1881, showed that George Q. Cannon received 18,568 votes, and Allen G. Campbell received 1,357 votes. The law provides that the person having the highest number of votes shall be declared by the governor to be elected. The governor, however, in the mistaken belief that he had the right to go behind the returns, heard evidence and arguments to show that Mr. Cannon was an alien and polygamist, and on these grounds, finding them, as he believed, sustained, declared Mr. Cannon ineligible and disqualified to serve as a Delegate. The governor further decided, under an erroneous view of the law, that, Mr. Cannon being ineligible, the votes cast for him were void, and Mr. Campbell, being a citizen and eligible, and having received the next highest number of votes, was elected. The governor accordingly gave Mr. Campbell a certificate of election, and filed among the records of the Territory, in the office of the secretary thereof, an elaborate opinion containing a full statement of the facts. The secretary of the Territory, on January 10, 1881, gave Mr. Cannon a certified copy of the opinion and declaration of the governor, and also, on January 20, 1881, gave him a certified abstract of all the returns.

Mr. Cannon notified Mr. Campbell, on February 4, 1881, that he would contest his seat on the ground that he, Cannon, had received a large majority of the votes cast. On February 24, 1881, Mr. Campbell replied to Mr. Cannon's notice that he was not elected, and if elected, was disqualified by reason of his alienage and polygamy. No testimony was taken by Mr. Cannon in support of his notice during the time allowed to him by law but on May 9, 1881, and subsequently thereto, testimony was taken by Mr. Campbell to show that Mr. Cannon was a polygamist and an unnaturalized alien, and by Mr. Cannon, in reply, to show his citizenship.

The certificates held by Mr. Cannon and Mr. Campbell, and all the papers and testimony in the case, were placed in the custody of the Clerk of the Forty-sixth Congress, and by him were handed over to his successor at the organization of the Forty-seventh Congress.

When the Forty-seventh Congress was organized and the Delegates from the Territories were called to be sworn, objection was made to both Mr. Campbell and Mr. Cannon, and neither was admitted. After a full discussion of the question as to which of the two gentlemen had the prima facie right to the seat, it was resolved by the House on January 13, 1882—

That the papers in relation to the right to a seat as a Delegate from the Territory of Utah be referred to the Committee on Elections, with instructions to report, at as early a day as practicable, as to the prima facie right or the final right of the claimants to the seat, as the committee shall deem proper.

This resolution clearly made the case a special one and took it out of the regular order under which cases go to the Committee on Elections under the law and the standing rule of the House. Both the prima facie and final rights were argued by the parties before the committee, but it would not be proper to prolong the contest by dividing and reporting on the prima facie title when the committee are ready to pass upon the final right and thereby dispose of the case.

WERE THE CERTIFIED RETURNS EVIDENCE?

The first question which was presented for the determination of the committee was, Are the certified copies of the returns of the election from all the counties in the Territory evidence?

During the thirty days allowed Mr. Cannon under the law for taking testimony in support of his notice of contest he declined to take any testimony, but attached to his notice copies of all the returns of election from all the counties in the Territory filed in the office of the secretary of the Territory, under the seal of said office. He also subsequently, after the time had expired for taking testimony by him in chief, filed with the Clerk of the House certified copies of the same returns, and they are now printed in the RECORD and are before the committee as part of the papers in the case.

The counsel for Mr. Campbell, the contestee, objected to these copies, and stopped on the threshold of the argument before the committee, and asked to have the contest dismissed for the reason that Mr. Cannon had not offered any competent testimony to sustain his case. I am of the opinion that these certified copies are evidence, for several reasons:

First. The returns are made to and filed with the secretary of the Territory, in conformity to law, and as a part of the records of his office. They are compiled by the clerks of the several counties from the precinct returns, and are sent to the secretary of the Territory under the provisions of a well guarded election law. They are, therefore, records of the secretary's office, upon which the important rights of the people to representation depend, and can be certified for the purposes of evidence as any other record.

Second. The election was held, the canvass was made, the result declared, and the certificates issued, under sections 21 and 22 of the Territorial act of 1878, and section 1862 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. This is very clearly recognized by the governor all through his opinion, and in the certificate which he issued to Mr. Campbell. This being so, the governor had only the right to declare who was elected, and the secretary had the right to certify the declaration. The certificate of the governor was, therefore, without authority of law. The certificate of the secretary of the Territory, which gives the whole declaration of the result by the governor, when the returns were opened and canvassed in his presence, by said secretary, is the legal certificate. This certificate clearly gives Mr. Cannon the prima facie right to the seat, and the copies of the returns, which were filed at the same time with the certificate, corroborate that right. They are a part of the title, which for the further consideration of the case is good enough without them until it is assailed by testimony going to the legality and number of the votes cast. No such testimony was given.

WHO WAS ELECTED?

This brings us to the consideration of the second inquiry: Who was elected and returned by the people?

This question I will not take time to discuss. I am satisfied clearly and beyond all doubt that Mr. Cannon received a very large majority of the votes cast in conformity to the laws of the Territory, and was duly elected and returned. I desire to emphasize this point for the reason that I will not consent that the questions of election and return shall ever be determined by anything but the honest majority of votes cast. I do not believe that anything but votes can elect, and that the permanence of representative government depends more upon faithfully observing and respecting this principle than anything else. This disposes of the claim of Mr. Campbell that he was elected and returned, although he only received a small minority of the votes cast. The doctrine that when the majority candidate is ineligible or disqualified the minority candidate, being qualified, is elected, is utterly repudiated in almost all the States of this Union and by the uniform decisions of Congress. Under no circumstances, therefore, has Mr. Campbell any claim or title to be seated in this contest.

IS MR. CANNON A CITIZEN?

Having concluded that Mr. Cannon was elected and returned, there remain the questions: First, is he disqualified because he is an alien? Second, is he disqualified because he is an open and avowed polygamist?

I have given the subject of Mr. Cannon's citizenship careful examination, and have concluded that, under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Campbell vs. Gordon, 6 Cranch, 176, the certificate of naturalization held by him is valid. It is in strict conformity to the spirit and policy of our Government to give a very liberal construction to the laws and regulations governing naturalizations. We are a nation whose progress and prosperity are largely built upon the emigration and absorption of the millions of people who have come and will continue to come to us from foreign lands. A learned judge has justly said:

If every naturalized citizen must always be prepared with his proofs to maintain the grounds upon which he obtained his papers in all courts and places in which they may be brought into question, the boon of citizenship, which is so liberally bestowed, would be barely worth possessing.

WHAT IS POLYGAMY?

We come, then, to the great controlling question in the contest: Is Mr. Cannon disqualified to sit as a Delegate from the Territory of Utah because he is a polygamist?

What is polygamy? What are its characteristics, doctrines, and practices, and how does it affect its followers and adherents in their relations and loyalty to the Government?

We can give the most correct and compendious answers to these inquiries by quoting from the majority report of the Committee on Elections, made in the Fortieth Congress, in the contested-election case of McGrorty vs. Hooper. The committee went into the subject elaborately and took testimony from every source which was within their reach. They say:

That by reason of polygamy in Utah great crimes have been committed and have been let go unwhipped of justice. Open violation of the authority of this Government has frequently occurred. The sanctity of the ermine has been profaned, the course of justice obstructed. Organized assassination has been frequently perpetrated.

The revelations of the seer have a higher authority than the laws of Congress. The sermons of the Mormon apostles have an edifying effect in Salt Lake City quite equal in the opinion of their followers to those of certain preachers in the cities of the East, and of more weight than a judicial decision. Intolerance, wrangling, violence, and polygamy have marred the administration of our laws in Utah and have weakened the authority of the United States. Why?

Because the organic law of the Territory does not remedy the evils local and peculiar to Utah, thereby leaving the dominion and control of the Territory and its resources completely in the hands of the hierarchy of the Mormon society.

Because the monopoly of wealth and power in the Territory is to a great extent in the hands of the Mormon leaders, excluding competition from the so-called Gentiles, i. e., citizens of the United States not members of the Mormon society; the preference being by custom given to a Mormon whenever competition is likely to injure the Mormon interest.

Polygamy prevails in spite of express laws of the United States, in open outrage of every sacred family tie, controlling the social organization of the community, and shaming the sense of propriety so long and well established among all races of Europeans on this continent. No officer of the United States, civil or military, can hope to exert any salutary influence over this society while polygamy is allowed in defiance of his authority, and against the law of the Government he represents.

Polygamy must be abolished in all this Territory, or the power of this Government will be held in contempt by every class of inhabitants. Through its influence a social ban is put on all Christian women who remain true to the laws and customs of their country, and the precepts of their faith.

Isolated from all other influences than their own peculiar customs and prejudices, the Mormon population are not amenable to the arguments usually applied to enlighten or reform mankind. A revelation from the seer or a strong inducement to migrate seem the only easy remedies. Polygamy is synonymous with bigamy. Bigamy is, under our law, a crime, and polygamy is a monstrous bigamy. Under the Mormon organization it seems to threaten to become incest. The intermarriage of the leading families have made the usual definitions fixing relationship very complex, if not impossible, under the laws of the United States.

To the Mormons such definitions of polygamy and its developments are perhaps harsh, but your committee use only the definitions established among and by the people of the United States by common law and common decency. The instances of incest among the Mormons are taken from the printed works on the customs of that society, and your committee refer to them for the reliability of the statement. There seems to your committee, however, abundant proof of licentious practices under the law regulating marriages in Utah to call for vigorous enforcements of the existing law of Congress on the subject of polygamy. A conflict between monogamy and polygamy has been inaugurated in defiance of our laws by the Mormons themselves.

And this licentious custom of marriage or reckless abuse of that sacred rite is one of the most glaring and practical proofs of the aggressive and dangerous character of a system which grows at the will or in obedience to the lust of a political ruler styling himself a prophet.

Toleration of religious views is a holy duty enforced on Congress by the Constitution, but no law does or can exist which permits toleration of a practice hostile to the safety of society. Such a practice may be introduced by the best and highest human authority, but whether under the name of prophet, priest, or king it matters not, so long as the practice introduced be against established law of the land or fatal to the welfare of the state.

There are other practices under the hierarchy of Utah which militates, in the opinion of your committee, against the principles of good republican government. But the origin of all these existing evils, and the certain source of innumerable future evils in Utah, is in the prophetic power of the head of the society which rules there. The union of Church and State, the combined sanctity of the voice of God and the will of the people, arm the chosen ruler of that organization with spiritual and temporal power.

Has that power been hostile to the Government of the United States? Your committee believe that it is, and has been hostile rather from the inherent spirit of its creation than from any design on the part of that people.

The Secretary of War, in his report of December 1857, says:

"The Territory of Utah is peopled almost exclusively by the religious sect known as Mormons. They have substituted for the laws of the land a theocracy having for its head an individual whom they profess to believe a prophet of God. This prophet demands obedience, and receives it implicitly from his people, in virtue of what he assures them to be authority derived from revelations received by him from Heaven.

"Whenever he finds it convenient to exercise any special command, these opportune revelations of a higher law come to his aid. From his decrees there is no appeal; against his will there is no resistance.

"From the first hour they fixed themselves in that remote and almost inaccessible region of our territory from which they are now sending defiance to the sovereign power, their whole plan has been to prepare for a successful secession from the authority of the United States and a permanent establishment of their own."

On the 13th of February, 1863, Senator Wade, in a report submitted to the Senate of the United States in reference to Utah affairs, used the following language:

"The customs which have prevailed in all our Territories in the government of public affairs have had but little toleration in the Territory of Utah; but in their stead there appears to be, overriding all other influences, a sort of Jewish theocracy, graduated to the condition of that Territory. This theocracy having a supreme head who governs and guides every affair of importance in the church, and practically in the Territory, is the only real power acknowledged here, and to the extension of whose interests every person in the Territory must directly or indirectly conduce. We have here the first exhibition, within the limits of the United States, of a Church ruling the State." (Thirty-seventh Congress, third session, Rep. Com., No. 87.)

In January, 1866, certain resolutions were referred to the Committee on the Territories of the House of Representatives, instructing them to "inquire and ascertain what means, civil or military, might lawfully be resorted to to effectually eradicate the evil of polygamy from the land, what legislation was needed for that purpose, and why the law against polygamy was not enforced;" also, a resolution instructing the same committee to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill providing for the repeal of the law organizing the Territory of Utah, and for dividing said Territory and attaching a portion thereof to the State of Nevada, and the residue to the Territories contiguous to Utah.

That committee, through Hon. J. M. Ashley, chairman, reported July 23, 1866, that they were unable to agree upon any plan which seemed to them to promise a practical solution of the abuses and evils complained of, and which were admitted to exist. They postponed the further consideration of the matter and reported the testimony.

The committee state that "the testimony discloses the fact that the laws of the United States are openly and defiantly violated throughout the Territory, and that an armed force is necessary to preserve the peace and give security to the lives and property of citizens of the United States residing therein." (H. Rep. No. 96, Thirty-ninth Congress, first session.)

Express statute passed July, 1862, (12 Stat. at L., 501, 502,) provides suitable penalties for the violation of the law against polygamy. Have the people of Utah obeyed this statute.

Did this community then submit to that law and obey it? Or have they since persistently lived in its open violation? Polygamy has alarmingly increased since the passage of the law. Brigham Young himself was one of the first to violate it, publicly espousing another wife on the 29th of January, 1863.

In the summer of 1863 Judge Drake, upon the hearing of a habeas corpus case, ordered that a girl who had been inveigled into a "plural" marriage with a Mormon bishop should be returned to the custody of her mother, and the marshal was ordered to execute the decree. But the people seized the girl as she was passing out of the court-house, bore her off in triumph, and delivered her to the bishop.

Judge Drake tells us that "since the commencement of 1865 polygamy has increased at least 100 per cent. throughout the Territory. Previous to the year 1863 this doctrine or practice was not generally held to be a religious necessity, but merely a tolerance to be indulged in by those who desired it. It is now held to be a cardinal point. That and the shedding of the blood of apostates to save their souls are the two soul-saving doctrines of the Mormon faith." (Statement of Hon. Thomas J. Drake, H. Mis. Doc. No. 35, second session Fortieth Congress, pages 9, 10.)

The question then arises, shall a community be represented in the Congress of the United States who are thus living in open violation of a law passed for the protection of the highest interests of society and of the state?

We have thus considered the question in reference to polygamy generally, without referring specially to those obscene and disgusting practices which are in this case concomitants. Incest in its various forms and under various names is practiced and encouraged.

The marriage of a man with the mother and her daughters indiscriminately and marriage with a half-sister are permitted. William Hepworth Dixon says that Brigham Young admitted to him in conversation that he saw no objection to the marriage of brother and sister. But he spoke for himself only, as he thought the church was not yet prepared for so strong a doctrine. (New America, by William Hepworth Dixon, page 216.)

By reference to a sermon preached by Young April 8, 1853, and reported in the Deseret News, volume 3, No. 12, it will be seen that he thought it (the church) prepared for another doctrine equally strong—the marriage of a mother with her own son.

Such are the doctrines and practices which are sought to be established and incorporated into the frame-work of society in the heart of this continent. Is it not time that the representative of this corrupt, licentious, this tyrannical, traitorous, and bloody priesthood shall be sent back to his constituents with instructions to abandon their unwarrantable assumptions of temporal power, obey the laws, and remodel their government so that it shall conform to the spirit of our free institutions?

Mr. MOULTON, who makes the minority report in this case, testifies to the same effect in his speech on polygamy, wherein he says:

The teachings and practice of polygamy are unnatural and in conflict with the physical and moral laws. Its effect upon the community in which it exists is its worst commentary. It dwarfs, separates, and isolates its devotees practically from the rest of the world.

A creed, political or religious, that necessarily causes its followers to separate themselves from the rest of the community, to set up institutions inimical to the laws and Constitution under which they live, will always, sooner or later, produce conflict and disastrous consequences to the whole country.

The people on the American continent should be as near one people as possible. The real government of Utah is a sort of religious hierarchy.

The following facts, which are pertinent to the inquiry now in hand, are found from the foregoing extract:

1. Polygamy is the basis of a fanatical hierarchy which is antagonistic to our institutions and laws, and no one who is subject to it can be well disposed toward the Government of the United States.

2. It is a disgrace to our civilization and offensive to the moral sense of mankind.

3. It breeds open defiance of our laws, and renders a republican form of government impossible where it prevails.

4. It is hostile to civil society, and fatal to the welfare of the State.

IS MR. CANNON A POLYGAMIST?

We next inquire, Is Mr. Cannon a polygamist? That he is, in the fullest, broadest, and most complete sense, is proven by his own confession, over his own signature, in the following language:

In the matter of George Q. Cannon. Contest of Allen G. Campbell's right to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Forty-seventh Congress of the United States, as Delegate from the Territory of Utah:

I, George Q. Cannon, contestant, protesting that the matter in this paper contained is not relevant to the issue, do admit that I am a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, commonly called Mormons; that in accordance with the tenets of said church I have taken plural wives, who now live with me, and have so lived with me for a number of years, and borne me children. I also admit that in my public addresses as a teacher of my religion in Utah Territory I have defended said tenet of said church as being in my belief a revelation from God.

GEORGE Q. CANNON.

This paper was given by Mr. Cannon to prevent the contestee from going into the proof fully and squarely, which he proposed to do by calling witnesses who would have been compelled to disclose the facts. The paper was intended to be an unqualified surrender and agreement as to the fact of his being a polygamist in the broadest sense, and must be so considered. It therefore distinguishes this contest from all those that have preceded it in which this question of polygamy was raised. In the last contest which Mr. Cannon had with Mr. Maxwell, in the Forty-third Congress, (1874,) he denied most emphatically that he was "living with four wives or living or cohabiting with any wives in defiant or willful violation of the law of Congress of 1862." He denied that he was then "living, or had ever lived, in violation of the laws of God, man, his country, decency, or civilization, or of any law of the United States." These broad denials on the very issue which was the chief one involved in that contest doubtless had a great deal to do with the finding in Mr. Cannon's favor.

But in this contest we have not only no denial, but an open confession. We have a man knocking for admission at our doors who is a confessed preacher and practicer and apostle and defender of polygamy in its most odious form; who declares that he is a member of the Mormon Church; who, in obedience to the doctrines of that church, which he claims teach that it is right and righteous to marry more than one wife, has taken plural wives and lived and cohabited with them, and they have borne him children, and who has taught and teaches this doctrine as a revelation from God. The plain and unambiguous question now is whether such a man, under the law of the land and the customs and prerogatives of this House, is qualified to hold a seat as a Delegate from the Territory of Utah?

The Parliament of England, one of the greatest legislative bodies on the earth, has just expelled by an overwhelming vote a person who sought to hold a seat among its members because in the light of this Christian century he profanely avowed his disbelief in the existence of a God. This could not have been done in this Government, under whose Constitution "no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification for any office under the United States." But polygamy has been held by the Supreme Court of the nation not to be religion, but a crime.

Chief-Justice Waite, in delivering the unanimous opinion of the court in Reynolds vs. United States, after fully defining what is the religious freedom which has been guaranteed under the Constitution, says:

> Polygamy has always been odious among the northern and western nations of Europe, and, until the establishment of the Mormon Church, almost exclusively a feature of the life of Asiatic and African people. At common law the second marriage was always void, (2 Kent's Com., 79,) and from the earliest history of England polygamy has been treated as an offense against society. After the establishment of the ecclesiastical courts and until the time of James I, it was punished through the instrumentality of those tribunals, not merely because ecclesiastical rights had been violated, but because upon the separation of the ecclesiastical courts from the civil, the ecclesiastical were supposed to be the most appropriate for the trial of matrimonial causes and offenses against the rights of marriage, just as they were for testamentary causes and the settlement of the estates of deceased persons.
> By the statute of 1 James I, chapter 11, the offense, if committed in England or Wales, was made punishable in the civil courts, and the penalty was death. As this statute was limited in its operation to England and Wales, it was at a very early period re-enacted, generally, with some modifications, in all the colonies. In connection with the case we are now considering, it is a significant fact that, on the 8th of December, 1788, after the passage of the act establishing religious freedom, and after the convention of Virginia had recommended, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the declaration in a bill of rights that "all men have an equal, natural, and inalienable right to the free exercise of religion, according to the dictates of conscience," the Legislature of that State substantially enacted the statute of James I, death penalty included, because, as cited in the preamble, "it hath been doubted whether bigamy or polygamy be punishable by the laws of this Commonwealth." (12 Henning's Statute, 691.)
> From that day to this, we think it may be safely said, there never has been a time in any State of the Union when polygamy has not been an offense against society, cognizable by the civil courts, and punishable with more or less severity. In the face of all this evidence, it is impossible to believe that the constitutional guarantee of religious freedom was intended to prohibit legislation in respect to this most important feature of social life. Marriage, while from its very nature a sacred obligation, is nevertheless, in most civilized nations, a civil contract, and usually regulated by law. Upon it society may be said to be built, and out of its fruits spring social relations and social obligations and duties, with which government is necessarily required to deal. In fact, according as monogamous or polygamous marriages are allowed, do we find the principles on which the government of the people, to a greater or less extent, rests. Professor Lieber says polygamy leads to the patriarchal principle, and which, when applied to large communities, fetters the people in stationary despotism, while that principle cannot long exist in connection with monogamy. Chancellor Kent observes that this remark is equally striking and profound. (2 Kent's, Com., 81, note c.)

Under the facts and the law thus clearly laid down, will it be just for this the highest legislative tribunal of this great Christian Republic to admit to its membership one who openly and unblushingly charges God with inspiring and revealing and commanding to be preached and taught among men a doctrine not only of filth and lust, but of hostility to our Government and defiance to our laws; a doctrine which profanes and defies the pure and holy law which binds the families and forms thereby the great foundation of social virtue on which a free nation must rest; a doctrine which insults the sacred titles of mother and wife, and sister and daughter; a doctrine which ignores the mighty progress of mankind and defies the civilization and literature and philosophy which Christianity has brought to light among men?

WHAT QUALIFICATIONS MUST DELEGATES HAVE?

But notwithstanding that polygamy is an institution of the character we have stated, and that Mr. Cannon is its representative, it is contended that under the Constitution and law we have no right to refuse him a seat as Delegate from Utah. This leads us to inquire into the powers of Congress over the Territories, and how far this House has the right to prescribe qualifications for the admission of Delegates therefrom.

The only portion of the Constitution of the United States which refers to the Territories is Article IV, section 3, clause 2, which provides:

> The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

This clause of the fundamental law has received the most learned and elaborate consideration by the Supreme Court, in Scott vs. Sandford, (19 Howard 393, &c.,) wherein, after going fully into the whole history of the Territories from the time of the first cession to the Government, it is held that this clause—

> Applies only to territory within the chartered limits of some one of the States when they were colonies of Great Britain, and which was surrendered by the British Government to the old confederation of the States in the treaty of peace. It does not apply to territory acquired by the present Federal Government by treaty or conquest from a foreign nation.

To all other territory it is held that the Constitution does not extend, and cannot be extended by Congress, except in so far as Congress may enact the provisions of the Constitution into a part of the organic law of such territory. This has been done in regard to Utah: first, by the act of Congress which organized that Territory, and which provides that "the Constitution and laws of the United States are hereby extended over and declared to be in force in said Territory of Utah, so far as the same or any provision thereof may be applicable;" and second, by the Revised Statutes, section 1891, which provides, in somewhat different language, but of the same purport, that "the Constitution and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall," &c.

The Constitution and all the laws of the United States are, therefore, a part of the statute law of the Territory of Utah, so far as they are applicable locally to that Territory.

Now, what was the design of the framers of the Constitution in reference to the Territory which they provided for in the clause which we have quoted above? The history of the subject clearly shows that they intended to commit the unorganized Territories wholly to the discretion and unlimited power of Congress. This is so decided by the courts in all the cases in which the subject is considered; this was so held in Scott vs. Sandford, (supra,) and Judge Nelson, in Benner vs. Porter, 9 Howard, 235, says:

> They are not organized under the Constitution nor subject to its complex distribution of the powers of government or the organic law, but are the creatures exclusively of the legislative department, and subject to its supervision and control.

It is held by Judge Story that:

> The power of Congress over the public Territories is clearly exclusive and universal, and their legislation is subject to no control, but is absolute and unlimited, unless so far as it is affected by stipulations in the cessions, or by the ordinance of 1787, under which any part of it has been settled. (Story, Constitution, section 1328; Rowle, Constitution, page 237; 1 Kent's Commentaries, page 243.)

The Supreme Court of the United States, in a very recent case, says:

> The power is subject to no limitations. (Gibson vs. Chouteau, 13 Wall., 99.)

See also Stacey vs. Abbott (1 Am. Law, T. R. 84) where it is held by the supreme court of one of the Territories that they "are not organized under the Constitution; they are exclusively the creatures of Congress."

But there is something more shown by the history of the clause in the Constitution in reference to Territories and by the decisions of the courts thereon. It is clear from both these that it was never intended that the status of the Territories should in any respect approach so near the character and position of sovereign States as to require that whatever agents these Territories might be entitled to on the floor of Congress should have the status and qualifications of members of Congress. The Territories, in the minds of the framers of the Constitution, had none of the rights and attributes of the States.

From the commencement of the revolutionary war serious difficulties existed between the States in relation to the disposition of large and unsettled territories which were included in the chartered limits of some of the other States. Some of these States, and particularly Maryland, which had no unsettled lands, insisted that as these lands were wrested from Great Britain by the common endeavor and by the common expense and in a common cause, that the moneys arising therefrom ought to be applied in proper proportions between the States to pay the expenses of the common war, and not be used by the States within whose chartered limits they happened to be. These contentions were the source of great uneasiness to those who particularly desired the continuance and prosperity of the Union. The Confederate Congress, September 6, 1780, passed a resolution strongly urging the State to cede these lands to the Government for the purpose of maintaining peace and to secure the public credit in carrying on the war. On October 6, 1780, Congress passed another resolution, pledging itself that if these lands were ceded as requested by the September resolution, that they should be disposed of for the common benefit, and be settled and be formed into distinct republican States, which should become members of the Federal Union and have the same rights of sovereignty and independence and freedom as other States. These controversies in reference to the Territories continued down till 1784, when Virginia ceded the vast territory lying northwest of the Ohio River. The only object of the State in making this cession was to put an end to the threatening and dangerous controversy and to enable Congress to dispose of the lands and appropriate the proceeds as a common fund for the benefit of the States. This was the state of affairs when the Constitution of the United States was formed. It was necessary that the lands thus ceded should be sold to pay the common debt of the war, and that regulations should be made for their management and control until sold or otherwise disposed of. Besides these ceded Territories there were arms and munitions of war and various property which came to the United States from the several States. It was necessary then to provide for these in the new government about to be formed under the Federal Constitution, and the clause was inserted which gives Congress the power "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territories or other property belonging to the United States."

This provision had a plain, palpable, unmistakable purpose which was to provide for the sale and control of the Territories ceded to the United States by the States for the purpose of the cession.

The Chief-Justice, in Scott vs. Sandford, says in reference to this clause:

> It begins its enumeration of powers by that of disposing, in other words making sale, of the lands or raising money from them, which, as we have already said, was the main object of the cession, and which accordingly is the first thing provided for in the article. It then gives the power which was necessarily associated with the disposition and sale of the lands—that is, the power of making needful rules and regulations respecting the Territory. And whatever construction may now be given to these words, every one, we think, must admit that they are not the words usually employed by statesmen in giving supreme power of legislation.

It must not be forgotten, too, that Territorial representatives had been sent from these Territories while they yet belonged to the States; that a Territorial form of government had been expressly provided by the confederation under the ordinance of 1787, and that this act without any change or modification had been re-enacted in 1790 under the Federal Constitution by Congress. Territorial Delegates were therefore not unknown when the Constitution was framed. Why were they not mentioned? Why no qualifications fixed if they were to have any but such as Congress might see fit to provide? No other parts of the Constitution were made to apply to the Territories except the clause we have quoted. On the contrary, they were spoken of as property, and power was given to Congress to dispose of them as property, and to make all needful rules and regulations respecting them as other property of the United States. They were put in the same category with the other chattels of the Government. There is, therefore, nothing in the Constitution which will justify us in believing in the light of its history that the qualifications of agents who might be appointed to look after the interests of the Territories on the floor of Congress should be the same or even like those of members of Congress. This is so, we maintain, with regard even to that Territory over which the Constitution extends directly and immediately, because it was within the control of the Government at the time the Constitution was framed. If, therefore, the Constitution did not contemplate the requirement of such qualifications for Delegates as agents of the Territory within its immediate purview, with much less plausibility can it be contended that it should require them where it is only extended as a part of the statute law.

It is also important to observe the wide distinction which Congress has always made between the powers and status of a member of Congress and a Delegate from a Territory.

A member of Congress is sent by a State, by virtue of its irrefragible right to representation under the Constitution of the United States. This right Congress cannot abrogate or control or limit or modify in any way.

A Delegate is an agent of a Territory, sent under the authority or permission of an act of Congress. This right or permission is subject to the merest whim and caprice of Congress. It can be utterly wiped out or modified or changed just as Congress may see proper at any time.

A member of Congress must have certain qualifications under the Constitution.

A Delegate need have none but what Congress sees fit to provide.

A member of Congress is the representative and custodian of the political power and interests of a sovereign State, which is itself a factor and part of the Government.

A Delegate has no political power, but is only a business agent of the Territory for the purest business purposes. Chief-Justice Marshall, in discussing the power of Congress to govern the Territories, in Insurance Company vs. Carter, 1 Peters, 511, says, in reference to the people of Florida: "They do not, however, participate in political power; they do not share in the Government until Florida becomes a State; in the mean time Florida continues to be a Territory of the United States, governed by virtue of the clause in the Constitution." He has no right to vote or aid in shaping the policy of the Government in war or peace.

A member of Congress is an officer named in the Constitution of the United States, and contemplated and provided by the framers thereof at the time of the organization of the Government. He is a constitutional officer.

A Delegate is not a constitutional officer in the remotest sense. There were no Delegates mentioned or thought of by the framers of the Constitution.

A member of Congress is chosen under section 2, article 1, of the Constitution, which provides that—

> The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of the State in which he shall be chosen.

This specifically and definitely and indubitably fixes how and where and by whom members of Congress shall be chosen and what qualifications they must imperatively have. "No person shall be a Representative," &c., without these qualifications.

A Delegate is chosen under section 1862 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that—

> Every Territory shall have the right to send a Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States, to serve during each Congress, who shall be elected by the voters of the Territory qualified to elect members of the Legislative Assembly thereof. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be declared by the governor duly elected, and a certificate shall be given accordingly. Every such Delegate shall have a seat in the House of Representatives, with the right of debating but not of voting.

This fully and very clearly provides how Delegates shall be chosen and what power they shall have, but does not exact or provide any qualifications or hint at any. This is the same provision substantially which has been made for Delegates from 1787 down to this time. The provision in the act of July 13, 1787, for the government of the Northwest Territory, is that the joint assembly of that Territory "shall have authority, by joint ballot, to elect a Delegate to Congress, who shall have a seat in Congress with the right of debating, but not of voting."

These few marked points of distinction between the two offices not only show that the constitutional qualifications for Members do not apply to Delegates but that none of the legislation which has ever been enacted on the subject seems to have been founded on the belief that they did.

Mr. ATHERTON and Mr. JONES, with three other members of the Committee on Elections, urgently recommend the admission of a Delegate from the Territory of Alaska. In their report making this recommendation, they say:

> Its people ask protection and consideration, and to this end have elected and sent here a Delegate to represent them in this Congress and bring before Congress the wants of the Territory. He bears with him the credentials of election and a certificate that he was so elected, not bearing, it is true, the seal of a State, nor the signature of a governor. The people have neither; nor does the law require that he should present such a certificate. He is not a Representative but a Delegate, delegated by the inhabitants, who have been guaranteed the rights of all other citizens, and to his qualification to be so admitted this House is the sole and only judge. Congress has done so before, and in support of this, ever unwilling to deprive any people of their civil or political rights, and where these rights exist, although for a time suspended, there must be a remedy, and that remedy is with Congress. At the second session of the Third Congress, 1794, James White presented his credentials, claiming to be a Delegate from the territory south of the Ohio River, then not organized.

This Territory of Alaska is a vast, unorganized domain—a wilderness, without any of the most remote attempts at formal government. It has no census or other evidence of its resources or population. Yet these gentlemen who want to exact the qualifications of a member of Congress for a Delegate from Utah here use language and make a recommendation which shows that they go even further than any who have preceded them in holding that a Delegate is in no respect like a member of Congress, but is a mere agent and business factotum of a Territory. That Territory may, as has been held in very many cases, contain a mere handful of population. Alaska has only 129 white people and possibly 20,000 native savages. Dakota, when admitted as a Territory, had only 2,576 inhabitants. Nevada had very few more.

In White's case, 1 Clark & Hall, 85–91, referred to and relied upon in the Alaska case, it was decided that the right of the inhabitants of Territories entitled to elect Delegates is secured by compacts and ordinances of the United States and not by the Constitution, and that the rights and powers and duties of such Delegates from the Territories are so widely different from those of members of Congress that "the oath required of members of Congress cannot be exacted of them." Mr. Madison, who is presumed to have known something of the spirit and compass of the Federal Constitution, and Mr. Dayton and other distinguished gentlemen who debated that case, clearly held and showed that Delegates were in no possible respect constitutional officers. The whole debate in White's case, participated in by the men who made the Constitution and formulated the ordinances in reference to the Territories, shows more clearly than any present argument can what was regarded in that day as the status of Delegates from the Territories.

In Smith's case, 1 Bartlett, 112, it was decided that the admission of Delegates depends upon the will of Congress. Mr. Cartter, in his argument in that case, (p. 115,) says: "A Delegate from any Territory is not an officer provided for by the Constitution and when admitted to the floor discharges no constitutional duties."

HOW HAS CONGRESS REGARDED REGULATIONS PROVIDED FOR THE TERRITORIES?

Next let us inquire how Congress has regarded its own acts and the compacts and agreements between the Federal Government and the States in reference to the Territories. Let us look into the considerations which have governed the admission of States in the past. The States of Kentucky, Tennessee, Ohio, Indiana, Mississippi, Illinois, Alabama, Michigan, and Wisconsin were formed out of territory belonging to the original thirteen States; and the terms of their admission to the Union were largely determined by the provisions of the act of July 13, 1787, and of various compacts between the United States and the several State governments based upon the terms of that ordinance as the result of which the territory out of which they were severally constituted was relinquished to the General Government.

The ordinance referred to provided for the formation of the Territory, which should become the common possession of the Union, into States, to be laid out in accordance with the terms of the act, and to be admitted whenever they should have a free population of 60,000, or before their population reached this number, if deemed expedient by Congress. Among other notable features of this act were provisions for the establishment of two grades of Territorial government, the first to be under the administration of executive and judicial officers appointed by the President, and intended to continue until the condition of the Territory was such as to warrant the establishment of the second grade, which was provided for when the free male inhabitants should reach the number of 5,000, and was to be established by the election of a Legislative Assembly chosen by the qualified voters of the Territory.

The conditions and steps essential to the formation of new States, according to the terms of the ordinance of 1787, of the compacts with the various States relinquishing territory to the Union, of the treaty stipulations by which purchased territory was acquired, and of the laws of Congress passed in conformity with the articles of the Constitution adopted in 1787, may be briefly stated as follows: first, the determination of boundaries; second, proof that the population equals the number required by the ordinance of 1787, or the number necessary at the time to entitle the State seeking admission to a Representative in Congress, upon the basis of representation then existing; third, authority for the formation of a constitution and State government in accordance with provisions made by Congress under so-called enabling acts; fourth, the ratification of the constitution adopted in pursuance of the above provisions, by vote of the qualified citizens of the Territory; fifth, an act of Congress approving the steps taken under the enabling act, and formally recognizing the newly formed government as a State.

While the validity and expediency of these conditions have been recognized, they were almost wholly disregarded in the case of Tennessee, the Territory first admitted after the adoption of the ordinance of July 13, 1787, which came fully under its provisions; and, while some of the rules noted have been enforced, others have been equally ignored in connection with the admission of nearly all of the Territories subsequently formed into States. The people of Tennessee, whose Territory had formerly been under the jurisdiction of North Carolina, and whose boundaries were already defined, adopted a constitution and formed a State government in 1795, without authority of Congress, and in the following year, through its representatives, this self-constituted State demanded admission to the Union. Its claims were strenuously opposed by a minority in Congress, who demanded that, prior to the consideration of its claims for admission, it should be required to comply with the terms of the ordinance of 1787, and contended that to admit it at that time would be in disregard of the authority of Congress, and calculated to establish a dangerous precedent. These advocates of the maintenance of Congressional authority as alone competent for determining the conditions under which Territories shall be entitled to seek admission to the Union were overruled, having among their opponents Madison, Macon, Gallatin, and other eminent men. Mr. Dayton, one of the chief opponents of the bill, claimed that its enactment would be equivalent to an utter disregard of existing provisions, and as a renunciation by Congress of any right to deliberate as to the title of a Territory to admission. Mr. Madison said that the inhabitants of the Territory were at present in a degraded situation, deprived of rights essential to freemen—among others, that of representation in Congress; and that an exterior power had authority over their laws, something which could only be justified on the ground of obvious and imperious necessity. Mr. Macon, in answer to the objection that the State had been established in contravention of the provisions intended to govern the formation of new States, replied that but two conditions were essential. Was its government republican in form, and had it the necessary number of inhabitants? If so, its right to admission was indisputable.

Mr. Gallatin said that the people of the Territory became ipso facto a State the moment the population reached 60,000 free inhabitants, and that it became the duty of Congress to recognize their title to admission whenever it had satisfactory proof of this fact. The views of Mr. Madison, Mr. Macon, and Mr. Gallatin prevailed, and the precedent, so deprecated by Mr. Dayton, of admitting a Territory in disregard of the provisions of the ordinance of 1787, was established. That the ill results feared by this eminent statesman have not followed has been the result of fortunate circumstances rather than the wisdom of the measures which he so ably opposed. While but one Territory has been subsequently admitted under conditions altogether similar to those existing in the case of Tennessee, in the case of nearly all other Territories this precedent, as regards some one of the rules applicable under the law of 1787, or provided by subsequent measures, has been ignored. These departures from the original intent of Congress have been especially evident as regards population. At the date of the acts enabling them to form State governments, I find that, of the Territories constituted into free States, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Oregon, Nevada, and Nebraska had a population less than 60,000; and of those constituted as slave States, not one had then a free population in excess of the required number, the total population, free and slave, of Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Missouri being but a little above it, and that of Arkansas and Florida considerably below it. Of the above-named States, at the time of their final admission to the Union, Ohio, Illinois, Oregon, and Nevada, of the free States, were still below the required population; and in none of the slave States, including Tennessee, admitted without the formality of an enabling act, was the free population sufficient, while in Arkansas and Florida the total, including slaves, was still less than 60,000.

It will be thus seen that eleven States organized from Territories, when authorized to form State governments, and the same number when admitted to the Union, had free populations of less than 60,000, and that of the slave States included in this number, seven in all, not one had the required number of free inhabitants, either when authorized to take the first steps toward admission or when finally admitted; and that both of these steps were taken by two of the latter States with a total population, free and slave, below the required number. Why so many States have been authorized to form State governments, and have been subsequently admitted to the Union with populations so far below the requirements of the ordinance of 1787, and the accepted rules for subsequent action, may be briefly explained as follows: first, by the ground for the use of a wide discretion afforded in the provisions of the ordinance of 1787, for the admission of States, when deemed expedient, before their population should equal the required number; and, second, by the equally wide discretion given by the Constitution in the words, "new States may be admitted by Congress into this Union," the only provision of the Constitution bearing specifically upon this subject. Efforts have been made at various times to secure the strict enforcement of the original rules, with the modification resulting from the increase in the population of the Union, which provided that the number of free inhabitants in a Territory seeking admission should equal the number established as the basis of representation in the apportionment of Representatives in Congress, as determined by the preceding census. How little success the efforts made in this direction have met may be seen by a comparison of the number of inhabitants forming the basis of representation, as established by the different censuses, and the free population of the Territories admitted at corresponding periods.

WHAT POWER HAS CONGRESS TO ACQUIRE AND HOLD TERRITORY?

It has been decided that the power to govern the territory acquired by the Federal Government after the formation of the Constitution is an inevitable consequence of the right to acquire. Judge Taney says:

But no power is given to acquire a territory, to be held and governed permanently in that character. The power exercised by Congress to acquire territory and establish a government there according to its own unlimited discretion was viewed with great jealousy by the earlier statesmen.

Judge McClean, in Scott vs. Sandford, says:

No powers can be exercised but those which are initiatory to the establishment of State governments, and no more power can be claimed or exercised than is necessary to the attainment of the end. This is the limitation of all the Federal power.

Judge Curtis says:

The purposes and objects of the clause were the enactment of laws concerning the disposal of the public lands and the temporary government of the settlers thereon until new States could be formed.

It has been held to authorize the acquisition of territory not fit for admission at the time but to be admitted as soon as its population and situation would entitle it to admission. It is required to become a State and not to be held as a colony and governed by Congress with absolute authority.

The Government holds it (territory) for their (people's) common use until it shall be associated with the other States as a member of the Union. But until that time arrives it is undoubtedly necessary that some government should be established in order to organize society and to protect the inhabitants in their persons and property; and as the people of the United States could act in this matter only through the Government which represented them and through which they spoke and acted when the territory was obtained, it was not only within the scope of its power but it was its duty to pass such laws and establish such a government as would enable those by whose authority they acted to reap the advantages anticipated from its acquisition, and to gather there a population which would enable it to assume a position to which it was destined among the States of the Union.

It was a part of the solemn compact between the States and the General Government, as we have shown, that the territory ceded should be formed into States at the earliest practicable moment, and should be held for no other purpose.

Utah would long ago have been admitted as a State except for the persistent and defiant practice and propagation of the odious and unrepublican doctrine of polygamy in that Territory. It is unpatriotic and unstatesmanlike for Congress longer to permit such a rich and prosperous section of the Union to remain in the condition of a subject province instead of an equal and sovereign State. It will never be otherwise, however, unless we begin at once, and with sincerity and energy, to disqualify and wipe out the power of polygamy. Professor Henry Randall Waite, Ph. D., a very learned and impartial gentleman, has recently said on this subject:

Utah is now, as when its first petition was presented, debarred from admittance by its anomalous condition as a government controlled by those who maintain, in defiance of law and public opinion, a social system the revolting character of which is too well known to need description. Should the inhabitants of this Territory place themselves in a condition which would not be antagonistic to the laws of the Union, there can be no question that its right to become a State would be at once recognized. Originally settled by its present inhabitants in 1846-47, it was organized as a Territory and provided with a Territorial government by act of September 9, 1850. For a considerable period prior to this act, however, there had been in force in the Territory a semi-ecclesiastical government administered by the Mormon leaders, under the name of the "State of Deseret." The government provided by Congress was intended to extinguish that of this pseudo State, but the people of the Territory cunningly framed, under its provision, a constitution and laws which did not interfere with the essential features of the abrogated code of "Deseret," and was at the same time acceptable to Congress. The result of the change, instead of weakening the power of the Mormon leaders, really strengthened it, by enabling them, under statutes approved by Congress, to exercise from that time until now permanent and supreme executive, legislative, and judicial control throughout the Territory. While it is difficult to say in what manner such a result could have been prevented under the provisions of a representative Territorial government, it is undoubtedly true that the development of Mormonism as a system, the defiant attitude of its adherents, and the resultant difficulties to which reference will be made elsewhere, are chiefly due to the long tenure of absolute civil authority upon which its leaders entered in 1850.

Polygamy is the scarlet letter upon the brow of this fair young commonwealth which proclaims her deep shame, and forbids her entrance into the sisterhood of States.

EACH CONGRESS MAY FIX THE QUALIFICATIONS OF ITS DELEGATES.

Why? Because the history of the Territories, the clause in reference to them in the Constitution, the decisions of the courts thereon, and the contemporary legislation on the subject, all show that the Constitution does not apply to any Territory except such as was within the jurisdiction of the Confederacy at the time of the formation of the Federal Government; and that while the office of Delegate was well known to the framers of the Constitution, the word "Delegate" was not mentioned nor dignified with the slightest recognition. Delegates were clearly considered by the founders of the Government as not within the purview of the Constitution nor having any of the qualifications of members of Congress. Delegates are not, therefore, contemplated by the Constitution, nor any provision made for them in any way as to qualifications or otherwise.

It is clear, therefore, that the Constitution did not intend that Territorial Delegates should come within its provisions or that they should have the status and qualifications of members. No act of Congress by simply extending the Constitution to a Territory would change it so as to require such qualifications unless the act itself provided such qualifications, and then they would be fixed by the act, and not by the Constitution. No act extending the Constitution to the Territories, in so far as applicable, as was done in the case of Utah, would have the effect to in any manner provide or change the qualifications of Delegates, because the Constitution is not applicable to Delegates.

The Constitution not fixing the qualifications of Delegates, and no act of Congress having ever done so, the question remains open, and under the powers of the House and general parliamentary law the House has the exclusive power to judge of and fix them.

Congress has the power to say at any time and in any way it may see proper what qualifications it will exact of the agents whom as a matter of grace and discretion it permits to come from the Territories into its deliberations and to sit among its members. Neither the Senate nor the Executive, nor any other power on earth, has any right to interfere except by permission in fixing the qualifications for admission to the House, and the concurrence and co-operation of the Senate and Executive in the passage of any enactment on the subject can go no further in giving it force and validity than to make it a persuasive rule of action which the House is at liberty to follow or disregard. "Each House shall be the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members." No law that was ever passed on this subject, which is under the exclusive and unlimited control of each House, by any former Congress, is binding on any subsequent House. Each House may wholly repudiate all such acts with entire propriety. It is customary to regard them as rules of conduct. This is well illustrated by the doctrine laid down by McCrary in his Law of Elections, section 349, in reference to the laws made to govern contested elections:

> The Houses of Congress, when exercising their authority and jurisdiction to decide upon "the election, returns, and qualifications" of members, are not bound by the technical rules which govern proceedings in courts of justice. Indeed, the statutes to be found among the acts of Congress regulating the mode of conducting an election contest in the House of Representatives are directory only, and are not and cannot be made mandatory under the Constitution. In practice these statutory regulations are often varied, and sometimes wholly departed from. They are convenient as rules of practice, and of course will be adhered to unless the House, in its discretion, shall in a given case determine that the ends of justice require a different course of action. They constitute wholesome rules, not to be departed from without cause. It is not within the constitutional power of Congress, by a legislative enactment or otherwise, to control either House in the exercise of its exclusive right to be judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members.
> The laws that have been enacted on this subject being therefore only directory, and not absolutely binding, would have been more appropriately passed as mere rules of the House of Representatives, since by their passage it may be claimed that the House conceded the right of the Senate to share with it in this duty and power conferred by the Constitution. It is presumed, however, that the provisions in question were enacted in the form of a statute rather than as a mere rule of the House, in order to give them more general publicity, &c.

CONGRESS HAS ADDED TO THE CONSTITUTIONAL QUALIFICATIONS OF MEMBERS; WHY NOT OF DELEGATES?

But admitting for the purposes of this discussion, what cannot be maintained, that the same qualifications which entitle a member of Congress to admission shall also entitle a Delegate to the same right, and I still hold that Congress has the right and power to say that a polygamist shall not be admitted as a Delegate. Under the high power inherent in every organization on earth to preserve its integrity and existence, Congress has the indubitable right to keep out of its councils any person whom it believes to be dangerous and hostile to the Government.

During the war almost the whole Congressional delegation from the State of Kentucky were halted at the bar of the House, and, on the objection of a member, were not permitted to be sworn until it was ascertained whether they or either of them were guilty of disloyal practices. They had each every qualification usually required by the Constitution; they were duly and regularly elected and returned; they were sent by a sovereign State, holding all her relations in perfect accord with the Federal Government; but the House proceeded to inquire into each case, and not until a reasonable investigation was had were any of them admitted. The committee which had the matter in charge reported, and the House adopted and laid down the following rule on the subject of all such cases:

> Whenever it is shown by proof that the claimant has, by act or speech, given aid or countenance to the rebellion, he should not be permitted to take the oath, and such acts or speech need not be such as to constitute treason technically, but must have been so overt and public, and must have been done or said under such circumstances, as fairly to show that they were actually designed to, and in their nature tended to, forward the cause of the rebellion.

In the case of John Young Brown, who was among the number, the committee almost unanimously reported against his right to admission on the ground that he had written an imprudent and disloyal letter; nothing more. He had never committed an act of treason. He was never arrested nor tried nor convicted. He denied all treasonable intent in the letter, and made every effort in his power to explain and extenuate his offense. But seven out of the nine members of the Committee on Elections of the Fortieth Congress reported that he "was not entitled to take the oath of office, or to be admitted to the House as a Representative from the State of Kentucky." This report was adopted by the House by a vote of 108 to 43. The minority report in that case made an argument against the action of the majority in almost the same words and on identically the same grounds that the minority of the Committee on Elections occupy in the case under consideration. It was argued that Mr. Brown had all the constitutional qualifications, and that Congress had no right to exact more; that in any event he had never been tried or convicted of treason, and unless convicted of the crime even treason was no disqualification. But Congress then laid down the rule above given, and never abrogated since, that in addition to the ordinary constitutional requirements, every man must be well disposed and loyal toward the Government before he can be admitted to Congress to aid in forming its policy and controlling its destinies.

The act of July 2, 1862, providing what is known as the iron-clad oath, added a new and marked qualification to those required of members of Congress prior to that time, and every member who has taken that oath since has submitted to the exaction of that additional qualification. The distinguished counsel who argued the case of Mr. Cannon before the Committee on Elections felt the force of this act, and the long-continued practice of Congress under it, and explained it as a war measure. He said:

> The grounds upon which this law was vindicated, although not stated with much care or precision, are nevertheless clearly enough disclosed by the debates. It was enacted as a war measure. The iron-clad oath was adopted as the countersign which should in time of war exclude domestic enemies from the civil administration of the Government, in the same manner and for the same reason that the military countersign was employed to exclude those enemies from the military lines of the army. It was enacted as a measure of defense against an armed enemy in time of war, and was as necessary and as justifiable as any other war measure not specifically marked out in the text of the Constitution.

If Congress could, almost without challenge, provide and add such a distinct and imperative qualification, not for a Delegate, but for a member of Congress, in 1862, why may we not in 1882 ask a reasonable additional qualification for a Delegate from a Territory who does not come within the letter or spirit of the Constitution? The act of 1862 was a bold and radical assertion of the doctrine of self-preservation on the part of Congress to maintain its integrity and the purity and loyalty of its counsels. The resolution recommended by the majority of the Committee on Elections only says to the people of Utah, You shall not abuse the privilege of representation which we allowed you on the floor of Congress, by sending as your Delegate a person who adheres to an organization that is hostile to the interests of free government, and whose doctrines and practices are offensive to the masses of the moral people of the great nation we represent.

CONCLUSION.

The following is a summary of the reasons for my concurrence in the resolutions of the majority of the committee:

1. The history of the cession and organization of the Territory, which belonged to the Federal Government at the time of its formation, the history of the clause in the Constitution which relates to that Territory, and the Constitution itself all show clearly that it was not contemplated or intended that Delegates which might be sent from said Territory, then immediately under the Constitution, should have the same qualifications as members of Congress.

2. The Constitution does not extend over Utah except as a part of the statute law provided for that Territory by Congress and there is therefore more reason for holding that the qualifications required for members of Congress by the Constitution do not extend to Delegates from that Territory than there is in relation to Delegates from Territory immediately under the Constitution.

3. The Constitution not only does not provide that Delegates shall have the same qualifications as members of Congress but no law, in almost a century of legislation on the subject, has so provided.

4. There is no reason why the qualification of Delegates should be the same as those of members of Congress. Their status and duties and powers are widely different, and their qualifications should be made to conform to those powers and duties, which in case of Delegates are purely of a local and business character.

5. The Territories can only be held and governed by Congress with one single purpose in view, which is to adapt and prepare them for admission as States of the Union. It will hardly be contended that Utah will ever be admitted as a State while polygamy dominates it, or that it is preparing it for admission as a State to hold out to its people the delusive doctrine that a polygamist is not disqualified as a member of Congress, and therefore that polygamy is no bar to the admission of Utah to the Union.

6. No law fixing the qualifications of Delegates passed by any former Congress would be binding on any subsequent House. Each House shall be the judge of the qualifications of its own members, and for a much stronger reason it should be the exclusive judge of the qualifications of the Delegates, which are its creatures, and which it admits as a matter of its own discretion.

7. Congress has held from 1862 down to this time that it has the right to prevent the admission of persons as members who are hostile to the Government by excluding them on that ground, although they possess all the other qualifications required by the Constitution. With much more propriety and much less stretch of power Congress has the right to exclude a Delegate who is not well disposed toward the Government, and who openly defies the law.

I submit this case with one word in reply to the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE,] who in so forcibly presenting the views of the minority yesterday declared that a decent respect for the opinions of mankind should constrain us to follow the precedents set by the last four Congresses and accord to Mr. Cannon his seat. The appeal was an unfortunate one. I maintain with great confidence that, under the law and the facts of this case, a decent respect for the opinions of mankind overwhelmingly justify us in refusing to admit to this supreme legislative tribunal of this great Christian Republic one whose practices are offensive to our civilization, hostile to civil society, and fatal to the welfare of the state.

CHANGES IN STANDING COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce certain changes in the standing committees.

Mr. KENNA, of West Virginia, is, at his own request, relieved from further service on the Committee on Enrolled Bills. Mr. TALBOTT, of Maryland, is appointed on the Committee on Enrolled Bills. Mr. HOGE, of West Virginia, is, at his own request, relieved from further service on the Committee on Private Land Claims. Mr. HOGE, of West Virginia, is appointed on the Committee on the District of Columbia. Mr. HARDY, of New York, is appointed on the Committee on Private Land Claims.

UTAH CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. JONES, of Texas. Mr. Speaker, in the time allowed me I shall not be able to notice or discuss all of the many interesting questions of constitutional law involved in this debate. I shall therefore select such as seem to me most salient and give them such consideration as my ability and the limited time will permit.

It is not denied that Mr. Cannon was duly elected, receiving some 18,000 votes to about some 1,600 votes against him. It is not questioned that these votes were legal. So that the only question before the House is whether he is laboring under any disability or disqualification on account of which he is denied or should be denied a seat on this floor. Touching this vital inquiry, I shall call attention to the qualifications established or prescribed by the Constitution for members:

> No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

It is admitted in the report of the majority that Mr. Cannon possesses all of these constitutional qualifications. The rule is familiar to the House that the qualifications thus prescribed by the Constitution exclude all others; in other words these are all the qualifications that can be required for members of this House. The old familiar rule, "the inclusion of the one is the exclusion of the other," in its application to this particular section or clause of the Constitution is expressly recognized and affirmed by Mr. Story in his treatise on the Constitution. There is no question about that. It is not pretended that Congress can either add to or take from these qualifications. It is, however, or has been in this debate insisted that Congress may, in the exercise of its constitutional prerogative to judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own members, apply other tests or require other qualifications in a Delegate from a Territory.

Congress has the prerogative or exclusive privilege to judge, not to enlarge or to contract or to diminish the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution. The power is clearly one of judgment, one of ascertainment, and not one of creation. The House can neither enlarge nor diminish in so far as its members are concerned. But it is maintained by some gentlemen that this constitutional provision has little or no application to a Delegate coming from a Territory. Why not? Is not the reason the same? Congress cannot certainly require greater qualifications in a Delegate, in an inferior, in one occupying a less important position upon the floor than a Member. To do so would in itself be a travesty on constitutional law. You may require less, but certainly cannot require more. You cannot erect a standard for a Delegate different from and more exacting than the one by which you propose to be ruled yourselves. It not only involves a legal sophism but it involves self-reproach for a member of the United States Congress to stand up here and say, "I am good enough to represent my constituents, but some man hailing from a Territory is not good enough, though as good as myself, to represent his." Here in that same breath we have it that the people in the Territories are better than those in the States, when it serves your purpose; and yet the breath is not cold before you tell us that the people of the States are really better than those in the Territories, and ought to have better men to represent them in the United States Congress. And yet gentlemen attempting to maintain the sophism by which they sustain themselves in this particular case do not get through their pretended arguments before they tell us the people in the Territories have no rights we are bound to respect.

Now, then, it being conceded that Mr. Cannon posesses all of these constitutional qualifications, let us see if he does not possess all the qualifications required by the acts of Congress in respect to the Territory of Utah.

Gentlemen tell us this is a new question, as if it were here for the first time in its original character for our consideration, and yet the very same gentlemen who tell us so go back and trace our legislation for thirty years in respect to this very Territory and this very question.

Was not this question before Congress when it passed the organic act of the Territory of Utah? And what is that organic act? Has it any binding force or effect upon the people of the United States or upon this Congress? Can you treat it in any other light than a charter government for that people? Here is an organic act; you passed it and that people accepted it. It is in the nature of a legislative contract, and is binding on all parties, and certainly repealable by neither except with the agreement and by the consent of the other.

This is no new question in American history. George III and the British Parliament thought that our fathers when they were living under colonial and charter governments had no rights beyond their will. But Jefferson and Madison and Washington and others of our early fathers believed and maintained that men are born with inalienable rights, of which they cannot be deprived by the usurpation of their rulers.

This, then, is not a new question. It was before Congress in the act organizing the Territory of Utah. Congress incorporated into that act no disqualification as to polygamy. They recognized the fact then that there was in Congress an absolute want of power to do so. They organized the only government, in so far as this particular feature of the case is concerned, that in their judgment they had the power to organize. They recognized the people as having rights to life, liberty, and property.

Yet gentlemen here would tell us that they have none; that we can tax them without representation; that we can deny them representation on this floor. We are told that Delegates represent nobody here; that they amount to nothing; that they cannot vote. Granted; but have we as Americans yet to learn the potency of the right to speak, the power of the voice of a representative who speaks for his people? Do not gentlemen recognize the fact that it is the bulwark of our institutions that the people, whether of State or Territory, may bring their cause here, and if not heard, then by way of appeal they can go from Congress to the grand tribunal of the whole people of the United States? Yet you would deny them that right lest in asserting their own rights they might forsooth reproach you for their violation. Congress did not incorporate into the organic act any such provisions as are now insisted upon.

Take the Forty-third, the Forty-fourth, the Forty-fifth, and the Forty-sixth Congresses; at times Republican and at times Democratic. Yet the right of this people to be represented by a Mormon was recognized by all. Now, we are told that the presence of a Mormon on this floor will offend the dignity and sensibilities of certain men and women living elsewhere; hence, we must commence a crusade against Mormonism.

Gentlemen, are you in earnest in that? It is said that you may judge a tree by its fruit. Now, if you are in earnest and really want to extirpate polygamy, the way is easy and the constitutional method is plain. What is that? Why, just gather together thirty or forty thousand of you and go out there and settle. They cannot hinder you from doing so, and then you can settle this question.

The Forty-third Congress had this question before it, and the Forty-fourth Congress and the Forty-fifth and the Forty-sixth. It has passed the crucial test of all of them in a constitutional point of view, and they all decided that there was then no existing law, no such disqualification as polygamy as now contended for by gentlemen on the opposite side of this question. Congress by acquiescing, by receiving the Delegate, is now, if there can be any such thing upon the unbridled power claimed by this Congress, estopped from interposing and exacting for the first time a qualification hitherto unknown either to the Constitution, to the law, or to precedent.

The present Congress admits that; there is no question on that subject. Why hurry through in hot haste at the present Congress what is known as the Mormon bill, except to reach Mr. Cannon's case? Everybody knows that. You admit that the law and the Constitution sustained Mr. Cannon's right to a seat on this floor. And in order to overreach him you introduced this bill, known as the Mormon bill, and passed it in order to accomplish by indirect means what you could not effect directly. Now, is there a lawyer on this floor who does not know that what cannot be accomplished directly cannot be accomplished indirectly? Can you evade, and thereby defeat the Constitution of the country?

It is maintained by some gentlemen that this act of this Congress changes materially the attitude of the case. It is maintained by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BELTZHOOVER] that for the first time we have polygamy confessed by Mr. Cannon. Now, does not everybody know that it was just as well known by general notoriety as a thing could be known? Did Mr. Cannon ever deny it heretofore? And now because the man was too honest, too frank, to deny the truth, but came up boldly in his manhood and admitted it, did not put the country to any trouble to prove it, that is seized upon as conclusive evidence of guilt. Now, was he guilty of any offense, any legal offense? I will inquire about that by and by. He had taken his wives before the act of 1862.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JONES, of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Has the gentleman ever read the report of the Committee on Elections of the Forty-third Congress in the Cannon and Maxwell case?

Mr. JONES, of Texas. No, sir; I have not.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Then I would suggest that the gentleman should not make the assertion that Mr. Cannon did not deny that he was a polygamist.

Mr. JONES, of Texas. I say that he did not deny it then.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. He did deny it.

Mr. JONES, of Texas. Denied that he ever had been married?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. In the contest which Mr. Cannon had with Mr. Maxwell, in the Forty-third Congress, (1874,) he denied most emphatically that he was "living with four wives or living or cohabiting with any wives in defiant or willful violation of the law of Congress of 1862." He denied that he was then "living, or had ever lived, in violation of the laws of God, man, his country, decency, or civilization, or of any law of the United States." These broad denials on the very issue which was the chief one involved in that contest doubtless had a great deal to do with the finding in Mr. Cannon's favor.

Mr. JONES, of Texas. Very well. It is now stated that the case has been materially changed, that he admits—admits what? He does not admit that he has violated any law. He does not admit that he has been convicted of any offense. The fact that he admitted it in the Territory where he was directly amenable to the law and subject to prosecution in case of guilt shows a consciousness on his part that he was not thus liable.

The fact about it is that his polygamist errors, or whatever you please to term them, all took place before the enactment of the law of 1862. Will any gentleman pretend that Mr. Cannon could under that law be convicted and punished for an act which when done was not a crime?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BELTZHOOVER] says there is nothing that Congress cannot do in its treatment of the people of the Territories. But it seems to me that on this point he has read to very little profit the decisions of the Supreme Court if he has not been informed that, with all our legislative power, we cannot, to save our lives, make a law ex post facto in its nature or even impairing the obligation of contracts. In the celebrated case of Hepburn vs. Griswold, involving the legal-tender question—a case with which members of the bar are all familiar—the Chief-Justice, delivering the opinion of the court, grouped not the powers of the Government in order to show that it could do thus and so, but actually grouped the inhibitions by the Constitution upon the powers of the States—for what purpose? To show that by the very nature and genius of our Government ex post facto laws and laws impairing the obligations of contracts have no part or place in our entire system. The Federal Government cannot exercise the power to pass any such law. There is no authority, either State or national, that can by an act passed to-day make that which was done yesterday a crime.

The eighth section of the act of March 22, 1882, has been referred to. Let me read it:

That no polygamist, bigamist, or any person cohabiting with more than one woman, and no woman cohabiting with any of the persons described as aforesaid in this section, in any Territory or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, shall be entitled to vote—

That does not affect votes heretofore given—at any election held in any such Territory or other place—

Not heretofore but hereafter held in such Territory or other place—or be eligible for election or appointment to—

Not in the past, but in the future—

or be entitled to hold any office or place of public trust, honor, or emolument in, under, or for any such Territory or place, or under the United States.

Now, in construing this provision I submit that the general and well-known rule that all statutes are to be construed so as to give them operation in the future, applies in this case. No statute can be construed as having a retroactive or ex post facto effect, even where there exists power in the legislative body to give it such effect, unless it be made so by express and unmistakable language. Now, apply that rule to this eighth section, which, it is claimed, works a change in the character that this case presents to us. Under the application of this rule the whole argument falls to the ground.

But, accepting the confession which this argument implies of your inability to reach this case in any other mode, let us concede that the law-makers intended to do just what you claim has been done—to reach Mr. Cannon and impose upon him a disqualification on account of polygamy; can you do it? Have you done it? Is not the law, if so construed, necessarily ex post facto? Was not Mr. Cannon duly elected to this Congress? Did he not acquire by virtue of his election a vested right of property in his office? Can you deprive him of it, except by due process of law? Is it true, as you affirm, that the people residing in the Territories have no protection whatever? Is it true, as you affirm, that the ægis of American liberty does not cover those poor, helpless people out there? Is it true, as you maintain, that when a man, invested in his own State with all the rights of American citizenship, happens to transcend the territorial borders of the State sovereignty, he loses his stature as a man and forfeits his rights as an American citizen? Why, sir, this idea reverses the whole theory of our Government. Our fathers thought that the governments were organized to conserve and protect the innate, inherent rights of man; yet you reverse that principle, and in these Halls, familiar in the past with the teachings of Douglas and Clay and other illustrious men, you gravely tell us that the people of the Territories have no rights whatever that we are bound to respect. Why, gentlemen, we are retrograding; we have got away back of 1765.

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BELTZHOOVER] had better go a little behind the history that he read, when he undertakes to deny these people the right of representation. He could even go to the English Parliament and get valuable lessons from the Earl of Camden. When the same power was claimed for the British Parliament over the American colonies, what was the response of that noble lord? He maintained that whatever is a man's own is his own absolutely, and no one has a right to take it from him without his consent; whoever attempts to do so does him an injury; whoever does so commits a robbery. Whenever you undertake to deprive the people of Utah of the right of representation, of the right of a voice in their own legislation, however wayward they may be, you do those people an injury, and if successful you rob them, not of rights which you gave them, but of rights which they received from nature and nature's God.

Now, then, if Mr. Cannon was elected, and that is the main point I wish to impress upon this House, he is entitled to his seat. He has not been, as I maintain, and I think the intendment of this section clear in support of that view, deprived of it by this act of Congress. If the act had so intended, it is unconstitutional, and therefore inoperative. He is not in any view of its construction deprived of his right, and the logical conclusion is that he cannot be excluded without abolishing the office of Delegate from that Territory. I say, then, to gentlemen on the other side of this House, in all fairness, let them meet this question as it confronts them. Let them meet this question fairly. Here it is: Mr. Cannon is supported by his constitutional right, by his legal right. You find the Constitution and laws of your country and his country, however widely you differ in your religious views, are the same. You find them confronting you. They stand between you and him. They are opposed to you. The spirit of our Constitution and laws is opposed to you, to say nothing of their express language.

What are you going to do? What shall we do? That is the grave and solemn question for us to decide. Will we do as our predecessors have done, recognize this right, the right of representation in the people of the Territories, the right of Mr. Cannon to come here and voice their interests, to represent them in asserting their rights, in communicating to Congress such information as may be deemed necessary in their treatment, or will you ignore these rights?

Here you are brought in front of the Constitution itself. You cannot get around it and you cannot get over it. There is no escape. There is but one alternative: you must either admit Cannon or you must trample the Constitution of your country under your feet.

I do not propose at this time to undertake to discuss, or even to state, the constitutional questions involved as affecting the rights of the people in a Territory. It is not a new question. I accept as true that construction of the second clause of the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution in reference to the power of Congress over the Territories, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BELTZHOOVER.] Under that clause of the Constitution Congress has the power to do what? To dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

I submit to any fair-minded man whether both the legal and grammatical intendment of this language is not unmistakble. Does not the qualifying word "other" in its relation to the subject place territory in the same category with property? I submit that the plain intendment of the language, the word "other" referring back to territory, puts it in juxtaposition with property.

I will not now repeat what to my mind has been the unanswerable argument of Cass and Douglas on this question. I desire to affirm that I believe, as they maintained, that the power here given is limited to property as land in the Territories. At the time the Constitution was adopted Territorial government had already been provided for the Northwest Territory. The first Congress under the Constitution of the United States passed an act confirming the Territorial government in its relation to the new Government, succeeding and supplanting the old. That is all it did. They elected and sent their representative to Congress; they chose their representatives and lawmakers under it. Here we have, then, I may say, taking it in its historical relation and bearing, a direct expression of the sense of those who framed the Constitution.

The history of their struggle with British power was too fresh in the minds of our fathers for them to assume that the people who inhabited the Territories had no rights. They recognized in their brothers residing in a Territory the same capability, the same right to treat, regulate, and control their own affairs that they had so recently asserted for themselves. That is part and parcel, as it were, of the Constitution itself. The clause "to make all needful rules and regulations," &c., to which I have just referred, was intended to and did give Congress power to establish a system of land surveys, to dispose of and regulate the sale of public lands. At that time it might be reasonably supposed Congress was not looking to the acquisition of further territory, but Congress was empowered by the Constitution to make treaties and declare war, and under the power to make treaties Congress could acquire territory—this very Territory of Utah. In the execution of that power it did acquire this Territory.

The force of analogy and the example of the framers of the Constitution can leave but little room for doubt as to relations of rights and powers between the Government and the Territories. Conforming to those relations as interpreted by analogy and example, Congress organized Territorial government, securing to the people the right of local self-government. The rights of the people in that Territory were recognized, as were those of the people in the Northwest Territory, thus conforming to the genius of our Government. The people accepted the government thus provided, and by accepting made it their own. If I had time, Mr. Speaker, I would like to reproduce some of the Fourth of July orations I have read on this great subject. Why, I have been so weak, so credulous as actually to believe that all just laws derive their sanction from the consent of the governed. I have been so weak and credulous as an American citizen. In fact, I used to pride myself in the genius of our institutions and in the faith that such was American doctrine and such the spirit of our Constitution and our laws.

I used to believe in the doctrine that all men are born with certain inalienable rights, but especially so with reference to the one to which I have referred; but I now find that I have been hugging delusive phantoms; that man has no rights except those conferred by the Government, and that Congress has absolute power over the domestic affairs of the hardy frontiersmen in the Territories and the right to establish for them such a system as shall suit the people in the States without regard to the will and welfare of the governed, give them bad names, call them polygamists, and try them in their absence and condemn them without a hearing. Is such the genius of American institutions? Is that American doctrine? "Oh," say gentlemen, "it won't do to let this despised people alone." James Madison was a lunatic when he said that time, forbearance, and example will do the work and correct the evil. Polk and Jackson and Jefferson and Madison and Clay and Webster were all beside themselves and should have been sent to lunatic asylums when they maintained that the second sober thought of the people would correct all political evils. Why, all of our forefathers were madmen when they laid the foundation of the Government upon the broad principle of the right of the people and upon the basis of the virtue, intelligence, and patriotism of the masses; that the people might be safely trusted with the settlement of all these political questions, and that the evils which would probably spring up could be corrected by the virtue and intelligence of the people themselves.

But, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen say we cannot trust the virtue and intelligence of the people in Utah. Well, then, whom can we trust, and to whom shall we intrust the Government? What power shall we invoke above that of the people themselves? It is said they have no rights. Whence do we get power to govern them at will and without restraint? It is proposed, as I have already stated, to legislate for them, and yet we are not responsible to them for the abuse of power. Separate responsibility and power and right is a myth and liberty a name. In this very case we have more concern to please our constituents than to promote the welfare of the people in Utah. In response to whose demands are we now pressing to a vote the unseating of Mr. Cannon? Is it done to help or benefit the people of Utah? Or is it done to respond to the demands of our own constituents, far removed from the influence of our action, and not affected by the consequences which you propose to impose upon others?

There are wrongs in Utah as there are in all other Territories; but it is tyranny for us to make laws that do not affect ourselves or constituents, and for which we are wholly irresponsible to the people on whom they act, however oppressively they may be affected by them. I may be what some people call an old fogy on these questions, but I have never forgotten the teachings of the fathers of the Republic. It may not be fashionable to remember them now. I know that other views and other opinions are current upon these questions, but when I turn to the Constitution what do I find? I find that our fathers, (and that Constitution embodies their wisdom and experience,) taught by the cruel persecution of witches, crucified by the persecutions of Catholics and Protestants alike, taught by all of those bitter experiences, declared that religion should have no place in our Constitution lest hypocrisy should thereby find pretense for outrage and wrong upon the innocent.

I find no power in the Constitution that warrants gentlemen in taking the position that we must to the rescue of the Christian religion and stamp out Mormonism, lest its virus contaminate the Christian world. The Christian religion is distinguished from all others by the fact that it does not ask or require the help of temporal aid, but addresses itself directly to the head and heart of the individual, and depends alone on the power of truth. It does not ask, but rejects as incompatible with divine truth, the aid of secular power. It is not a fact that Mormonism endangers either our religion or liberty.

But gentlemen say it will not do to trust the presence of this viper, this poison, in our midst; that the virus will infect and spread itself through the entire mass of the people of the United States. Why, if the people have the virtue and intelligence that we claim for them, we can trust it to them safely. If they have not, if a whole people, fifty millions, invincible in war and irresistible upon the Western Continent, have all their rights and liberties endangered by a few wild, superstitious Mormons, our fathers were greatly mistaken when they laid the foundation of our Government upon the virtue and intelligence of the masses. We have made that grand discovery, and I suppose now their work is to be discarded. We are to tear down this superstructure from its foundation of sand, and dig down and find rock for a new foundation. We do not know whether it is to be this artificial rock now made by recent inventions and processes, or some old rock—granite, or what not; we cannot tell whether it is to be Baptist or Presbyterian, Catholic or Mohammedan.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to be brief in recapitulation: Cannon was, by an overwhelming majority of the people of that Territory, elected a Delegate to this Congress. He was qualified under the law then in force. He is qualified under the Constitution of the United States, and it is not in the power of this House in judging of his qualifications to add to or subtract one thing from them.

The question here confronts us, Shall we admit Mr. Cannon and uphold the Constitution and laws of our country, or by rejecting him trample them beneath our feet and gain the plaudits of the inconsiderate and intemperate? The question is a grave one. It is a solemn one. It embraces all that is vital in constitutional liberty. There can be but two forms of government, one personal, the other institutional. In the case of institutional government the institutions themselves are the supreme power in the state. They are the ultimate tribunal; they are the power than which there is none higher. If you trample these down you start off with a mobocracy, and end inevitably in a military imperialism.

That is the question which, in my judgment, presents itself to every member here. I do not mean that gentlemen are not just as honest in their views in reference to this case as I am. But I do mean to say in my honest judgment this case puts to test the force and power of institutional government. And I might say here in this connection there comes fresh to my mind the language addressed by the Earl of Chatham to the British Parliament in their lust for power and in their eagerness to grasp and sway without limit and without stint the rod of empire over the Western World. I know you can do in this case just what he said England might do in reference to the colonies. He said, substantially: "I know the gallantry of your troops and power of your armies; I know that in a good cause you can crush America to atoms; but in this struggle if America fall she will fall like the strong man embracing the pillars of liberty, she will drag the constitution along with her."

Polygamy, Mr. Speaker, is odious. I have no sympathy with it. But in this struggle it has this advantage which we have unwittingly given it. It has in some form got behind the Constitution of the United States. You may embrace it, but in doing so you may embrace both, and when you drag down polygamy take heed lest you involve the constitutional liberties of your country in ruin. There is no occasion for it. There is no exigency in the life of the nation demanding it. The virtue and intelligence of the people of the United States certainly give us ample assurance that this leprosy cannot extend generally to the people of the United States. As was said yesterday so well by the gentleman from Tennessee, those people are brought now in contact with the outer world. They are no longer isolated. They are no longer away by themselves. Railways traverse their borders. Our people are pouring in and settling up and inhabiting the country. And no one need fear but that, if the vice as depicted by gentlemen yesterday is so hideous, so offensive as practiced in Utah, the American people will naturally be so startled that they will turn against it and destroy it. It will be corrected. There need be no fears on that score. But suppose it shall survive a day or two; suppose it shall live until next Congress and pass over the next Congress, it shall of itself be a monument in commemoration of the devotion to and love of the American people for the Constitution and laws of their country.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THOMPSON] became so impassioned and so carried away with his theme yesterday in his efforts to seat Mr. Campbell, who received about one-tenth or less than one-tenth of the votes, that he actually enlarged upon and amplified the glory and sacred right of representation. Yes, the glorious right of representation! He tells us that here are 1,600 gentiles who have voted for Mr. Campbell, and if you do not seat Mr. Campbell the people will be denied the right of representation, and hurt and outraged in the most vital principles of their liberties and rights; forgetting that about 18,000 had spoken on the other side, asking to be represented by Mr. Cannon.

Now, I would like to ask that if it is a matter of such importance, a matter so imperious in its exactions, that we should admit Mr. Campbell lest 1,600 persons who voted for him be left unrepresented, is it not ten times more important that we admit Mr. Cannon so that the 18,000 who voted for him shall not be left unrepresented?

Mr. Speaker, I will inquire what time I have remaining.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio, in the chair.) The gentleman has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. JONES, of Texas. I will yield that time to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] if he is present. I do not see him now, and I will reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. JACOBS. I shall not occupy the time of this House in the few minutes I propose to take in this discussion in considering those matters which I deem incidental and collateral; but I shall proceed in what I have to say to the consideration of the legal and constitutional principles which it seems to me ought to govern this House in the exercise of its sovereign and independent functions in deciding this question.

Mr. Speaker, the claim of the Territory of Utah to be represented upon this floor in the person of an avowed polygamist involves considerations and conditions altogether novel and peculiar. The framers of the Constitution, and of the law of 1850 organizing this Territory, could not, in the nature of the case, anticipate and provide against the existence of an inherent and inveterate vice in the body-politic of the political community claiming representation. In all other cases the social and political structure of the Territory has been modeled in conformity with the practice and principles of a republican form of government. And now the question is squarely presented as to the constitutional power and duty of Congress to refuse representation on this floor for any purpose to a political community which is unrepublican in every such sense as would debar its admission as a State in the Federal Union.

Mr. Speaker, more than thirty years ago the Congress of the United States saw an inconsiderable religious sect planted on perhaps the most favored of all our Territories, and gathering by its missionaries its devotees from every quarter of the globe, until it has reached the proportions of a formidable theocracy pervaded and controlled by practices and principles irrepressibly at war with the genius of our institutions and the policy of free government.

After thirty years of ineffectual discussion and legislation, after the baby has become a giant and threatens the peace of the country, an aroused and alarmed Congress has at last put on the panoply of its power and declared its determination to exterminate this inveterate evil.

A measure has passed both Houses almost unchallenged which denies to the citizens of that Territory who practice polygamy the right to hold office or participate in the government under which they live, and that, too, without judicial conviction or trial by jury.

The people of no Territory since the foundation of the Government have ever had the elective franchise or the right of self-government except by the provisions of the treaty by which it was acquired or the grace of the National Congress; and the people of this Territory acquired none of these rights by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo in 1848; so that when the Forty-seventh Congress disfranchised the ruling class and deprived them of the elective franchise, it deprived them of no inherent or natural and no acquired right. No more does it when for the same cause it denies them admission to the Federal Union and their Delegate admission to a seat on the floor of this House.

The grasp of the Mormon Church upon the people of Utah has never been relaxed. In no such sense has a church ever ruled a state since the Lawgiver of Israel, through the thunders of Sinai and in the name of Jehovah, led the "chosen people" into the valley of the Jordan.

Mahomet poured his fanatic armies into every quarter of the eastern world and forced the nations at the point of the sword to acknowledge the prophet. But he transmitted his empire to the soldier and not to the priest. Whatever may be said of the influence of the Church of Rome in the courts and councils of Christendom, the fact still remains that the church has always been subordinated to the civil and military power.

It is reserved for the first Republic of the world, here in this citadel of personal liberty, with a Constitution commanding the law-making power by "all needful rules and regulations" to see to it that republican practices and principles prevail upon every inch of American soil—it is reserved to us to tolerate within our borders an establishment of religion that not only enslaves the conscience, enfeebles and disarms the will, but dominates the civil power.

That the danger is such as justifies the exercise of this extraordinary power was not seriously denied. And still it is contended that this House, by reason of some legal fiction or other, is powerless to exclude from its floor the representative of a political community which Congress has asserted the power to disfranchise.

To the question as to whether this incongruity exists I invite your attention.

PRIMA FACIE TITLE.

Upon the question of prima facie title to the seat and the alienage of the claimant, my views, as expressed before the committee, are briefly as follows:

Certificate of election issued to Allen G. Campbell, Delegate to the Forty-seventh Congress.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Territory of Utah, Executive Office, ss:

I, Eli H. Murray, governor of the Territory of Utah, do declare and certify that at a regular election for Delegate to the Forty-seventh Congress, held in said Territory on the first Tuesday after the first Monday of November, A. D. 1880, returns whereof were opened in my presence by the Secretary of the Territory, Allen G. Campbell was the person, being a citizen of the United States, having the greatest number of votes, and was therefore duly elected as Delegate from said Territory to said Congress, and I do give this certificate accordingly.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the Territory to be affixed. Done at Salt Lake City this 8th day of January, A. D. 1881.

By the Governor:

ARTHUR L. THOMAS,
Secretary of Utah Territory.

So that this contest, so far as the prima facie case is concerned, may be resolved into the following propositions:

First. Is the governor's certificate such a muniment of title as confers the seat prima facie upon the contestant? McCrary, section 208, declares that "it is enough for a prima facie case if the certificate comes from the proper officer of the State, and clearly shows that the person claiming under it has been adjudged to be duly elected," &c. It is made conclusive of the prima facie title of the contestee, because it is a record. To be a record it must import absolute verity. It derives its authority from a single fact, and that fact is that the holder of the certificate received the highest number of votes. That fact may be omitted and the certificate still be valid. But when in addition to that fact the certifying officer couples with it the statement of another fact not necessary or germane to his determination, and upon both facts argumentatively (therefore) concludes that contestee was "duly elected," the document fails to import absolute verity, excites doubt, challenges controversy, and opens the door to investigation.

Second. The contestee having failed to make a prima facie title to the seat, and he being the only person bearing the certificate of the only officer competent for that purpose, it would seem to follow that the only remaining question is, Which of these two persons having the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution received the greatest number of votes at the election?

And here, at the threshold, it is objected that the contestant has failed to make any proof of the allegation, in his notice of contest contained, that he received the highest number of votes at such election within the time prescribed by law.

To which it may be replied that the notice of contest proceeded upon the assumption that the certificate of the governor conferred upon the contestee a prima facie title to the seat.

But if I am right in my first conclusion, and the contestee has by reason of his certificate no valid title whatever, then how can the burden of proof in the first instance be said to be upon the person who has named himself as the contestant? Both being destitute of a prima facie title, how do the parties differ so far as determining which has the affirmative in the contest?

But if the form the contest has taken is to be deemed to determine that, then we are brought to the question, Is the admission contained on page 32 of the record sufficient to put the contestee to proof of the affirmative allegations of his answer? At all events the contestee seems to have so regarded it, when, upon notice to the contestant, he produced and examined witnesses before the notary to establish the alienage and polygamy of the contestant.

For this and other reasons stated by counsel upon the argument, and which it would be idle to recapitulate, I hold that the contestee held the affirmative in the introduction of proof before the notary; and not having asked to be relieved from his default, we are brought to the inquiry, Was the contestant at the time of his election an alien? Upon this question I adopt the reasoning of the chairman, and hold that the judgment of naturalization cannot be attacked collaterally, and in conclusion, constrained as I am by my views of the principles of construction to hold that George Q. Cannon was at the time of the election a citizen of the United States, and received the greatest number of votes cast, I am, nevertheless, of the opinion that this committee should not recommend, and the House ought to refuse to admit, the said Cannon to a seat as a Delegate from the Territory of Utah, for the reason that, in defiance of the laws of Congress and the sense of mankind, he is living in open adultery with plural wives, and advocating the doctrines and practice of polygamy. And so, seeking the shelter of no subterfuge or technicality, I stand on this proposition for the dignity and honor of the House.

THE ISSUE.

And now that we have cut loose from and disposed of every preliminary question in the contestant's favor, we are brought face to face with the last and only ground upon which his claim to a seat can be rightfully rejected. And this issue upon which the report of the committee must, I think, stand or fall is best formulated in the published declaration of the contestant himself, on page 60 of the record, and is as follows:

In the matter of George Q. Cannon. Contest of Allen G. Campbell's right to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Forty-seventh Congress of the United States, as Delegate from the Territory of Utah.

I, George Q. Cannon, contestant, protesting that the matter in this paper contained is not relevant to the issue, do admit that I am a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, commonly called Mormons; that in accordance with the tenets of said church I have taken plural wives, who now live with me, and have so lived with me for a number of years and borne me children. I also admit that in my public addresses as a teacher of my religion in Utah Territory I have defended said tenet of said church as being, in my belief, a revelation from God.

GEO. Q. CANNON.

So that the very question for this House to determine is, "Are the matters in that paper contained relevant to the issue," and do they constitute a valid reason why George Q. Cannon, after having been duly elected a Delegate from the Territory of Utah, should be refused a seat in the American Congress? In other words, does the fact that he is a member of the "Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints," commonly called Mormons; that, in accordance with the tenets of such church, he has taken plural wives, who now live with him, and have so lived with him for a number of years, and borne him children; that in his public addresses as a teacher of that religion he has defended such tenets as being, in his belief, a revelation from God—are these facts relevant to the issue, and do they constitute a valid reason for his exclusion?

Let us pause right here to consider the objection raised before the committee, and by the gentleman from Tennessee yesterday, that inasmuch as it does not affirmatively appear by the terms of the admission that any of these wives were taken subsequent to the act of 1862, declaring polygamy a crime, that therefore the confession does not bring the contestant within the penalties prescribed by the act.

A technical reply to a technical objection is fair, and my answer is that the contestant, having confessed the truth of the facts constituting the offense of polygamy under the act, is bound to plead the facts, which, by way of avoidance, take the case out of the operation of the statute. So that on the record made by himself he cannot now avail himself of that objection.

In the first place, I insist that the position taken by the chairman in the report of the majority is sound: that while the House of Representatives may not disregard any law which Congress has the constitutional right to pass, and that while Congress is competent to provide, under the Constitution, for legislative representation for the Territories; that, nevertheless, Congress cannot bind the House by any law respecting the qualification of a Delegate.

I cannot better state the position than to employ his language:

It (Congress) cannot affix a qualification by law for a Delegate and bind any House except the one assenting thereto. The qualification of members is fixed by the Constitution. Hence they may not be added to or taken from by law. But as to Delegates, they are not constitutional officers. Their qualification depends entirely upon such a standard as the body to which they are attached may make. It is urged this means a legal qualification. This is admitted; but that legal qualification is remitted to the body to which the Delegate is attached, because it is the sole judge of that requisite. It is unfettered by constitutional restrictions, and cannot yield any part of this prerogative to the other branch of Congress or the Executive. If it could, the right to amend would follow, and the House might find itself in the awkward position of having the Senate fixing qualifications to Delegates, or the Executive vetoing laws fixing them, and by this means the power which by the Constitution resides alone in the House would be entirely abrogated.

It is claimed this is an autocratic power. This is admitted. All legislative bodies are autocratic in their powers, unless restricted by written constitutions. In this instance there is no restriction.

It is contended that the act of Congress extending the Constitution and laws of the United States over the Territory of Utah, in all cases where they are applicable, extends the constitutional privilege to Delegates and clothes them with membership as constitutional officers of the House. We cannot assent to that view. The very language of the act itself only extends the Constitution and laws over the Territory in cases where they are applicable. They cannot be applicable to the election of a Delegate; for, if they were, then Congress would have no authority to deprive a Delegate of the right to vote. To contend that the applicability of the Constitution in that respect extends to Delegates proves too much. It is clear, therefore, that that clause of the Constitution relative to the expulsion of a member by a two-thirds vote cannot apply to Delegates, because they hold no constitutional office. It is equally clear that the clause of the Constitution relative to elections, returns, and qualifications of members has no applicability except by parity of reasoning; and we do not dissent from the view that, so far as the qualification of citizenship and other necessary qualifications (except as to age) are concerned, they extend to Delegates as well as to members. (Section 1906 Revised Statutes United States.) This is made so, probably, by the statute. Expressly so to all the Territories, except to Utah Territory, and inferentially to that Territory. It follows, as a logical sequence, that the House may at any time, by a majority vote, exclude from the limited membership which it now extends to Delegates from Territories any person whom it may judge to be unfit for any reason to hold a seat as a Delegate.

CONSTRUCTION OF ACT OF 1850.

But, Mr. Speaker, I invite the attention of the House to another view of the legal aspects of the case under consideration. It must be conceded that if this House has lost its original, inherent, and unlimited power under the Constitution to attach whatever conditions it deemed expedient to the admission of a Delegate from this Territory of Utah, it lost it by reason of the enactment of the provisions of the act of 1850 organizing that Territory. It will be observed that section 14 of that act, after providing the manner of the election of a Delegate, declares "the person having the greatest number of votes shall be declared by the governor to be duly elected, and a certificate thereof to be given accordingly." And there it stops.

Whether thus by omitting to provide, as provided by the general act of 1817, that "every such Delegate shall have a seat in the House of Representatives, with the right to debate, but not to vote," Congress intended, even at that early day, in anticipation of the unprecedented and anomalous social and political condition likely to arise in this particular case, to preserve to the House, when the duly-elected Delegate, as in this case, presented himself at the bar for admission, the unembarrassed authority to receive or reject him, as its constitutional duty to so govern the Territory as to fit it for admission as a State might seem to require, is a question worthy perhaps of consideration.

But again, in considering the act of 1850 according to the settled rules of construction, section 14 must in any event be construed, as was insisted by the gentleman from Tennessee, as qualified by the subsequent section 16, declaring—

That the Constitution and laws of the United States are hereby extended over and declared to be in force in said Territory of Utah, so far as the same or any provision thereof may be applicable.

And the report of the minority inquires, "Now, why is the provision of the Constitution relating to the qualification of members not applicable to the Territories?" And so it may be so far as it goes. And the reason why it is not applicable to the case of a Delegate to the extent of reducing the House to the narrow rule prescribed by the Constitution for the admission of members from the States, is that the status and rights of the State are fixed and certain by its admission into the Union, while a Territory, being a State in embryo, with ever-shifting conditions, is subject in addition to those provisions of the Constitution applicable to the States, to the unlimited power and duty of Congress "to make all needful rules and regulations for the Territories."

Now, it is contended that this provision of the act must be held to relate to that part of the Constitution only which treats of the qualifications of members of Congress. But by its terms every provision of the Constitution applicable to the proper government of the Territory is made a part of the act of organization. And even this was a work of supererogation. For whether the act said so or not, Congress had no power by any act of legislation to throw off the discharge of any duty imposed upon it by the Constitution.

And by the act of 1850 it was not undertaken to do so, but on the other hand needlessly and in express terms declared its purpose to govern the Territory in obedience to each and every requirement of the Constitution applicable to the facts and circumstances of the particular case.

Whether these provisions then relate to the personal qualifications of the claimant or not is not necessarily material, for if they relate to any other fact or circumstance pertinent to the execution by Congress of any duty imposed by the organic law with regard to the Territory, then this House on its part is bound to the performance of that duty, even though it involve the abrogation of its previous action. But, as I have shown, every power and every duty imposed upon Congress by the Constitution is expressly reserved by section 16 of the act.

POWER AND DUTY OF CONGRESS.

Judge Curtis says in Scott vs. Sanford: "Whether a law be 'needful' is a legislative or political and not a judicial question." This House, as I shall attempt to show, has no more warrant under the Constitution to give aid or sanction or recognition to the unrepublican system that in reality dominates and governs the Territory of Utah, by admitting its ambassador to a seat on its floor, than it would have, under the same circumstances, to admit Utah as a member of the Federal Union.

The Constitution declares:

The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

Then follows in logical order the provision:

The United States shall guarantee to each State a republican form of government.

These provisions must be construed together. The first was clearly intended to devolve upon Congress the duty of supervising and governing the Territories, and as incident to the discharge of that duty, a plenary power, that is as stated by Justice Curtis in 1 Peters, 542:

All the power which both Houses and the State Legislature combined possess in the States.

And this doctrine stood unquestioned until slavery had outgrown its natural and traditional limits and was seeking judicial warrant for setting up its standard in the free Territories of the West. Then it was discovered for the first time that Congress no longer had the power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territories, but that it had the power to make all needful rules, &c., except to make a rule excluding slavery from the Territories.

But the time has gone by forever when any interest will be strong enough to compel such a construction again. And we of the North, who assailed it with the zeal that comes from conviction, and you of the South, who defended it with the courage of lions and the fury of fanatics, even to the pulling down of the temple of our liberties over our heads, now that that fever dream is over we are discussing the powers and relations of Congress to the Territories in a better and more philosophic spirit, and are substantially agreed that that decision was part of the old system, and that the organic change which swept that away buried also this doctrine under the results of the war.

As Paschal says in his Notes on the Constitution:

Congress has all the power of legislation which may be necessary and proper to guarantee the principles of republican government, and to insure the erection and admission of new States with those principles.

Justice Curtis in the Dred Scott case says, and his reasoning may now be regarded as settled law:

If, then, this clause does contain a power to legislate respecting the Territory, what are the limits of that power? To this I answer that in common with all the other legislative powers of Congress it finds limits in the express prohibition of Congress not to do certain things; cannot pass an ex post facto law nor bill of attainder, &c. Besides this the rules and regulations must be needful. But undoubtedly the question whether a particular rule or regulation be needful must be finally determined by Congress itself. Whether a law be needful is a legislative or political, not a judicial question. Whatever Congress deems needful is so under the grant of power. * * * I cannot doubt that this is a power to govern the inhabitants of the Territory by such laws as Congress deems needful until they obtain admission as a State."

Chancellor Kent says:

With respect to the vast Territories belonging to the United States, Congress have assumed to exercise over them supreme acts of sovereignty. Exclusive and unlimited power of legislation is given to Congress by the Constitution and sanctioned by judicial decision. The general sovereignty existing in the Government of the United States over its Territories is founded on the Constitution which declares "that Congress shall have the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territories."

Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, (page 30,) says:

The people of the several Territories may form for themselves State constitutions whenever enabling acts for that purpose are passed by Congress, but only in the manner allowed by those enabling acts and through the action of such persons as the enabling act shall clothe with the elective franchise to that end.

If the people of a Territory shall of their own motion, without such enabling act, meet in convention, frame and adopt a constitution, and demand admission to the Union under it, such action does not entitle them as matter of right to be recognized as a State; but the power that can admit can also refuse, and the Territorial status must be continued until Congress shall be satisfied to suffer the Territory to become a State. There are always in these cases questions of policy as well as of constitutional law to be determined by the Congress before admission becomes a matter of right. For example, whether the Constitution formed is republican; * * * whether any inveterate evil exists in the Territory which is now subject to control, but which might be perpetuated under a State government.

Now, if the two sections of the Constitution already referred to be read together, they may be paraphrased as follows:

Congress shall have power to make all such needful rules and regulations respecting the Territories as will entitle them at the proper time to be admitted by the Congress into this Union, with a government republican in form and practice and principles.

The Constitution assumes a pre-existing government republican in form, and guarantees that it shall be maintained.

The Constitution assumes that the political unit known as a Territory shall be so informed and pervaded by the practice and principles of republican government that it may be admitted into the Union.

And this places Congress in loco parentis to the infant States, commits to its care their training, to guide their steps and watch their growth to the end that they may adopt the practice and principles as well as the form of republican government. The United States cannot long hold this great Territory, with its teeming population, as a colony, and it becomes the duty of Congress to so govern and mold it that it may be fit for self-government.

The Census Bureau has completed its estimate of the population of Utah Territory, classified as Mormons, Gentiles, Apostates, Josephites, and doubtful. Of the Mormons there are 120,283, nearly 49,000 of whom are more than 21 years old, while 40,000 are less than 9 years old. Of the Gentiles there are only 14,156, of whom a little more than one-half are more than 21 years old. There are 6,988 Apostate Mormons, 820 Josephite Mormons, and 1,716 persons who are classified as doubtful. Of the Mormons nearly 37,000 are of foreign birth.

But had she a million of inhabitants within her borders to-day, and resources corresponding to her population, and stood knocking at our doors for admission, bearing in her hands a republican form of government, but with this mighty system of polygamy lurking in the shadow behind, usurping in reality all the functions of government and social order—were such a spectacle presented to-day, is there a man on this floor bold enough to assert, or wrong or reckless enough to vote to ingraft such a monstrous growth on the body of the Republic? And if some Congress years ago had passed a law prescribing certain things as the only conditions upon compliance with which she should be admitted as a State, and all those conditions were complied with to-day, would you admit her? That will not be one man asking for a seat on this floor, but a great people with all the muniments of the right of self-government, except this unrepublican practice and system, and staking their cause, as our fathers did, on the declaration "that taxation without representation was tyranny."

This will confront us ere long, and what better reason will you have for refusing to admit a Territory into the Union which more than possesses all the qualifications ever before exacted, on the ground that this monstrous and "inveterate evil" dominates the Territory, than you now have to refuse to receive its proclaimed apostle, its accredited embassador for the same reason? You have no right to strengthen and dignify this system by admitting their agent to a seat on this floor, because that would be in aid of a power which is at war with the principles of the organic law, the settled policy of the Government, and the spirit of our institutions.

CHURCH AND STATE.

And, Mr. Speaker, Utah is unrepublican because—

First. It is a theocracy stronger in practice than the laws of Congress, and seeks a union of Church and State.

Second. Because no political community can be republican that maintains a civil or ecclesiastical law which abrogates the American institution of marriage and substitutes in its place the system of plural wives.

From its infancy every step in its growth has been distinguished by the complete subordination of the civil to the ecclesiastical power. From its cradle in Seneca County, New York, to Kirtland, Ohio, thence to Jackson County, Missouri, and back again across the Mississippi to Nauvoo in 1840, it everywhere exalted the shibboleth of the prophet over the authority of law, and aspired to local independence and supremacy. The Legislature of Illinois, in the kindly exuberance of their sympathy for men claiming to be flying from unjust persecution, granted them a city charter so artfully framed that the laws of the State were practically nullified within the corporate limits of the holy city of Nauvoo.

Under it, its courts had original and exclusive jurisdiction; a little army called the "Nauvoo Legion" was organized and commanded by the prophet as lieutenant-general. Such open abuse of their hospitality and such high-handed defiance of their laws, led first to ineffectual prosecutions for treason, and then to the death of the prophet at the hands of the people, and their final flight beyond the borders of a civilization that abhorred and spewed them out, under the leadership of Brigham Young, to the shores of the Salt Lake and the fertile plains and picturesque valleys of that charming solitude.

And here, where, in the words of the old familiar hymn,

Where every prospect pleases
And only man is vile.

And fondly fancying themselves beyond the control of the Government, (as they have been ever since,) they set up the standard of the prophet, again proclaimed their right to govern themselves, organized the free and independent "State of Deseret," and planted themselves on the manifesto of Sidney Rigdon, their great orator at Far West, Missouri, in 1838.

"We this day proclaim ourselves free, with a purpose and determination never to be broken —no, never! no, never! no, never!" And with the aid of Congress until now they have kept their word. Up to this hour, and for more than thirty years, against the indignant protest of the Christian world, against the laws they have set at naught, in the teeth of a great nation that has vanquished every other foreign and domestic foe, this monstrous and phenomenal power has more than held its own.

WHAT HAS CONGRESS DONE?

And now, I ask, what in all these years of Territorial tutelage has Congress done to make such "needful rules and regulations" as would bring about the subjugation of this unrepublican and inveterate evil and prepare this embryo State for admission to the Union?

Congress in 1850, with a view of supplanting the "State of Deseret," gave Utah the right to govern itself, only subject to the Constitution and the laws of the United States so far as applicable. The Legislature organized under this law proceeded with all convenient speed to gather Utah, her woods, her mines, her fields and streams, her women and everybody else's women, from Iceland to the tropics, into Abraham's bosom. They re-enacted the ordinance incorporating the "Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints," and under it, through Brigham Young and the apostles, acquired vast tracts of the most fertile and inviting sections. They organized a surveroy-general's office and sold the public lands to the highest bidder. They destroyed the monuments of survey the Government had established, captured the records of the surveyor-general and compelled him to fly for his life. Brigham Young was the absolute head of the church, the vicegerent of Heaven and the civil governor of the Territory. In September, 1857, a little army was marched against them. Brigham Young declared the Territory under martial law, and threatened to resist the advance of the troops by armed force, but the pacification of the Territory was apparently secured, the troops withdrawn and the civil power remanded without additional safe-guards, conditions, or penalties into the reckless and wicked hands of the Mormon hierarchy, with no semblance of Federal authority except a powerless Federal governor and a baffled and despised Federal court.

Then followed the agitation of the question in the Thirty-sixth Congress, and Mr. Nelson, from the Judiciary Committee of the House, in the bill which afterward substantially became the law of 1862, calls the attention of Congress to the enactment by the State of Deseret of a law entitled "An ordinance incorporating the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints," and which was afterward re-enacted by the Territorial government, and which not only authorizes the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints to hold and occupy real and personal estate, but by the section of the act it is declared that the real and personal property of the said church shall be exempt from taxation, thus establishing a hierarchy obnoxious to the spirit of our institutions, and conferring privileges and preroga tives unknown to any other ecclesiastical denomination. Such monstrous power and arrogant assumptions are at war with the genius of our Government. He further says that the Territorial statute, being constructively an act of Congress, is in direct violation of the amendment to the Constitution, article 1, providing that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

Mr. Cook, in the Thirty-ninth Congress, from the Committee on the Judiciary, as to the memorial of Utah to repeal the act of 1862, says the humiliating fact is, however, apparent that the law is at present practically a dead letter in the Territory of Utah, and demands that it shall be executed.

Then followed the act of 1862, which provides, first, for the punishment of polygamy without providing any efficient machinery for the execution of the law. Section 2 annuls all acts which shield or countenance polygamy, but provides that this act shall be so limited and construed as not to interfere with the right of property legally acquired under the ordinance incorporating the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, but only to such acts as protect polygamy.

This left the church the owner in fee-simple of 400,000 acres of the public land and six hundred square miles of territory, and the power of the church undisturbed and unbroken and interwoven into every fiber and artery of the body-politic. The law was everywhere in Utah received with derision and has ever since been treated with contempt.

Later, Mr. Wade, from the Committee on Territories, in his report upon a bill authorizing the printing and distribution of the governor's message, which the Utah Legislature refused to print, says:

That the testimony taken by them disclosed the fact that the Territory was controlled by a sort of Jewish theocracy, graduated to the condition of that Territory, having a supreme head, who governs and guides every affair of importance in the church and practically in the Territory, and is the only real power acknowledged there. * * * We have here the first exhibition within the limits of the United States of a church ruling the state.

And there all agitation and deliberation looking to the breaking up of this "inveterate evil," all legislative effort in the direction of uprooting this theocracy ended, until the Forty-seventh Congress has at last asserted its unlimited power and advanced with vigorous measures to the discharge of its high constitutional duty. The fact that a nation of people can be gathered on this continent so besotted and ignorant who not only believe such rubbish as the "Last Revelation," but who would doubtless fight and die for it in the cañons of the Rocky Mountains with the same devotion as did the Huguenots and Waldenses in the valleys of Italy and France, demonstrates that extraordinary measures are demanded.

POLYGAMY AND FREE GOVERNMENT INCOMPATIBLE.

Again, Utah is unrepublican, because no political community can be free that maintains a civil or ecclesiastical law which abrogates the American institution of marriage and substitutes the system of plural wives.

In support, Mr. Speaker, of this assertion we have the plain lesson, the undivided testimony of all history. For example, when the world was young, Zimur led the savage nomads of the North to the conquest of the luxurious nation of Southern Asia. The sway of the patriarchal chiefs over the tribes having been unlimited the rule of the conqueror over the subjugated races became despotic. Revolutions in Europe have always resulted in more or less organic change in the constitution of government and society. But in Asia, while great empires rise and fall, the same character has been constantly transmitted from the former to the succeeding dynasty.

And lest the views already stated may be thought to take their color from the passion and prejudice of this heated and widespread controversy, I invoke the deliberate testimony, the cool and unbiased judgment of the great German philosopher, Heeren, the ablest of all writers on the constitution of the society and government of the "Asiatic nations," and the causes of their decay and degradation, when more than a quarter of a century ago he said that all his other reasons and "observations were not sufficient to account for the most gloomy phenomemon in the history of the human race; the fact that the fairest and richest portion of the globe, where the mind of man might have been expected to attain its greatest maturity, has in all ages been condemned to perpetual slavery." "How," he asks, "did their strength come to be so impaired that in the periods of their greatest prosperity they were unable to shake off a yoke which to European nations appears intolerable?"

To answer that question he says we must go back a step and seek the cause of the phenomenon in the defective constitution and condition, not of their civil institutions, but their domestic relations. Polygamy has at all times prevailed there; and polygamy, according to all the principles of our nature, has a tendency to promote unlimited despotism. No one who is aware how closely they are connected can deny the influence which the better or worse condition of the domestic relations has on those of society at large. The popular saying that a republic to be permanent must be founded on virtue appears to be only a consequence of the more general principle that civil freedom is closely connected with morality, and that the one inevitably perishes with the other. Now, there is no one custom more adverse to virtue in general—especially the domestic virtues, the chief sources of all true patriotism—than that of polygamy. By this we may explain the phenomenon that no nation praticing polygamy has ever attained to a true republican constitution, nor even to that of a free monarchy. Nay, it may be confidently asserted that it would be unable to maintain a government of this kind even if presented with it.

Polygamy at once produces domestic tyranny by making woman a slave and man a tyrant, and society at large thus becomes a combination, not of fathers of families, but of household tyrants, who by the practice of tyranny have been fitted to endure it. He who is tyrannical in authority will be abject in submission.

A plurality of wives also, as it diminishes conjugal tenderness, saps the foundations of parental attachment, and thereby impairs the interest which every member of the state should feel in its preservation and prosperity. The ideas of country and family, which among the Asiatics appear always to have been separated, if the first of them be not altogether wanting, have been ever closely associated in the minds of the nobler nations.

Attachment to the one has always produced devotion to the other; the best father of a family has always proved the best citizen; and from this source has flowed not only a respect for the authority of law and the magistrates but that heroic courage and contempt of death which fired the rude inhabitant of ancient Germany when fighting for his wife, his children, and his country, to rush upon the pikes of the Roman legions.

And so, Mr. Speaker, all along down the ages the human race has been marshaled in these two grand divisions. Asia, with polygamy on the one hand, after all its struggles and convulsions, to-day the same rigid, unchangeable, hopeless empire of force as in the dawn of the world. Europe and America, with monogamy on the other, through the ennobling influence of the Christian home, and the irresistible devotion to country it engenders, mounting through centuries of persecution and slaughter and the loss of all things, to the possession of personal liberty and constitutional government.

God, in the march of His Empire, has thundered His warning and planted His Cross in the sky. And if you will but listen reverently to these voices of the ages, you will retrace every backward step; take up your unused powers and proclaim to all the people that in the judgment of this House it is "needful," yea, imperative, to the adoption and practice by this embryo state of republican principles, that so long as this church rules this state, and polygamy inspires its thought and dictates its action, so long as its accredited embassador comes to us in the person of an avowed polygamist, a confessed violator of the laws of Congress, so long will this House refuse the Territory admission to the Federal Union and its agent admission to this floor.

I yield twenty minutes of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. PETTIBONE,] a member of the Committee on Elections.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Mr. Speaker, I happen to be a member of the Committee on Elections of this House. With other gentlemen I have prepared my views on this case and presented them to this House, and they have been printed. On yesterday my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSE] chose to designate the language which I had used in the conclusion of my report as extraordinary. I will read what he said as the text of what I am about to say:

Several members of the Committee on Elections, of the majority side, have favored the House with written reports, undertaking to set forth their reasons for denying Cannon his seat. These reports seem to be characterized more by a feeling of passion and indignation than by that calm judicial tone which should pervade such opinions given to this House for their guidance. My colleague, [Mr. PETTIBONE,] in the conclusion of the report which he submits, uses this extraordinary language:

"My voice and vote, then, is for a resolution denying to George Q. Cannon a seat as a Delegate from Utah, because it is in gross violation of the dignity of the House, and would be an insult to the sovereignty of the nation to admit a self-admitted criminal violator of the laws of Congress to a seat in the body whereof we are members."

That statement of mine is challenged by my colleague from Tennessee. He informed us yesterday that Mr. Cannon was a Delegate and had a seat upon this floor in the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses; and that when the question was presented to those Congresses it was determined by them, and each time Mr. Cannon received his seat; and the fact that he is a confessed polygamist is denied emphatically by my colleague from Tennessee.

I will now turn to the record in the Forty-fourth Congress, to the answer which Mr. Cannon himself filed in reply to the charges that were made against him. I find, among other things, the following by Mr. Cannon:

I deny that I am now living with four wives—

Then comes a comma, and then another statement—or that I am living or cohabiting with any wives in defiance or willful violation of the law of Congress of 1862, entitled "An act to prohibit polygamy in the Territories."

There were two things denied by Mr. Cannon. The first that he denied was that he was then living with four wives. The charge of polygamy against him he explicitly, emphatically, and clearly denies. That is signed by George Q. Cannon himself.

Now, I beg this House to recollect that the act forbidding polygamy in the Territories was passed in 1862. George Q. Cannon, himself being the witness, was not guilty of polygamy in 1874. What does he say now? In the trial of this case before the Committee on Elections of this House, when his attention was challenged to this very matter, with the counsel upon both sides present, with the contestants upon both sides present, my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BELTZHOOVER,] called the attention of the committee and of counsel to the matter; and in the presence of Mr. Cannon it was admitted that what I shall now read was in his handwriting, and it was a part of the testimony submitted to the committee. Let us see what it is:

In the matter of George Q. Cannon. Contest of Allen G. Campbell's right to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Forty-seventh Congress of the United States as Delegate from the Territory of Utah.

I, George Q. Cannon, contestant—

Recollect, Mr. Speaker, that he was the contestant in this case—

I, George Q. Cannon, contestant, protesting that the matter in this paper contained is not relevant to the issue, do admit that I am a member of the church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, commonly called Mormons; that, in accordance with the tenets of said church, I have taken plural wives, who now live with me and have so lived with me for a number of years and borne me children. I also admit that in my public addresses as a teacher of my religion in Utah Territory I have defended said tenet of said church as being, in my belief, a revelation from God.

GEORGE Q. CANNON.

Now we find Mr. Cannon in 1874 denying that he had then violated the statute of 1862, when his case was contested in the Forty-fourth Congress by Mr. Maxwell. He now admits that he has taken plural wives, that he lives with them and they with him, and that they have borne him children.

It was in view of these facts, in view of the fact that in the Forty-fourth Congress he denied that he had violated the law that was passed twelve years before—I say it was in view of this and in view of his solemn admission in this case now on trial, now up for final adjudication, that he was living in polygamy—that I said he was a self-confessed violator of the laws of Congress. I repeat here and now that he either is a self-confessed violator of the laws of Congress, or words in the English language have no meaning.

Now, what is bigamy? I turn to Bouvier's Law Dictionary. I find there that bigamy—that is the crime, that is what it is designated in the law. Polygamy is a generic term; bigamy is the legal term. Now, what is bigamy?

The willful contracting of a second marriage when the contracting party knows that the first is already subsisting.

I ask the attention of this House now to this definition, for it goes to the root and to the very meat of the matter:

The state of a man who has two wives, or of a woman who has two husbands, living at the same time.

Mr. Cannon says that that was not his condition in 1874, but he now admits solemnly that it is his present condition. The law was passed in 1862, and punishes the crime with fine and imprisonment.

What is bigamy at common law? I ask the attention of every lawyer here to this. In England this crime is punished by the statute of first James First, chapter 11, as a felony. When did James First come to the throne? History tells us, in the year 1603. That was four years before the first white man set foot upon the soil of Virginia; and under the common law of England, in the colonies of England, in the United States, at common law, bigamy has been a felony ever since 1603.

This man, George Q. Cannon, admits he is a bigamist and polygamist, solemnly admits he has plural wives now living with him, and he is therefore a self-confessed felon, (using the language of the common law,) a self-confessed violator of the laws of Congress.

Now, then, Mr. Speaker, I concede, if Mr. Cannon, or a Delegate from any Territory, was a member of this House, I grant, for I can read the Constitution of my country, that only three conditions are laid down, only three qualifications can be considered. What are they? Seven years a citizen of the United States, twenty-five years of age, and an inhabitant of the State from which he comes.

Is this man a member of this House? I concede to the fullest extent that if he is a member, or if any Delegate from any Territory can be considered as a member of Congress upon this floor, then, in the language of the Constitution of my country, I say we must admit Mr. Cannon. I make no subterfuge, I quibble not as to the law.

But, Mr. Speaker, what says the Constitution on this subject, that fundamental law which we are sworn to support? It is this:

This is what your House is composed of. Now, there is an old law maxim, which I learned as a law student, and which I have never heard denied by any lawyer, that the expression of one thing is the exclusion of the other.

My colleague [Mr. HOUSE] spoke yesterday of the Delegate from a Territory as being a member. It slipped also from the mouth of my friend from Texas, [Mr. JONES,] a good lawyer, as I am glad to acknowledge. Treat him as a member and then undoubtedly, gentlemen, you have the argument, but I dare you in the face of the oath you have taken, I dare you in the face of the Constitution of the country, to say he is a member of this House. I know it is easy to fling epithets around here. I know it is easy to say I am beside myself. But, Mr. Speaker, there was a man once, and, Democrats, probably you know his name; he went under the name of James Madison while in the flesh, and was known as the father of the Constitution. Well, in the first case that ever came to this Congress, the case of Mr. White, who represented as a Delegate the people of the Southwest Territory, the question was determined once for all as to his status. Mr. Madison, what do you say? I am taken back to the year 1794, and I seem to see the venerable form of the father of the Constitution rising and teaching Democracy to you gentlemen on the other side of this House.

Let me read:

Mr. Madison said that in new cases there often arose a difficulty in applying old names to new things. The proper designation of Mr. White is to be found in the laws and rules of the Constitution. He is not a member of Congress, therefore, and so cannot be directed to take an oath unless he chooses to take it voluntarily.

So much for James Madison.

Now, it may well be that I, Mr. Speaker, in my youth and juvenescence may not be right, but I find myself in eminently respectable company; and I say in regard to this matter as Byron said in his English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, when it was said by the poet laureate he was not altogether correct—

Better to err with Pope than shine with Pye.

And better for me, Mr. Speaker, to err with James Madison than shine with my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE,] an eminently respectable Representative of modern Democracy. What power have we over this subject? I have before me a citation from Chief-Justice Marshall. I am aware he did not know much law, but as he happens to be on my side I will quote him. Commenting on the provision of the Constitution that "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territory or other property of the United States," Judge Marshall, in The American Insurance Company vs. Canter, 1 Peters, 511, declares: "In legislating for the Territories Congress exercises the combined powers of the general and of a State government."

Is that true or false? I believe Marshall was correct. But I go further. I have in my law library a book entitled, "Cooley on Constitutional Limitations," and I find this among other things:

The people of the Territory, except as Congress shall provide therefor, are not of right entitled to participate in political authority until the Territory becomes a State.

I commend this to my friend from Texas.

What then? I have shown you passed a law in 1862 making bigamy or polygamy in any Territory a crime, a felony.

I say next that George Q. Cannon solemnly denied in 1874—and I have looked in vain through the record for evidence to contradict him—solemnly denies that he was a polygamist in 1874. I find in his own handwriting in this case he confesses now that he is a polygamist. And here he stands a self-confessed criminal violator of the law, a felon, if we may believe his own words out of his own mouth, and demands as a right the rights of other members, not Delegates, not envoys, not agents from a Territory not yet admitted into the Union, but the same rights of every member of Congress upon this floor as they are laid down and written with an iron pen in the Constitution of your and my country. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, that being so, I have held that it is beneath the dignity of this House to admit upon this floor this self-confessed felon.

But I have another word to say, and I challenge the attention of the members of this House to the wording of the Constitution. Why was it that in making the Constitution our fathers said that no qualification shall be demanded save the qualifications of age, inhabitancy, and citizenship?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I should like to have a few minutes longer.

Mr. JONES, of Texas. I have ten minutes of my time remaining, and will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Thank you, sir. I say why was it, in making the Constitution, our fathers established no qualifications save those of age, inhabitancy, and citizenship? Does not every lawyer here know that when the Constitution was adopted in 1789 that bigamy, that larceny, that murder, that all the felonies and all the common-law misdemeanors were then fully cognizable in the courts of the several States? This being so, Congress might well say—the constitutional convention might well say—we will leave the punishment of these offenses to the various forums of the different States. But when you come to the Territories, Congress, exercising the power of the State Legislature, as Judge Marshall says, shall take cognizance of them. Now, this is a different thing. A man may commit bigamy in Maryland, and murder in Tennessee, and larceny in Vermont, and those States will look to it. Why, sir, even in the ancient forum at Corinth, when Paul was brought before the Roman judge, Gallio said to the multitude if he, Paul, had committed any crime he would attend to it, but "if it be a question of words and names, and of your law, look ye to it."

Now, this act of George Q. Cannon is in violation of the law of this Congress, and one word in this respect. Why do they say this is without precedent? I hold in my hands the reports of election cases in Massachusetts, and I see that as long ago as 1785 this question was adjudicated in that State. One Jeremiah Larned had been elected to the Legislature of Massachusetts, but it turned out that he had violated a law that that Legislature had passed. And what was it? Why on election day he headed a riot for the purpose of preventing the collection of taxes. What did the fathers of that day do? They were not "idiots," Mr. Speaker. They were not men who were regardless of human rights even though they lived in the State of Massachusetts; and they held that inasmuch as this man Larned had violated the law which they had passed, although it was only a question of assault and battery, he was unworthy to take a seat upon that floor and they kept him out.

Now, sir, I recognize the chivalry of gentlemen on the other side; but I would be ashamed to be silent even if I stood alone on this floor on a question of right and constitutional obligation. But I say to the gentleman from Texas, and to the people of Utah, to whom he referred, and to the women who voted in that election for George Q. Cannon, that there is a state of affairs that demands correction by the strong iron hand of this Congress. Men and women throughout Utah, voiceless thousands among them, tied up, bound down, kept under control by an ecclesiastical despotism, the like of which has not been seen this side of the Middle Ages, voiceless to-day, whisper to you and to me to stand by the action of the Committee on Elections and say to Mr. Cannon and to men like him, if you violate criminally the laws which the Congress of this nation has passed you are not worthy to have a seat upon the floor of this House. You shall not desecrate by your presence this temple of equal rights and constitutional freedom!

Mr. JONES, of Texas. In the few minutes which I have reserved I desire simply to state the logical conclusion of the argument which I intended to make in support of the minority report to the effect that Mr. Cannon cannot be excluded from a seat upon this floor without abolishing the office of Delegate from that Territory. And in supplement to what I have stated already, I desire to say simply by way of conclusion that the Christian religion is distinguished from all others by the fact that it does not make or require the help of temporal or political aid, but addresses itself directly to the head and heart of the individual, and depends alone upon the power of truth.

It does not ask, but rejects as incompatible with divine truth, the aid of secular power.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 1290) to amend sections 2586 and 2587 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, by creating the collection district of Yaquina, in the State of Oregon, and authorizing the appointment of a collector therein.

UTAH CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, in the limited time allowed me it is impossible for me to discuss the questions that have been presented in this debate in order to demonstrate that polygamy and the practices under it are dangerous to the civil as well as the religious institutions of this country. It is not necessary that it should be done. As early as the Fortieth Congress a committee appointed by the House, and which considered that question, said:

Polygamy is synonymous with bigamy. Bigamy is under our law a crime, and polygamy is a monstrous bigamy.

It further said:

Polygamy prevails in spite of express laws of the United States, in open outrage of every sacred family tie, controlling the social organization of the community, and shaming the sense of propriety so long and well established among all races of Europeans on this continent.

It said further, having asked the question whether or not this power had been hostile to the Government:

Your committee believe that it is, and has been hostile rather from the inherent spirit of its creation than from any design on the part of that people.

It further stated:

That by reason of polygamy in Utah great crimes have been committed and have been let go unwhipped of justice. Open violation of the authority of this Government has frequently occurred. The sanctity of the ermine has been profaned, the course of justice obstructed. Organized assassination has been frequently perpetrated.

It is also a fact, as appears by the records of the judicial proceedings of this country, that the Mountain Meadow massacre was traced directly to the Mormon Church, and that twenty years after the commission of that crime, one who had stood high in that church—Stephen D. Lee—was tried, convicted, and executed for participation in it. It appeared in that trial that the Mormon Church not only winked at but had incited the massacre.

If all these things be true, Mr. Speaker, if that institution is anti-republican, if it threatens the safety of this nation, why should it not be suppressed? Why should any one holding to those opinion and practicing those tenets be admitted to a seat in this House? Is there no law or authority to prevent this? Is it possible that a man who is a member of a political religious association which is hostile not only to the spirit of our laws but also to the letter of the American laws and Constitution can claim as a right under that Constitution a seat in the House?

This question is not a new one. In the case of John Young Brown, of Kentucky, who was duly elected a Representative from the ninth Congressional district of that State, and claimed his seat by virtue of said election in the Forty-first Congress, the Committee on Elections decided that disloyalty disqualified him from taking his seat in the House. And yet he had never taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States which he had afterward violated; he had never borne arms against the United States Government; he had never committed any overt act; all that he did was to declare in a public speech, 1861, and afterward in a letter, that—

Not one man or one dollar will Kentucky furnish Lincoln to aid him in his unholy war against the South. If this Northern Army shall attempt to cross our borders we will resist it unto death, and if one man shall be found in our Commonwealth to volunteer to join them he ought, and I believe will be, shot down before he leaves the State.

Before the committee he admitted that he had used this language, but denied the authority of Congress to refuse him a seat in the House, inasmuch as the language did not constitute an offense or raise a disqualification under the Constitution. Mr. DAWES, the present Senator from Massachusetts, was chairman of the Committee on Elections. The political friends of Mr. Brown in Congress contended that even if he was guilty of disloyalty he could not be refused a seat in the first instance; that all that could be done would be to admit him, and then if he was guilty of any crime that would disqualify him from holding his seat he could be expelled. Mr. DAWES, in his argument in the House in support of the report of the committee, said:

If he has a right to enter this body, notwithstanding his disloyalty, what right have we afterward to expel him? And if we have a right to expel him for disloyalty have we not a right to keep him out for the same disloyalty? * * * Why would they (his political friends) expel a man from this House if he were a traitor? To punish him? Certainly not, for that is not the punishment prescribed for treason. Is it to overawe and restrain treason? That is puerile and ridiculous. What is it for? There is no other reason assignable except for the public safety. * * * If the public safety calls upon us to expel a member after he has put himself into his seat, because he has the life of the nation in his keeping, is not the public safety regarded more, is not the public safer by not letting him into the seat at all? The custody of the citadel is intrusted to your hands; the enemy approaches; you are bound to use all the means that are required to make that citadel safe. Are you to admit the enemy into the walls and then drive him out? Sir, the homely verse into which the speech of Colonel Titus was put two hundred years ago in the British Parliament, when Charles II undertook to batter down the doors of the House of Commons and trample under his feet the liberties of England, are a better commentary upon that position than anything I can say:

I hear a lion in the lobby roar!
Say, Mr. Speaker, shall we shut the door
And keep him out, or shall we let him in
To try if we can turn him out again?

I take it, sir, that the same question—the public safety—applies in this case, only with greater force and potency. In the case of Mr. Brown the rebellion, with which it was charged he had sympathized, had been over for more than three years. Every man in rebellion had long since laid down his arms. The authority of the Government was acknowledged in every part of the country. A loyal people had by an overwhelming majority elected to the Chief Magistracy of the nation the man who had led the Union armies to victory and the country to peace.

Here the danger which threatens the public safety is impending. The people of Utah and the contestant himself defy our laws. They scoff at the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. In the language of the late President Garfield in his matchless inaugural address:

The Territories of the United States are subject to the direct legislative authority of Congress; and hence the General Government is responsible for any violation of the Constitution in any of them. It is, therefore, a reproach to the Government that in the most populous of the Territories the constitutional guarantee is not enjoyed by the people and the authority of Congress is set at naught. The Mormon Church not only offends the moral sense of manhood by sanctioning polygamy but prevents the administration of justice through ordinary instrumentalities of law.

In my judgment it is the duty of Congress, while respecting to the uttermost the conscientious convictions and religious scruples of every citizen, to prohibit within its jurisdiction all criminal practices, especially of that class which destroy the family relations and endanger social order. Nor can any ecclesiastical organization be safely permitted to usurp in the smallest degree the functions and powers of the National Government.

I contend, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the public safety calls upon us to shut the door and refuse admission to any Delegate from the Territory of Utah until it sends a representative for a law-maker who is not a notorious law-breaker.

But the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE,] in his argument yesterday, contended that such a procedure would strip citizens or the United States of the rights and privileges that freemen most value—the right to vote and hold office. Why, sir, I read in the statutes of the gentleman's own State that for an act which is not a crime or misdemeanor at common law, and in but few States by statute, citizens of Tennessee may be and are deprived of the right of suffrage and the right to hold office. I refer to the act of 1870, 2d session, chapter 39, sections 1 and 2, as found in Thompson and Steger's compilation, volume 2, section 2437. The sections are as follows:

SECTION 1. The intermarriage of white persons with negroes, mulattoes, or persons of mixed blood descended from a negro to the third generation inclusive, or their living together as man and wife, is hereby prohibited.

SEC. 2. The persons knowingly violating the provisions of the first section of this act shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and, upon conviction, shall undergo imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than five years.

Under the constitution and laws of Tennessee any person convicted of a felony is deprived of the right to vote or hold any office of profit, honor, or trust thereafter. Thus it will be seen that the mere marriage of a "white person with a person of mixed blood descended from a negro to the third generation inclusive" is a felony in Tennessee, and on conviction the offender is deprived of the right to vote or hold office, which the gentleman prized so highly in the case of the lecherous, polygamous Mormons, who live in open violation of law. It would be well, sir, for the gentleman from Tennessee to revise the statutes of his own State before he criticises the action of the American Congress and condemns it for imposing, as a penalty for the crime of polygamy, disfranchisement and the further disability as to holding office. One who serenely indorses a statute which by its operation disfranchises a citizen because he marries one woman a shade darker than himself, ought not to be so indignant and wroth against a law that punishes a polygamist who boasts of four wives or more.

But the gentleman has still another objection. He says:

When I took a seat in this House I took an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. I cannot and will not swear to a lie even to emphasize my abhorrence of polygamy or to punish a Mormon, and with my views of this act would have had to do so if I had voted for the bill when it passed.

Why, sir, when did he become such a stickler for his oath that he needs thus, by innuendo, accuse other members of this body of violating theirs? I find by an examination of the Congressional Directory for the Forty-seventh Congress that in 1853–'54 the gentleman was a member of the Tennessee Legislature; as such he necessarily took an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. But scarcely was that oath dry upon his lips before he took part and participated in the rebellion of 1861–'65. He occupied a seat in the confederate congress, and he held some position in the confederate army; I know not whether as judge-advocate or not; but this I know, that he occupied a position whereby he necessarily disregarded his oath taken in 1853–'54. He has become wonderfully conscientious in this year of 1882, when he sees the monster polygamy about to be throttled, and he invokes the Constitution and his oath of office to protect it—that Constitution and that oath of office which he could waive and put aside in order that he might aid in the attempt to destroy his country.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him? I think it would be better taste for the gentleman to attack the gentleman from Tennessee, my colleague, if he were in his seat.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I was attacked yesterday by the gentleman from Tennessee when I was not in my seat, and the gentleman ought to be here. He ought not to expect to throw stones and then not be in his seat to defend himself if necessary. Have I charged anything against him that is not true? I refer gentlemen of this House to the Congressional Directory; and what is there I suppose he wrote himself.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. MILLER. Not if it is to come out of my time.

The SPEAKER. It will have to come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. MILLER. Then I do not yield.

Mr. Speaker, I think the true ground of opposition of this gentleman to the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections is found in that portion of his speech where he says:

> Mormons have been guilty of believing in, and some of them of practicing, polygamy. But they have been guilty of another sin also. They have committed the offense of belonging to the Democratic party.

I thank God that they do belong to the Democratic party. I thank God that every polygamist, that every man who disregards the laws of the United States in that Territory for suppression of polygamy, belongs to the Democratic party. I am also rejoiced that it devolved upon a Democrat, and upon one who in 1861–'65 spat upon the Constitution of his country and upon the oath that he took to support it, to stand up in this House to defend that monstrous evil. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MOULTON. How much time, Mr. Speaker, have we left on this side?

The SPEAKER. An hour and twenty minutes, according to the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. MOULTON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the passage of the following bills, in which concurrence was requested:

A bill (S. No. 329) to authorize the preparation and publication of a classified and analytical and descriptive catalogue of all Government publications from July 4, 1776, to March 4, 1881;

A bill (S. No. 954) to authorize the President of the United States in conjunction with the State of Texas to run and mark the boundary lines between a part of the territory of the United States and the State of Texas, to complete the survey of said lines authorized to be surveyed and run and marked, under act of Congress approved June 5, 1858; and

A bill (S. No. 1677) to amend the act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3548) making appropriations for the support of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House, and agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as managers of said conference on its part Mr. PLUMB, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. BECK.

UTAH CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. BRAGG. I am under obligations to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MOULTON] for giving me the opportunity to state the reasons which will control my vote in the case now pending before the House.

I think it was Macaulay who said, in his review upon the life of Byron and his works, that the general public at times, like the individual, become affected with the gripes. The public occasionally are affected with a species of moral gripes, which seems to have broken out about this time, and manifests a disposition to vent itself upon the Chinese and the Mormons. As I shall vote to give Mr. Cannon a seat here, I feel it proper that I state the reasons why, in order to show that I do not feel that I am affected by any gripes, either moral or otherwise, upon this subject.

I shall vote for him upon the mere cold legal proposition, and no other. I do not defend polygamy, nor would I defend infidelity. Infidelity saps and attacks the very foundations of the Christian religion fully as much as do the practices of the "Latter Day Saints." Yet I doubt if any member upon the floor of this House would vote against a man because he had no religious convictions at all, and belongs to the class which the Bible says "hath said in his heart there is no God."

We are not an ecclesiastical synod; we are not sent here as an inquisitorial body to make inquiry whether A, B, or C comes up to the religious standard that we have established for ourselves. We come here as a legislative body. The Committee on Elections of this House has certain functions to discharge, which in no wise affect a man's religious belief or his practices under that religion.

The first question for us to determine in cold blood is, Was the Territory of Utah, at the last general election, entitled to a Delegate in this House? Were the people of Utah entitled to exercise the right of franchise? Did they exercise that right of franchise, and did they choose a Delegate to represent them here as their agent? The majority report of the Committee on Elections decides, first, that Utah was entitled to representation; second, that the population of Utah did possess the elective franchise; third, that they exercised that franchise, and by an overwhelming majority selected as their Delegate or agent, to communicate to us their wishes, George Q. Cannon, who, the committee report, is not entitled to be received upon this floor as their representative.

Was Mr. Cannon eligible under the law? The only eligibility required is that he shall be a citizen of the United States, and I believe that that even is denied by the majority report, and they hold that there was no qualification at all. Then if he fills all the requisite——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRAGG. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] agreed to yield me some time.

The SPEAKER. The time of that gentleman has been exhausted.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman from Texas agreed to yield some of his time.

The SPEAKER. That is true; but nevertheless the time of the gentleman from Texas has been exhausted.

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. I had some time left at the conclusion of my remarks yesterday, and I will yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG.]

Mr. BRAGG. I thank the gentleman. I say that when the Committee on Elections exercised their functions they were exercised legally and properly in ascertaining these several facts. When they have found these facts all in the affirmative, they have no right legally, morally, or otherwise, in the discharge of their duties as an Election Committee of this House examining into the election of a Member or Delegate of this House, to go outside of the naked legal propositions which were submitted to them and bring in for the consideration of this House a discussion upon the question of the propriety or the legality of polygamy.

This agent, who has been selected by the polygamists to represent them here as their agent, has been here through two successive Congresses——

Mr. SPARKS. Through four Congresses.

Mr. BRAGG. Through four successive Congresses. He has borne himself as a gentleman in every respect. He has certainly not contaminated any member of Congress by any noxious doctrine.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] allow me to interrupt him in the little time he has to speak? I would like to hear from him, if he can reach the point, upon the effect of the Edmunds bill, the recent law of Congress, upon the right of the Delegate from Utah to his seat, whether or not it is retroactive? That is the point in this case.

Mr. BRAGG. When I rose to speak, I did so simply for the purpose of giving the reasons, without entering into any general discussion, of my vote on this question.

I have considered the question which has been propounded to me by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] and my view upon it from a legal stand-point is this: if Mr. Cannon was eligible and entitled to his seat when he received the franchises of his people which gave him that right to a seat, no subsequent act of Congress can deprive him of that right thus given him by the franchise which his people possessed, which they exercised, and which has become executed by the election which resulted in choosing him for this seat.

If the Committee on Elections desires to reach the question of polygamy, if this House desires to reach that question, if the sentiment of the country desires to reach that question, it must reach it by the disfranchisement of any person entertaining that species of religious belief which is entertained by the Mormons. And I doubt very much whether any member of this House will claim that the right exists in us to disfranchise any person in a Territory who by local law is entitled to the exercise of the right of franchise.

If they have that right of franchise they have the right of selection, and when they have made their selection, if they are entitled to it, we cannot deprive them of the benefits of that selection unless we repeal the law which entitles Utah to a Delegate. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, independently of all questions of polygamy or Mormonism, I shall cast my vote to seat Mr. Cannon as a Delegate from his people to communicate to us their wishes upon the subject of legislation.

Mr. MOULTON. I yield seven minutes to my friend from Michigan, [Mr. HORR.]

Mr. HORR. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to take up the time of the House with any general discussion of this question. I can state all I wish to say on the subject in a very few moments. I shall vote against seating Mr. Cannon as a Delegate from Utah, simply on the ground of ordinary common decency. He comes here before us and states unqualifiedly that he is living in open, notorious violation of law. In direct violation of the solemn enactments of a former Congress, with a total disregard for the common usages of modern civilization, unmindful of all the pure and ennobling principles that should adorn the society of this country, he states that he is living with three or four different women and raising a family of children by each one of them. What more do members of this House wish to know of any man? For myself, after such an acknowledgment, I shall not bother my head about constitutional law. I shall puzzle my brain over no legal quibbles. It makes no difference to me whether the same law applies to Delegates that obtains as to Members or not, I simply will not vote to seat any man in this House as Member or Delegate who thus comes and flaunts his soiled garments in our faces. It makes no difference to me that he comes trying to cover his shame under the guise of religion. The inspiration dodge is too thin to cover that kind of iniquity. Neither the bullet of the assassin nor the lust and lechery of the lascivious can be in that way hidden from the sunlight of day. The cry of religious toleration, of freedom of conscience, has no application in this case.

Let us suppose, to illustrate this matter, that some man should be elected a member of this House from some district, and the charge should be made against him in the press of the land that he is a murderer. When standing here at the bar of the House, suppose some member should object to his being sworn in and should confront him with the charge. And in reply he should say, "Yes; I kill people. I belong to a church that believes in killing and eating people. It has been my practice for some time past to murder and devour my neighbors. I know it is in violation of statute law, but my church has 'new light' on this subject. I know the Gentile world call us murderers, cannibals, but they do this on account of their lack of inspiration. It is one of the ways we have of worshiping." And you must not forget that there are tribes of men still living who slay and eat their fellow-men simply as a religious ceremony. Now, is there a man here who would vote to seat such a monster? Would our Democratic friends, who are so noted for their constitutional convictions, commence their usual worn-out phrases on that much-abused instrument in defense of that kind of religious liberty, the right to kill and eat one's neighbors. Of course, not a man in the sound of my voice would do anything of the kind. Still, every argument used in favor of seating Mr. Cannon would apply with equal force in favor of seating that kind of a man. This plea for freedom of conscience, religious liberty, all this hue and cry, applies with just as much force to the one case as to the other.

Can any man afford to worry his brain or waste his time investigating and debating such a case? Far from it. Life is too short and time too precious to be thus wasted. Hence it is, I say, Constitution or no Constitution, law or no law, I will never vote to seat any such man in this House. It seems to me an insult to ask that such a thing be done, and a waste of time to debate such a proposition.

If there has been anything for which I have admired the average Democrats of the past, it is for their ability to swallow disagreeable doses, to gulp down without winking or blinking any mixture prepared and offered them by their leaders. I am just now watching with great interest to see if they drain this cup with smiling faces. You, gentlemen, can do so if you will; I utterly refuse to taste or even touch it. As for me, I too have had an inspiration on this subject. After these election cases were taken up yesterday a communication, clear and distinct, came to me, and I trust it came too from the skies. This is what it said: "In voting to seat or unseat members drop politics, and see that only such men receive your support as themselves received the majority of votes actually cast at the polls."

That closed the Campbell end of this controversy at once. The next celestial utterance was this: "Do not permit any man to cover up assassination, lust, or lechery under the plea of inspiration. That kind of afflatus never comes from above. Men who claim that it does are always frauds."

And thus ended with me the Cannon part of this case. Thus you see the gentleman from Utah and myself approach this subject from a common stand-point. We are both impelled by an outside force; have both received "new light." His inspiration leads him to violate law and live in a harem. Mine compels me to see to it that all such imposters are kept out of Congress. Neither of us believe in arguing the case, because we both admit that inspiration speaks with authority; that where it begins debate should stop. Hence he and I can have no quarrel, for surely, while he claims such immunity on account of the recent revelations made to himself and the "Latter Day Saints," he will permit me to be governed by this supernatural light that so surrounds and compasses me about. Of course to me it is gratifying to see that in this case reason and revelation, common sense and inspiration seem to run in such parallel lines. But to Mr. Cannon I have only to say, that having received this "new light" my conscience compels me to follow it. [Laughter and Applause.]

Mr. MOULTON. Mr. Speaker, if I can have the attention of the House I shall be able I think to state in a very short time the views which I entertain. I shall confine myself exclusively to what I conceive to be the points in the case, and to the law and the Constitution that apply in this case. A very wide latitude has been indulged in by gentlemen who have preceded me in this discussion, some of them, as I think, not touching a single point that is really involved in this case. For instance, my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BELTZHOOVER] and my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] occupied most of their time in discussing a proposition that has never been contended for by the minority of the committee, that is not contended for by me, and has been admitted by everybody for the last ninety years, that there is a difference between a Delegate from a Territory and a Representative from a State. No person, so far as I know, has ever denied that proposition. It is distinctly admitted in the minority report; and more than that, one of the main arguments of the minority upon which they rest their conclusion is the fact of that very distinction. Therefore I say those gentlemen have spent their time in elaborating a proposition which I shall not seek to controvert. I admit that there is a difference between a Delegate and a member of Congress; and I shall endeavor to show the application of the law in reference to this distinction.

Mr. Speaker, this case comes here precisely as every other election case comes, and it should be treated in the same way. It comes here under the law. By the order of this House it was referred to the Election Committee. That committee has made a report. Let me say further to gentlemen on both sides that this case is governed by the law and the rules of evidence applicable to it, precisely in the same way as any other election case. Applying the rule of law to the facts in the case, as I hope to do, it seems to me that no lawyer can hesitate for a single moment as to the right of Mr. Cannon to a seat in this House.

My friend here from Michigan [Mr. HORR] says that he does not propose to trouble his brain about the Constitution or the laws. If it is only stated to him here, or he knows, that a man presenting himself for admission is a polygamist that settles the whole question with him, without reference to the Constitution or anything else.

On the other hand, my friend from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE] makes the admission that if Mr. Cannon should come here as a Representative from a State, although covered all over with the infamy of polygamy, he would be bound to vote to admit him among us. There is the difference between the two gentlemen. The gentleman from Tennessee holds that he would be bound under the Constitution and laws to admit Mr. Cannon if he presented himself as a Representative from a State. I say, too, that he would be bound to admit him, as polygamy is no disqualification under the Constitution; and I hope to show that the same rule, the same law, is just as obligatory upon this House with reference to the rights of a Delegate as the rights of a Member. If I succeed in showing this I hope that my friend from Michigan will reconsider the declaration he has, I hope, too hastily made. I shall omit much that I had intended to say, because I do not desire to weary this House. I shall only discuss what I consider the legal points that are involved in the case.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that since the formation of this Government—at least since the case of James White, in 1794—Delegates have been seated on this floor, and in the language of Madison in that case, under the rules of the Constitution and the laws, and as matter of absolute right. James Madison, then a member of Congress, and other distinguished men who had been in the convention that framed the Constitution under which we now live, all conceded, although there was then no law of Congress providing for the admission of a Territorial Delegate, that Mr. White had a right on this floor as much as any member, under the ordinance of 1787, passed prior to the adoption of our present Constitution, and obligatory at that time upon the Government by adoption. From that time to the present moment, whenever a Delegate has presented himself at the bar of this House, there has never been a question about his right to a seat here under the law and under the Constitution as much as a member. The books before me are full of cases recognizing the absolute right of a Delegate to a seat. I will not refer to these numerous cases which so fully recognize the right of a Delegate to his seat upon this floor. These cases and precedents are predicated upon the great fact of right, the absolute right, of a Delegate under the law to a seat.

Under the present law relating to Delegates from the Territories it is provided that the people of the Territories shall send Delegates who shall have seats on this floor with the right to debate but not the right to vote. This law was passed by this House and the Senate and signed by the Executive. It is absolute in its operation. It confers a right which this House alone cannot curtail or limit in any way whatever, as I think I shall be able to show.

Allow me to say further in this connection that under the operation of the law it is provided in various statutes of the Federal Government that Delegates shall be treated precisely the same as Members in reference to every right except that of voting. It gives them the same salary. They take the same oath. The same law applies to both in reference to vacancies. So on through the catalogue of the rights of Members. The law that gives a Member the right to be seated here applies equally to a Delegate from a Territory.

There is another proposition I wish to call to the attention of the House, and I ask the consideration of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Elections, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS,] to this point when he comes to the reply in the closing hour. It is this: Congress has passed a law by which the Constitution and the laws of the United States so far as they are applicable shall apply to the Territories. That law binds as much as any statute made by Congress under the Constitution. It has never been challenged till now, and has been executed and practiced upon, and especially as to qualifications for Delegates, for more than twenty-five years. It is important to be remembered in this connection that the Constitution is applicable to the Territories so far as it can be applied, because as I think important consequences follow from that fact.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the House for a moment to the proposition which has been made by the majority of the committee in their report in this case to the House. I think they have totally misstated, as they have totally mistaken, the law. I can do it in a very few words. The ground is boldly taken by the majority of the committee that Congress cannot make a law binding upon the next House as to the qualifications of Delegates from Territories. I will refer to page 8 of the report of my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] for the purpose of criticising it and to give him a chance to make an explanation of it when he comes to reply. The following are the exact words of the report.

He holds that it is incompetent for Congress and the Executive to impose on any future House the right of Delegates to seats with defined qualifications. That is to say, when the several laws were passed giving the Territories the right to this limited representation, those laws were binding only on the lower House, which permitted them to be, or made it possible for them to be passed, and were persuasive only to the Houses of future Congresses.

Let us analyze that. Here is a distinct denial on the part of the majority that Congress can pass a law defining any qualifications a member shall possess which shall bind the next House. That is the distinct proposition which is made here. In other words, although Congress may pass a valid and constitutional law fixing the qualifications of Delegates of Territories, requiring that they shall be seven years a citizen of the United States, twenty-five years old, and inhabitants of the Territories from which they come, and that if Congress passes such a law as that it is only binding upon the House that passes it. Let us test that and see where the logic of it carries us.

Here is the anti-polygamy bill passed this session which we nearly all voted for. I did reluctantly, I confess. Here is a law that does fix the qualification of a Delegate of a Territory. It provides in so many words that no Delegate who is a polygamist, or cohabits with more than one woman, shall hold any office of profit or trust under the Government. I should like to ask my friend to explain to this House the effect of this anti-polygamy bill. Here is a law defining the qualifications of a Delegate, although negatively, precisely as the Constitution defines the qualifications of members negatively; and I should like to ask my distinguished friend from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS,] when he comes to close this debate, whether he means to say that the law which we have all voted for providing that no polygamist shall take his seat among us only applies to this Congress and the present House, and that the next House in the next Congress can disregard it and admit a polygamist. That certainly is the logic of this report, and there is no escape from it; and if that is the law the anti-polygamy bill is a farce and a failure.

That doctrine is a heresy, in my humble judgment. Congress can prescribe qualifications as to the Delegates, and can bind the House by such qualifications. It is competent for Congress to fix the qualifications of Delegates from the Territories, they not being members under the Constitution, and to say who shall and who shall not be a Delegate and fix the qualifications, and when Congress has so said, it is not only binding upon this House, but it is binding upon every House that succeeds this until such law is repealed. That is the common sense of the thing and the law of the case, and it cannot by any possibility be otherwise.

Now, my friend in his report goes on further to amplify his words, as follows:

And with reference to the election of Delegates who (if they hold any office or franchise at all) can be nothing but agents representing the property and common territory of all the people; it operates only on the lower branch of Congress, for their election extends no right to them to interfere with the business of the Senate, or to act as members thereof.

Now, under the Constitution, Congress can make all needful rules and regulations in relation to the Territories. It has been decided that Congress is the sole judge of this power. If this is so, why cannot Congress pass a law, if it deems it necessary, defining the qualifications of Delegates as necessary and proper for the regulation of the Territories? This right and power has never before been questioned, and when Congress passes such a law it is binding on this House and every branch of the Government.

The view of the minority upon the question is this: that this House can impose qualifications upon Delegates. It can fix limitations with reference to Delegates, and when the House has made the qualifications that have been made by the passage of a general law already referred to, providing that the Constitution of the United States shall operate in all of the Territories so far as applicable, that that act and by that law they did fix and establish qualifications and limitations and by that act they adopted the Constitution as a part of the statute law; suppose they had put it in another form; suppose they had put it in this form, and had passed a statute adopting and restating the very language of the Constitution giving a Delegate the same qualifications that the Constitution requires for members of Congress, and that he must possess these qualifications before he could take his seat. I would like to have my friends upon the other side say whether that would not be a valid law passed by Congress and binding upon this House until repealed by an act of Congress. What is the reason it would not?

But, suppose we take the other view of the case, and admit for the sake of the argument that the Constitution is inapplicable, that it has no relevancy, and does not apply to the case, then what is the condition? Why, we are placed in this condition: that Congress has passed a law, as I have already stated, that the Territories shall have the right to send Delegates here to take their seats upon the floor. Now, if they have not prescribed any qualifications for the Delegates and the constitutional provision does not operate, what standard do you fix? Is the standard of qualification to be wholly arbitrary and at the caprice of each succeeding House? Now, does not this follow as a logical conclusion from the premises that where you have fixed no qualifications, no limitations, where you have not said who shall or who shall not hold the seat, or whether he shall be white or black, the people of the Territories are judges of the matter for themselves, and select the person whom they desire to send here to represent their interests? Congress specifies no qualification. Then the rights of the people as to the Delegate are absolute, and this has been the theory and practice for ninety years. The people have the right to stand upon the law; they have the right to rely upon what is "nominated in the bond." What rule will you apply when they are given the right to have a seat here, and come clothed with all of the power necessary to occupy it?

It seems to me that if you take the ground that the Constitution does not apply, then this consequence, as I have stated, necessarily follows: that you have said to the people of that Territory, "You shall have the absolute right to send a Delegate here of your own selection to take his seat under his oath of office, and you may exercise the right; but if the Delegate does not suit us we will not permit him to take his seat." I ask again, and I ask my friends upon the opposite side of the question to say, if they can, when this man comes holding such credentials as a Delegate, whether you can apply the constitutional provision to him as to qualifications that you apply to those who represent the people of the States? And why not apply the same rule? You say in answer, "He is outside of the Constitution; he is but the very agent of the Territory; he comes with just such powers as the law clothes him with, and no more or less." This we think no answer. The law could have fixed qualifications, but it did not, and therefore the presumption is that Congress did not intend to prescribe qualifications for Delegates.

The law simply says to the people: judge for yourselves, send up the man whom you desire to represent your interests, and he shall have a seat. I say that if there is no qualification prescribed by the law you cannot exclude him, the man whom the people have sent, after you have permitted them to send him and he holds the certificate of his election and comes here claiming his right to a seat. This House, under the law, has no power to exclude. Why, now, for the first time, after the Delegate appears, apply additional qualifications and say that if he is a polygamist, a Catholic, a Methodist, or an atheist, he shall not be seated, when there was no such provision in the law? By the operation of that law that binds Congress, that binds everybody, he is entitled to come here, and, no limitations or qualifications having been specified, is entitled to his seat. There are many instances of the operation of law upon that principle, which are known to every lawyer, and the law is to be construed according to the language and import, and nothing can be added to it by mere construction changing the law. Therefore, whether you take the fact that the Constitution as applied to him and the qualifications therein specified operate upon him, or whether you exclude that thought or idea, or whether he comes here under the law without any qualifications being fixed by it, you have no right to exclude in either case, certainly not in the latter case, because there was not under the law at the time of his election any qualification prescribed, and this House is as much bound by the law as the Delegate himself or the humblest individual in the land.

I want now, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the House, as briefly as I can, to one or two other propositions. I have forborne any discussion upon the number of votes shown by Mr. Cannon, naturalization, or anything of that kind; because it has been conceded by the majority of the committee that Mr. Cannon had over 18,000 votes and that Mr. Campbell had about 1,300; it is conceded that Mr. Cannon had been seven years a citizen of the United States, and also that he was an inhabitant of the Territory at the time of his election; if the constitutional qualifications are to be applied to him, that he is qualified. These facts being conceded, what is the reason he is not entitled to his seat? The gentleman from Tennessee says notwithstanding the infamy of the man—and I think the history of Congress bears him out in that—notwithstanding the infamy of the man, if he is sent here from a State he is bound under the Constitution to let him in; and if that law applies to a Delegate, the same logic would compel you to let him in.

But it is said here, and it has been stated repeatedly, that Mr. Cannon admits that he is or was a polygamist upon the 1st day of June, 1880. The principal objection that has been urged, and I may say the only argument that has been made, and in my judgment the only argument that can be made, is simply and solely that he was a polygamist, and therefore that he is a polygamist to-day. That is the argument and reason given why he should not be seated, and that is the naked question. Now, I desire to address myself to that part of the argument under the operation of the anti-polygamy bill before referred to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is there any evidence he was living in a state of polygamy since the adoption of that law?

Mr. MOULTON. No, sir. I want to say a word or two as to the admission of Mr. Cannon as to being a polygamist. I want to call the attention of the House in the first place to the admission that they say was made and the circumstances under which it was made, to see what force and effect it has and how far and to what extent Mr. Cannon is bound by that admission or how it affects him.

In 1881, in the contest of Campbell vs. Cannon, at the end of a deposition that seems to have been taken in that contest, the admission is made that has been read. Now, in the record there is not a particle of explanation given why it was made, or for what purpose it was made, or how it came to be there. I say there is not a particle of evidence in the record as to that. We are trying this case upon the law and upon the evidence. Some gentlemen have intimated that to exclude Cannon it is only necessary for them to know that he made that admission, without reference to what the law or the Constitution or anything else is. There is the admission. He protested at the time it was made against it, and says it is improper and irrelevant to any issue in the case. Still the admission is there, and it shows that he had been or was then cohabiting with plural wives. That is all it shows. It is an extraneous fact thrust into the record.

Now, suppose for the purpose of the argument the admission was made. We say very frequently we admit a thing for the purpose of the argument. That is done in pleading. But he makes it under protest, and puts it on the distinct ground it is wholly irrelevant. And I say here, as a lawyer, and I do not think any lawer on this side will differ from me, that so far as the issue between Campbell and Cannon was concerned it was wholly irrelevant to any issue in the case, whether you apply the constitutional provision of qualification or whether you take the law that makes no qualification. If the law prescribes no qualification then he has a right to come here and demand his seat under the law, whether he is a polygamist or not. There is the admission. This case must be tried by the law and the evidence.

Now, Mr. Cannon had the right to assume that polygamy was no issue in his contest with Campbell, for the reason that this House in the case of Maxwell vs. Cannon, in the Forty-third Congress, where the precise question was involved, the Committee on Elections unanimously decided that polygamy was no disqualification for a Delegate; and this report was made by Republicans, and the House sustained it, and Cannon took his seat. Therefore Mr. Cannon was justified in regarding polygamy as not being an issue and as not affecting his rights.

It is said that, the admission being made, the anti-polygamy law that was passed by this Congress operates and excludes Mr. Cannon. I admit that this law operates in presenti. I do not admit that it operates retrospectively; and I want to show to the House, which I think I can do in a very few moments, that this anti-polygamy law deprives Mr. Cannon of no right whatever, and cannot possibly affect him, for the reasons which I think I can give.

The first section of this act provides:

> Every person who has a husband or wife living who, in a Territory or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, hereafter marries another, whether married or single, and any man who hereafter simultaneously, or on the same day, marries more than one woman, in a Territory or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, is guilty of polygamy, and shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 and by imprisonment, &c.

The third section provides:

> That if any male person, in a Territory or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, hereafter cohabits with more than one woman, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and fined and imprisoned, &c.

And I want to say to my friends on the other side of the House that the first and the third sections apply to this Territory here; that they apply to Washington City; but I am willing to give them the advantage of the charity of the presumption that they have not violated this law since it has taken effect.

Then the eighth section provides—

> That no polygamist, bigamist, &c., shall be eligible for election or appointment to or be entitled to hold any office or place of public trust—

Under the Government. If you say that this law operates in presenti, if you say that it operates now, it does not affect Mr. Cannon in the past. Mr. Cannon, in 1881, on the 1st of June, as you say, admitted that he was living with plural wives. That is admitted, but there is no admission or no proof of any violation of this law by Mr. Cannon since the passage of the law. And before a man could be convicted of any offense the offense must not only be charged in accordance with law but must be proved against him. This law was passed this session. The admission was that he was living with plural wives before the law was passed.

Now, I want to call the attention of my friends on the other side to another fact, and I challenge contradiction from them. I say that Mr. Cannon was living in violation of no law of Congress or of the Territory prior to the passage of the act of this session.

You have all charged him with being a felon, with having lived in violation of the law. I say there is not a particle of proof of that assertion in this record; and a man is not to be sent to the penitentiary or condemned without proof. I ask my friends on the other side to take this record, examine it, and show if they can where Mr. Cannon has up to the present time violated any law of Congress.

The law which the act of this session was intended to amend is to be found in section 5352 of the Revised Statutes. Why did Congress amend it? Because that law, under which Mr. Cannon was living, only provided that if after the passage of the law, which was in 1862, any man should marry more than one wife, should contract marriage with two or more women, he should be subject to the penalty prescribed. That law, which the act of this session proposed to amend, does not provide that the cohabiting with two or more women in Utah or any other Territory after the passage of that law shall be a criminal offense.

Now, if it is true that the marriage of Mr. Cannon to these women—and his answer in the case of Maxwell vs. Cannon, referred to by Mr. PETTIBONE, would go to prove as well as all the facts would seem to show that he was living with plural wives—yet, if it is true that he was married to more than one woman, and the marriages were contracted prior to the passage of the law of Congress of 1862, whose defects the anti-polygamy bill was intended to remedy, then simply cohabiting with plural wives since that law took effect was no offense.

Prior to the passage of the law of this session Mr. Cannon was not living in violation of any law of the United States. If he has married since the passage of the law of this session, he having a wife living, or has cohabited with more than one woman, that would be an offense against the law. But I say there is not a particle of proof in the record or anywhere else to that effect. The presumption is that every man is innocent of any violation of the law until he is proven to be guilty.

The very passage of the act of this session shows that the construction I have given to the prior law is correct; that the prior law did not provide a punishment for cohabitation with more than one woman. That was the very reason why the law of this session was passed. And the law of this session operates only upon persons hereafter; those who marry more than one woman or cohabit with more than one woman after the passage of the law. The former law applied only to marriages. The law of this session goes further, and applies not only to those who marry but to those who cohabit with more than one woman.

Now, where is the proof that Mr. Cannon was married to plural wives subsequent to the law of 1862? Before that time there was no law in the Territory against it. That is the very reason why he answered as he did, as was read by my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. PETTIBONE,] that he was not living with plural wives in violation of any law. The statement was true at that time, because whatever marriages there were, had taken place prior to 1862, and the law of 1862 could not operate retrospectively upon marriages that had taken place before the passage of that law.

If you say that the bill of this session operates upon Mr. Cannon, you must recollect that the provisions of that bill operate only after the passage of the bill. The bill uses the word "hereafter." It provides that any person who hereafter shall do so-and-so. If the charge against Mr. Cannon is that he has violated that law, then you must show that he has violated it since its passage.

Let me say to the conscientious gentlemen on the other side of the House, and I hope there are many of them, there is not a particle of proof that Mr. Cannon has violated this law. Besides, let me state another fact. One person alone cannot violate the law. It takes more than one. There must be two or more women to consent to the marriage with one man or to consent to cohabitation with him under this law to make it an offense.

The act of polygamy as defined by the bill of this session consists in the fact and in the intention. A great many of my friends have read from dictionaries in regard to the definition of polygamy. Why should you go to the lexicons, to the law dictionaries, to Webster, or anywhere else, when the law itself defines what polygamy is?

Here is the definition: "Every person who, having a husband or a wife living in a Territory or other place over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction, hereafter marries another, whether married or single, or upon the same day marries more than one, &c., shall be guilty of polygamy." And section 3 of the act of this session makes cohabitation with more than one woman a misdemeanor, subject to fine and imprisonment. This description of the offense is clear, and it excludes every other definition or description of polygamy.

Now, I would like to ask the gentlemen who are to follow me to point out how Mr. Cannon stands amenable to this law or has violated it. The presumption is that every man is innocent until the contrary is shown. And that presumption applies to Mr. Cannon's case. You must have positive and distinct proof before you can show him to be guilty under this law. Suppose he was to-day indicted for violation of this law, would his admission in 1881 that he was then a polygamist be any proof that he has been a polygamist under this law? Besides, here is the great fact that stares us all in the face, the universal presumption that every man obeys the law, that he violates no criminal law. You have to show it by proof if you make the charge that Mr. Cannon has violated the law. This is the law which gentlemen say he has violated, and this is the law which many of you gentlemen perhaps will base your vote upon against Mr. Cannon.

Now, I say that since the passage of the act of this session Mr. Cannon has not violated the law. It has not been shown that he is now living with two or more women. It has not been shown that since the passage of that law he has married any woman, he having a wife living at that time. No one of the elements that go to constitute the offense of polygamy has been proved in any manner.

Now, what is the presumption of law in such a case as this? On this point I want to read a single authority from one of the Missouri reports, (29 Mo., 259,) a case almost exactly in point. It relates to the principle of presumption of innocence. In this case a party had charged a man and woman with living in adultery. An action of slander was brought. It was proved that the woman admitted that she had been married in Germany before she claimed to have married the person she was then living with. In the court below this instruction had been given:

If the jury find from the evidence that the plaintiff, Margaret Klein, was married in Germany to another person than Leonerd Klein, the plaintiff, then such relation is presumed to continue; and it devolves upon the plaintiffs to prove to the satisfaction of the jury that such marriage was legally terminated before the date of the marriage certificate read in evidence, or they cannot recover.

Now, the supreme court of Missouri, to which the case was appealed, declared that such was not the law—upon what principle? Upon the principle I have just enunciated, that the presumption is every man obeys the law; that where a penal or prohibitory law is passed the presumption is that everybody obeys it until the contrary is shown. Besides, even if it be shown that a person was at one time a violator of the law, there is the locus penitentiæ; there is the time for repentance; so that the presumption of innocence, charitably founded upon the experience of ages, and laid down in all the elementary books, prevails all the time until the contrary is shown. Here is the language of the supreme court of Missouri:

We think the first instruction which the court gave in this case at the instance of the defendants was erroneous. There was no presumption that a marriage, which was proved to have existed at one time in Germany, continued to exist here after positive proof of a second marriage de facto here. The presumption of law is that the conduct of parties is in conformity to law until the contrary is shown. That a fact continuous in its nature will be presumed to continue after its existence is once shown is a presumption which ought not to be allowed to overthrow another presumption of equal if not greater force in favor of innocence.

The court further says:

The presumption was that this marriage was a lawful one, and that the former marriage in Germany, if any such was established, had been dissolved.

I read further from the language of the court:

There was not any evidence in this case, so far as the bill of exceptions shows, that the first husband of Mrs. Klein was still living; but if this had been established, we think she was still entitled to the benefit of the favorable presumption that the first marriage had been dissolved by a divorce, and that it was not incumbent on her, in this character of action and under the pleadings in this case, to produce a record of the judicial or legislative proceedings by which the divorce was effected.

Now, apply that to this case. A year ago Mr. Cannon acknowledged that he was living with plural wives, which I have shown you was then in violation of no law of Congress whatever; I challenge any gentleman to show that at the time it was an offense against the law. Now you have passed a law making cohabitation with more than one woman and marrying more than one woman a crime. Why may it not charitably be presumed that Mr. Cannon as a good citizen obeys the law as the rest of us do? That is the presumption of the law; and if so, how or when has it been shown that he has violated the law?

A good deal of newspaper comment and hearsay testimony has been introduced here. I want to call attention to the fact that since the passage of this law the small remnant of polygamy which before existed in the Territory of Utah is fast disappearing. The polygamous relations of parties are being broken up. The influence of this law is operating powerfully upon that people; for they now understand that if they live in violation of this law they are subject to fine and imprisonment. The presumption is that under the operation of this law polygamy will cease; that there will be no more violations of the law, and this presumption applies to Mr. Cannon's case.

But gentlemen say that this law operates against Mr. Cannon and excludes him. In what way? There are three sections applying here. The first section defines polygamy and makes it an offense; the third section declares cohabitation an offense; and the eighth section, referring to those two sections, provides—

That no polygamist—

That is, no polygamist as defined by this law; the first and third sections cannot refer to anything else; construing the whole statute together, this is the legal effect of the law and this is the language:

That no polygamist, bigamist, or any person cohabiting with more than one woman, and no woman cohabiting with any of the persons described as aforesaid in this section, in any Territory or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, shall be entitled to vote at any election held in any such Territory or other place, or be eligible for election or appointment to or be entitled to hold any office or place of public trust, honor, or emolument in, under, or for any such Territory or place, or under the United States.

All the other provisions defining polygamy use the word "hereafter;" that is after the passage of the act; and it is incumbent upon any one making a charge to show that the person accused has violated the law since this act went into operation.

It is said—it has been said by nearly all the gentlemen who have preceded me—that Mr. Cannon comes here covered with crime, and for that reason we cannot admit him. This is the only topic which I shall have opportunity to consider in the time I have remaining. The proposition is that if a man is charged with an offense, it is the duty of this House when he makes his appearance here to exclude him. Now, I think it is a principle laid down in the books (and the precedents of the House are all in that direction) that although a person may be charged with crime, and even actually guilty, it is no consideration for the House upon his admission to a seat, under the Constitution and the laws. It may be said that this only applies to a member; but I think I have shown that the law and the constitutional provisions extend the same principle to a Delegate. But if the law does not apply the principle to a Delegate, then crime is no disqualification, because there is no law making it so, and you cannot exclude a Delegate upon that ground.

Now, all the precedents of this House say, and it is laid down in the books, that the only requirement resting upon a person applying for admission as a member here is to present his certificate, properly authenticated, to show that he has been elected; that when this is done you are bound to admit him. That is his prima facie case.

I want to call the attention of the House to what a committee has said in reference to this proposition that the allegation or fact of crime is no consideration for the House or for the Committee on Elections; that if it be true Mr. Cannon is a polygamist, it is not a question to be considered by the Committee on Elections or by the House, but that after he has been admitted, if his presence does not comport with the dignity of this House, he may be expelled.

I read from the celebrated report in a recent case where it is held that bribery or other crime committed by the member-elect, and which did not affect or influence the result of his election, could in no sense be construed to render his election void. That was the report of the majority of the committee, that if a man was guilty of the crime of bribery, (and it certainly is as great a crime in law as polygamy,) it was no reason why he should be excluded from his seat. It is further stated in this report, as follows:

That bribery by a candidate for an elective office (in the absence of a statute making it a disqualification) does not disqualify to hold the office at the common law was held by the court of Queen's Bench in Regina vs. Thwaits, (18 Eng. Law and Eq. Reports, 219, 221,) in a proceeding in the nature of a quo warranto to try the title to an office where acts were shown which were by the court held to amount to bribery, but which did not affect votes enough to change the majority, and the respondent was therefore held entitled to retain his seat as a member of a municipal council.

The same doctrine is held in Pennsylvania as to a sheriff, in Com. vs. Shaver, (3 Watts and Sergeant, p. 338.)

The English rule laid down by Cushing in his excellent work, without giving either the origin or reason of the rule, is calculated to mislead persons in this country.

It is quite demonstrable that the rule owes its existence to disqualifying statutes of England, and can have no application to questions arising in the Congress of the United States under our present Constitution and laws.

* * * * * * *

An examination of all the cases cited in Rogers, Douglas, and other English authorities, where a member of Parliament has been unseated for bribery, treating, &c., by himself or his agents, where the votes thus affected were less in number than his majority, will show that in every case the decision rests upon special English statutes, with which we have nothing to do.

* * * * * * *

In some of the States it is held that prior conviction of the disqualifying crime is necessary before such a rule can be applied by a legislative assembly. It is not admitted that either the organic act of a State or its Legislature can prescribe disqualifications of any kind for a member of the House of Representatives of the United States, but it may be proper to state here that the constitution of Minnesota (section 15, article 4) gives full power to the Legislature of that State to render ineligible to hold office any person guilty of crime, and that Legislature has not made bribery of voters a disqualification to hold office, but it has only made it a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment in the county jail. (Statutes Minnesota, 1878, page 5, section 66.)

It may be observed that under no provision of the Constitution of the United States does crime committed by a member in his election disqualify him from taking and holding his seat.

The reason for the English rule wholly fails in the case of a member of the House of Representatives.

Justice Johnson, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in an early case, in speaking of distinctions between American and English legislative bodies, said:

"American legislative bodies have never possessed or pretended to the omnipotence which constitutes the leading feature in the legislative assembly of Great Britain, and which may have led occasionally to the exercise of caprice under the specious appearance of merited resentment."—6 Wheaton, 231.

In judging of the election of a member, the House deals alone with the question of the number of votes the member received, and if it appears that he has a majority of the votes cast, excluding all illegal and void votes cast, and a full and fair election has been held by which such majority has been obtained, or at least the majority would not have been affected by any unfairness or improper practices in the election, then the conclusion is irresistible that such member has been duly elected.

In judging of the returns of its members, the House deals with the formal returns, at least preliminarily, on which a member is expected to be admitted to a seat in the first instance.

In judging of the qualifications of a member, neither the question of election nor returns is involved. The qualifications of a member of the House of Representatives are fixed by the Constitution of the United States, article 1, section 2, as follows:

"No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MOULTON. I should like to have a few minutes longer.

Mr. CALKINS. How much time does the gentleman require?

Mr. MOULTON. About ten minutes.

Mr. CALKINS. I move by unanimous consent the gentleman's time be extended ten minutes.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. MOULTON. Now, Mr. Speaker, here is a report which says in the face of a charge of bribery against a party that it is no business of the committee to inquire into it or to consider it at all, but that the only question which can be considered is the number of votes which have been cast and who has the highest number.

Mr. SPRINGER. What case is that?

Mr. MOULTON. It is the celebrated case of Donnelly vs. Washburn; and I wish to read the names of those who signed the report. They are as follows: J. WARREN KEIFER, E. Overton, jr., W. H. CALKINS, JOHN H. CAMP, and W. A. Field.

I understand this full and exhaustive report was drawn up by Judge Field and subscribed by these distinguished jurists. They have said in the strongest language that this House has no right to inquire whether the applicant was guilty of bribery, whether he was a drunkard or not, whether he was an adulterer or polygamist, but that the only question which they have to inquire into is whether he received a majority of the legal votes cast and came here under the provisions of the Constitution and the law.

It was upon that ground, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE] said that if Mr. Cannon came here as a Member instead of a Delegate he would be bound to vote to admit him. I have already shown that the Constitution and laws apply precisely the same rule to a Delegate that they do to a Member.

Now, the people who send a man here are better judges of the qualifications and ability and integrity of the man they send than this House possibly can be. Why? This House seems to exhibit a holy horror against any one who is a criminal or charged with an offense coming within its sacred precincts.

I say it is well known that murderers have sat in this House, that those guilty of bribery and convicted on the floor of this House have retained their seats. Herbert, of California, who killed a man in cold blood in this city, voted on the last roll-call of the House, after it was known to everybody he had committed a cold-blooded murder. Matteson, of New York, who had accepted a bribe, and on an investigation by the House resigned his seat to prevent expulsion, was afterward elected and took his seat in this House, notwithstanding a resolution was offered that the question should be inquired into. The House gave it the go-by, and that notorious briber, who had disgraced this House, and who would have been excluded from it by a two-thirds vote if he had not resigned, was allowed to remain in your midst, and you were bound to receive him under the Constitution.

I say the only standard which can be set up here is the standard of the law, and that law fixes the same qualifications for a Delegate it does for a Member. This House is bound by the law, and no such heresy ought to be permitted that one House of Congress can ignore the law made by a previous Congress and signed by the Executive.

There is another thing I should like to call the attention of the House to. It is a matter in which this whole question of polygamy as a disqualification has been discussed. I will send it to the Clerk to be read. It is from the case of Maxwell vs. Cannon, decided in the Forty-third Congress, when the same question was made as to his polygamy. You had no holy horror of his polygamist relations then. The Clerk will read what the committee say.

The Clerk read as follows:

"That George Q. Cannon is not qualified to represent said Territory, or to hold his seat in the Forty-third Congress, for the reason, as shown by the evidence, that he, on and before the day of the election in August, 1872, was openly living and cohabiting with four women, as his wives, in Salt Lake City, in Utah Territory, and he is still living and cohabiting with them."

On the question of qualifications, and the effect of making the Constitution a part of the law by act of Congress, the committee say:

"It being conceded that the contestee has these qualifications, one other inquiry only under this head remains, to wit: Does the same rule apply in considering the case of a Delegate as of a Member of this House? This question seems not to have been raised heretofore. The act organizing the Territory of Utah, approved September 9, 1850, enacts that the Constitution and laws of the United States are hereby extended over and declared to be in force in said Territory of Utah, so far as the same or any provision thereof may be applicable. It was said on the argument, that the Constitution cannot be extended over the Territories by act of Congress, and the views of Mr. Webster were quoted in support of this position.

"We do not deem it necessary to consider that question, because it will not be denied that Congress had the power to make the Constitution a part of the statutory law of the Territory as much as any portion of the organic act thereof. For the purposes of this inquiry it makes no difference whether the Constitution is to be treated as constitutional or statutory law. If either, it is entitled to be considered in disposing of this case."

Upon this point there does not seem to have been any difference of opinion in the committee.

The committee in the same case, referring to the question of polygamy, say:

"The question raised in the specification of contestant's counsel, and above transcribed, is a grave one, and unquestionably demands the consideration of the House. This committee, while having no desire to shrink from its investigation, finds itself confronted with the question of jurisdiction under the order referring the case.

"The Committee on Elections was organized under, and pursuant to, article I, section 5, of the Constitution, which declares: 'Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.' The first standing committee appointed by the House of Representatives was the Committee on Elections. It was chosen by ballot, on the 13th day of April, 1789; and from that time to this, in the vast multitude of cases considered by it, with a few unimportant exceptions, in which the point seems to have escaped notice, the range of its inquiry has been limited to the execution of the power conferred by the above provision of the Constitution.

"What are the qualifications here mentioned and referred to the Committee on Elections? Clearly, the constitutional qualifications, to-wit, that the claimant shall have attained the age of twenty-five years, been seven years a citizen of the United States, and shall be an inhabitant of the State in which he shall be chosen. The practice of the House has been so uniform, and seems so entirely in harmony with the letter of the Constitution, that the committee can but regard the jurisdictional question as a bar to the consideration of qualifications other than those above specified, mentioned in the notice of contest, and hereinbefore alluded to.

"We conclude that the question submitted to us, under the order of the House, comes within the same principles of jurisdiction as if the contestee were a Member, instead of a Delegate."

The minority said:

"It is admitted in the report, and the fact has not been and is not denied, that Mr. Cannon possesses the constitutional qualifications, unless the qualifications of a Delegate in Congress from a Territory differ from the qualifications fixed by the Constitution for a member of the House. There can be no sufficient reason assigned for the position that the qualifications are any different. * * * The line of demarkation between these two great powers of the House, the power to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members by a mere majority vote, and the power to expel its members by a two-thirds vote, is clear and well defined."

The "views" of the minority on the point were further expressed in these words:

"But a graver question than those we have considered is the question whether the House ought, as a matter of policy or to establish a precedent, to expel either a Delegate or Member on account of alleged crimes or immoral practices unconnected with their duties or obligations as Members or Delegates, when the Member or Delegate possesses all the qualifications to entitle him to his seat.

"If we are to go into the question of the moral fitness of a member to occupy a seat in the House, where will the inquiry stop? What standard shall we fix in determining what is and what is not sufficient cause for expulsion? If a number of members engage in the practice of gaming for money or other valuable thing, or are accused of violating the marital vow by intimate association with four women, three of whom are not lawful wives, or are charged with any other offense, and a majority of the House, or even two-thirds, expel them, it may be the recognition of a dangerous power and policy. If exercised and adopted by one political party to accomplish partisan ends, it furnishes a precedent which it will be insisted justifies similar action by the opposite party when they have a majority or a two-thirds majority in the House; and thus the people are deprived of representation, and their representatives, possessing the necessary qualifications, are expelled for causes outside of the constitutional qualifications of members, or those which a Delegate must possess, so far as his qualifications are fixed by reason or analogy, or are drawn from the principles of our representative system of government."

It may be stated that the reports, both of the majority and minority, were made by Republicans.

That is a precedent that covers the case before this House in every particular. It was exhaustively discussed in the committee and in the House, and was adopted by the House by an overwhelming majority, and it stands to-day as the rule and law of the House, unless it shall be reversed.

The issue in that case was sharply made, and the rule established that Delegates from Territories are entitled to the benefit of the constitutional limitations as to qualifications, and that polygamy was not a disqualification.

Now, if the rule that has been established and practiced since the formation of the Government as to qualification for Members and Delegates to the House is to be reversed and a different rule adopted, what standard shall it be?

This House may exclude a member on a charge of polygamy. The next House may exclude a person elected because he is a heretic or a Catholic or a Methodist, or because he had been charged by his opponent with adultery or some other offense.

Mr. MOULTON. We have associated with him for six, eight, or ten years upon terms of equality, and I am glad to see that my honorable friend the gentleman from Indiana in his report says that he is a gentleman, and that he makes no aspersions upon his personal character or honor. A legislative body like this where the members are elected by the people, who are the sovereign in this country, should not set up any transcendental standard of moral qualifications to entitle one to a seat. If a high moral standard was a prerequisite to a seat here, but few might find admission. The people elect men to office for their supposed fitness and ability to take care of the people's interests. The question of immaculate virtue is not so much considered. I think the law and the evidence is with Mr. Cannon and that he is entitled to his seat. It is for this House sitting as judges in this case to say on their oaths whether Mr. Cannon shall be seated here as a Delegate from the Territory of Utah, or whether he shall be excluded, and precedents, the Constitution, and the laws shall be violated, and the people of Utah deprived of representation.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, before demanding the previous question it is due that I should say to the House that Mr. Cannon has personally asked me for an hour in his own behalf. I make this statement for the reason that only a few minutes ago Mr. Cannon notified me that he would like to have an hour. I cannot see why it should be granted, as four hours have already been given to that side of the question for discussion by unanimous consent. Still, as a matter of justice to him, I feel bound to submit the fact to the House.

Mr. SPARKS. I can see very well why it should be granted. Here is the gentleman himself who is to be affected by the action here, and it would only seem to be a matter of right and common fairness to allow him an opportunity of being heard.

Mr. CALKINS. Gentlemen will bear me witness that I have not objected to the extension of any time of any gentleman who has taken the floor upon this question, but I supposed that the hour asked by the gentleman from Utah would have been taken out of the time allowed for debate upon the other side of this question.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if there has ever been a case where an application of this sort has been refused?

Mr. CALKINS. I understand, if the gentleman will allow me, the practice has been that when an understanding has been reached, or an agreement arrived at between the parties for an equal division of the time, that only that time could be occupied, and no extension of it under that agreement was allowed, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I would ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Utah be allowed an hour.

Mr. CALKINS. I am not going to object; but I do not consent, because I think it is fairly within the agreement that all the time on that side has been already occupied.

Mr. CASSIDY. I submit that the time should be granted, and if necessary that an equal time be taken on the other side of the question.

Mr. ATKINS. I would ask the gentleman from Indiana, if that argument is made, if it would not be well to adjourn and let the matter go over until to-morrow?

Mr. CALKINS. No; I want to close the question to-night.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed an hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question to the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Utah, the contestant, be allowed one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. There will be no objection if we can close up the matter to-night.

Mr. RANDALL. I will assist the gentleman to do so, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. REED. I think we can close it up to-night by extending the session an hour or two later than usual.

Mr. ATKINS. Is the gentleman from Indiana going to occupy his hour after the previous question?

Mr. CALKINS. I have an hour after the previous question is ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. That is usual. There is no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again submit the question. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. REED. It is understood that we are to close this question to-night?

Mr. RANDALL. I have only spoken for myself.

Mr. REED. I think in all fairness it should be closed to-night.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I shall object unless an understanding is reached that it is to be closed up to-night.

Mr. RANDALL. There has not been any effort at delay in this case and I have no knowledge that there will be any.

Mr. HUMPHREY. If we are to close it this afternoon I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The objection must be absolute, or the Chair will regard it as no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I shall not insist upon a vote to-night, but insist that the previous question be ordered and take a vote in the morning.

Mr. CALKINS. I will not agree to that. I want to dispose of it to-night.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again submit the question.

Mr. CALKINS. Before that, if the Chair will permit me, I will ask the gentleman whether or not thirty minutes will be sufficient?

Mr. RANDALL. He has asked an hour; let him have it.

Mr. CALKINS. Well, give him an hour.

Mr. SPARKS. Let him have an hour, and if he does not consume it himself he shall not yield it to other gentlemen.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that the gentleman will be allowed to give the hour away if he does not choose to occupy it himself. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CALKINS. I now demand the previous question, with the understanding that the contestant is to occupy his hour after the previous question is seconded and that I am to have my hour.

The SPEAKER. Is there unanimous consent to that understanding?

There was no objection.

Mr. CALKINS. But before calling the previous question I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MOULTON] to offer formally his resolution, that it may be read from the Clerk's desk and considered pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state there are three resolutions reported by the majority of the committee: the first declaring that Mr. Campbell is not entitled to a seat; the second declaring that Mr. Cannon is not entitled to a seat, and the third declaring vacant the seat of Delegate from the Territory of Utah. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MOULTON] is recognized to offer an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That George Q. Cannon was duly elected and returned as Delegate from the Territory of Utah and is entitled to a seat as Delegate in the Forty-seventh Congress.

Mr. CALKINS. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THOMPSON] to offer an amendment by way of a substitute for the resolutions of the committee.

The Clerk read the resolutions offered by Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa, as follows:

Resolved, That G. Q. Cannon is not entitled to a seat in the Forty-seventh Congress of the United States as a Delegate from the Territory of Utah.

Resolved, That Allen G. Campbell is entitled to a seat in the Forty-seventh Congress of the United States as a Delegate from the Territory of Utah.

Mr. CALKINS. I now demand the previous question on the resolutions of the committee, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, and the substitute offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. CALKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The contestant, Mr. Cannon, is recognized for one hour.

Mr. CANNON, (contestant.) Mr. Speaker, as I have not prepared any written remarks, I will feel greatly obliged to members if they will allow me to proceed with that which I have to say without interruption.

I did not expect when this debate commenced to have anything to say upon this question unless the necessity should arise such as I think has arisen. I would feel ashamed, Mr. Speaker, if I could get the opportunity that has been afforded me now, to go back, should the House vote that this seat is vacant, to my constituents without saying something in reply to the many charges which have been made against them by various speakers during this debate.

I am comforted, Mr. Speaker, by one reflection. That Christianity which has been so much vaunted upon this floor, and which has been held up in contradistinction to that system which many of my constituents believe in, was itself a persecuted sect, and its founder was crucified between two thieves. And from that day until the present every man who has ever stood among his fellow-men to declare principles which came in conflict with popular ideas has in almost every instance had to lay down his life as a proof of the sincerity of his convictions concerning that which he has taught. There has been no end of false statements made on this floor concerning the people with whom I am connected. But while this flood of false statements has been pouring over the country concerning the people of Utah, scarcely a voice has been heard in their defense.

Those who attempted to say something favorable concerning them in the first discussion which took place upon the Utah case were sneered at and were derided and laughed almost out of the arena, to prevent them from saying a word respecting the morality, industry, the good order, or other good qualities the people of Utah possess.

Sir, that people have suffered persecution, but I did not expect the day would come when, on the floor of the American Congress, the fact that they had been driven five times from their homes would be cited as a reason why they should still be ill-treated, and why further inhuman resolutions should be adopted against them. But this has been the case in this discussion. The fact that they lived in Ohio, the fact that they lived in Missouri, the fact that they lived in Illinois, and that, mobbed, plundered, and driven out, they took their flight into the wilderness, has been urged as a reason why they should be treated now as is proposed, as has been enacted in the law that has passed this body and passed the other House, and that is now on the statute-book, and also as a reason why the people should be deprived of their representation on this floor.

In 1847, Mr. Speaker, in company with a large number of others, I reached Utah Territory, which was then a portion of the Mexican Republic. While we were at Council Bluffs in the summer of 1846 a demand was made by the Federal Government upon the traveling camps of the Mormon people for five hundred young men to enlist in a battalion to go to California and fight in the Mexican war. Those five hundred young men enlisted, and they helped with others of their countrymen in conquering and securing California, which then comprised what is now Utah Territory and adjacent Territories, including also the now State of Nevada.

Before the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo we had reached Salt Lake City, and one of our first acts after reaching that place was to hoist the United States flag and to take possession of the country as citizens of the United States. Though we had fled from religious persecution there was deeply implanted in our hearts a love for the institutions of this country. We knew that there was no form of government on the face of the earth that could be compared with this under which we dwell; that the largest possible liberty that man could desire could be enjoyed under this Constitution, which had been secured by so many sacrifices. And though we might have formed alliances with others, with neighboring powers, there was no disposition of that kind. The people were fondly attached to their country, to its institutions, and to its Constitution. At that time there were comparatively few of foreign birth among the people. A provisional government was formed as quickly as possible, under which the people dwelt until they could bring their condition before Congress. As soon as practicable delegates were sent down to Washington asking for the admission of the country as the State of Deseret, this being the title that was given to the provisional government. Almon M. Babbitt came down here in 1849; John M. Bernhizel came down afterward; both of them acting as delegates representing the people, who, as I have said, had formed a provisional government, and enacted laws for the government of the country and the maintenance of good order.

In September, 1850, Utah Territory was organized, at the same time that New Mexico was organized, and at the same time that California was admitted into the Union.

Our petition to be admitted as a State was denied us, but we were granted a territorial form of government. The first governor of the Territory who was appointed was Brigham Young, concerning whose family and the size of it the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] told you yesterday. He was appointed by Millard Fillmore and acted as such governor for four years. At the expiration of that term Franklin Pierce, who was then President of the United States, reappointed him governor, and he continued to act in that capacity until the expiration of the second term of four years.

John M. Bernhizel came here as the Delegate from that Territory; a gentleman whom some few of the older members here will recollect; a man who in every way adorned the position, and whose conduct in life and everything pertaining to him was unexceptionable. He was here for nearly twelve years. He served five terms in Congress, besides the time he was here as a representative of his people previous to the organization of the Territory.

During his term of service here the law of 1862, to which allusion has been made, was enacted. He was a polygamist, as the term goes; he had more wives than one, as also had the governor of Utah Territory who served the eight years for which he had been appointed.

In 1866 William H. Hooper was elected to serve as Delegate from Utah, and continued to serve until 1873, when George Q. Cannon was nominated, elected, and came here to Congress. With the exception of one term that was filled by a gentleman of the name of Kinney, those three men whose names I have given have represented Utah Territory on this floor during the entire period of the existence of Utah as a Territory, now nearly thirty-two years.

During all that time not a question has been raised, except that to which allusion has been made in this discussion, the question in my own case. In the Forty-third Congress my seat was contested, as the seat of my predecessor had been, not because he was open to the charge of plural marriages, for it was well known that he had but one wife. His seat was contested on the ground that he was a Mormon, and his contestant claimed that no Mormon was entitled to a seat on this floor.

The first man who contested his seat had 105 votes against upward of 12,000 votes given for Mr. Hooper. That man came here and remained during the entire session, annoying the sitting Delegate with his claim to the seat. It was during that contest that all this matter was published which has been quoted by the other side during this discussion. It was reported by a member of the Committee on Elections from New York, who made this report individually, and, though appearing on the record, was responsible for it. That report was entirely his own, and it was ex parte and uncontradicted, because there was no fair opportunity given to the people whom it maligned to meet and disprove the statements which it contained. And like other statements which are constantly being made, they are again and again quoted as though they were true because they appear in this report to Congress. And if contests should continue they will be again quoted, and the same kind of ex parte statements which are equally unfounded, will probably be quoted from the speeches which gentlemen have made here to-day, when in reality they will not bear the least investigation, for they are untrue and without foundation in fact.

On the 2d day of November, 1880, in a convention of delegates from all parts of the Territory of Utah, I received, unsought on my part, the unanimous nomination for Delegate to this House. Notwithstanding all that has been said about Church and State, I assert here that there is no place in the United States where there is greater freedom and greater liberty for the expression of opinions by the people respecting the men whom they wish to serve them than there is in the Territory of Utah. Our political organization is entirely distinct from our church organization. It is true that the members of the church are members of the political party, because they are all—that is, the great bulk of the people, now numbering over 120,000 according to the last census—members of that church. We have no salaried ministers. Every man is a preacher who is a reputable man among us. From the midst of the congregation men are called to preach, very frequently without any previous notice. All the males over twenty-one years of age of good repute hold office in the church. It is this, and this alone, which can give any color to the statements that there is a connection between Church and State.

Now, I wish to say here that though I have had probably as much influence in political matters as most of the men in the Territory of Utah, occupying as I do a position of confidence among the people, I can state on my honor that beyond the expression of an opinion as a citizen when asked, at no time and under no circumstances have I endeavored to influence any man or any body of men in the Territory of Utah respecting the selection of any one they had in view for office. I have not myself used any influence of that kind that could possibly be called by any one improper. When I speak this of myself of course I speak of my own personal knowledge. But I think I can say the same for the rest of the leading men of Utah. Whatever influence they have used has been always to have the people select and vote for men who would worthily fill the offices. Knowing the jealousy there is abroad respecting this matter, there is the greater care exercised so as to prevent anything from occurring which would give color to the prejudice existing upon this point; yet of course where men have influence, if their opinions are asked their views will always have considerable weight.

All the forms of political procedure prevail in Utah as in other Territories and in the States. The people hold their primary meetings, elect delegates, and these delegates meet in convention, sometimes instructed whom they are to vote for and sometimes not, and every delegate has the right to express his views in favor of or against any candidate, and to vote for whom he pleases, and as the secret ballot prevails in Utah there can possibly be no interference on the part of any one to prevent citizens from expressing their unbiased choice for any candidate. It was a convention of this kind, composed of delegates from all parts of the Territory, which nominated me as Delegate to Congress. I had given my friends to understand that I was not a candidate, and had done so upon every previous occasion when I had been nominated; for you know, gentlemen, the position that I have occupied here now for nine years is one which no one capable of filling the place would desire to occupy. It is not pleasant to be made a target for every man who wishes to gain credit for his morality to aim his arrows at. In coming here, however, I have been sustained by the consciousness that I was at a post of duty where it was necessary for some one to represent the people and that I had the solid support of my constituents. It was the unanimous feeling of the delegates coming from all parts of the Territory that I should be nominated, and I received their unanimous vote. At that time I was occupying the position of a Delegate in Congress. No question as to my eligibility had arisen or could arise; my constituents had the best of evidence in their possession that I was eligible from the fact that I was at that time a Delegate in good standing in this House, with an unquestioned right to my seat, and was in the same position when I was voted for and elected. Directly after the election I came here and took my seat and served through the last session of the last Congress.

But the governor of Utah Territory, having an idea that he had the opportunity to gain fame and make himself popular, entered, as I have full reason to believe, into a conspiracy with others to precipitate upon the country this question, for the agitation of which a favorable opportunity had been long sought, to furnish some excuse for nullifying the election, and either making the seat of the Delegate from Utah vacant, or have a man occupy it whom the people had refused to elect. I having been born in a foreign land, he affected to entertain the belief that I was not properly naturalized. At our last interview, before I came to Washington to occupy my seat at the last session, he told me he thought some question would arise on that point. I told him then that it was a matter which the House had already decided in the Forty-fourth Congress; that the question had been fully examined and adjudicated, and I thought there ought to be some time in a man's life when the statute of repose should intervene to prevent his being annoyed upon a question of that kind, especially after it had been so thoroughly investigated. I told him further that it was the province of Congress to decide upon the qualifications of its members. But in accordance, as I believe, with this prearranged programme, he withheld from me the certificate of election.

I came here, as you know, and claimed my seat as I had done before. I courted investigation. I have been willing that this charge should be thoroughly re-examined, although, as I said, it was thoroughly investigated by the Committee on Elections of the Forty-fourth Congress, who unanimously reported that I was a citizen of the United States. Since this session began a distinguished Republican member of the Committee on Elections, well known, if not personally at least by reputation, to every member of this House, Hon. Martin I. Townsend, told me—and I will be pardoned for mentioning his name, because I have no doubt he would be quite willing I should use it—"Mr. Cannon, there is nothing whatever in this charge about your not being a citizen. I went to the bottom of that case myself in the Forty-fourth Congress, and if you are not a naturalized citizen I do not know where to look for one." But at this session my case was referred, and fourteen of a committee composed of fifteen members of the House have decided I was properly elected. Of that there can be no question; for the governor himself in my presence gave to the Clerk of this House last winter his decision upon the election; and in response to my question, in the presence of the then Clerk of the House, "Governor, do you admit that this is your official action?" he replied that it was. In that decision he stated (and it is his duty under the law to declare the result of the election) that I had received 18,568 votes and my competitor 1,357. This is the decision also of your committee; and further, they decide after thorough discussion and examination that I am a citizen and, so far as election and citizenship are concerned, am entitled to my seat.

Mr. Speaker, it is now clear that if I had had my rights I should have come here with a certificate from the Territory of Utah under the seal of the Territory, signed by the governor and countersigned by the secretary of the Territory. That would have been my position if I had not been defrauded of my rights. I say "defrauded;" it is not too strong a term. I was defrauded of my rights and thus prevented from taking my seat on this floor; and the country has been inundated with falsehood since the election eighteen months ago to make the public believe that I was not eligible to a seat. I have been held in that position until within a few weeks a law of Congress has been passed which now disqualifies me in the opinion of many gentlemen on the other side who previously favored my case and said that I could not be kept out of my seat on account of any alleged disqualification arising out of my marital relations. I have been held in this position, bound hand and foot, until the passage of this act; and now it is proposed to make this law operative upon me to expel me literally from the House, not by a two-thirds vote, but by a majority vote.

If any gentlemen feel that they can vote thus to exclude me and be justified in it because of the clamor that is raised about Utah and the people of Utah and the religion of the people of Utah, I do not envy their feelings, but from the bottom of my heart I pity them. Of course every man must be responsible to himself and his constituency and his God for whatever vote he may cast. I do not question the right of any member to vote as he may deem best. I do not quarrel with any man on that account. His is the responsibility. I do not do so now; but I say it is a great wrong to thus act. Whatever may be said about my constituents or myself does not justify the violation of the Constitution and the laws in my case.

It is conceded by the best lawyers in this House if that recent law had not been passed my case would have been a good one, notwithstanding the report of the Committee on Elections, and I could not have been kept out of my seat by that report nor by any reasoning embodied in it. This is the unanimous opinion of the best lawyers in this House. I had no fears whatever about the subject myself. I was undisturbed as to what the result would be. But when this law was passed I knew it was intended to furnish ground of justification for voting against me for many who were doubtful previously as to what vote they should cast.

Mr. Speaker, if religious prejudice, if religious animosity, if allegations against the people of Utah are to be accepted as the foundations upon which action in my case is to be based, then it is clear I am to be excluded, and cannot take my seat. If these are to be accepted as reasons why Utah should not have representation, then certainly all representation will be stricken down on this floor, and the seat of the Delegate from Utah Territory, legally elected under the laws and under the Constitution, will be declared vacant.

But I ask you, gentlemen, all of you, who say the people of Utah shall obey the law, will you who say we should comply with the law, religion or no religion, will you set us the example by smiting law down here, in what ought to be the temple of justice? Will you do this? Will you who ask equity from the people of Utah do equity, or will you deny us equity, and say we shall not have it because there are allegations made against Utah Territory; because they are falsely accused of everything that is vile, and charged with being bad men, just as the first Christians were when Nero burned them, made torches of them, and justified himself in doing so—will you, because of the alleged bad character of the people of Utah, be guilty of this great wrong?

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that before I would be guilty of that I would want my right hand to lose its cunning and my tongue to cleave to the roof of my mouth—ay! before I would tear out the corner-stone of this grand and glorious temple of liberty which has been reared with so much costly toil and sacrifice, tear out the corner-stone of the right of the people to representation.

That, sir, has been conceded to Utah from the beginning. You now prescribe by law certain disqualifications. This, upon no principle of fairness can apply to me. It would be an outrage to have it do so. It would be giving legislation a retroactive effect. I am just as eligible to this seat in Congress to-day as I was the first Monday in December, 1873, when the Forty-third Congress convened in this Hall of Representatives; for this new law does not affect me. I have not exposed myself to its disqualifying clauses. My eligibility has not been interfered with in the least. I have not committed any act which makes me any more unsuitable to that position than I was at that time. And if this idea shall prevail—which is the ground upon which the majority of the committee base their report—that every Congress shall have the right to prescribe new qualifications for Delegates to Congress, imagine the condition of the people of the Territory. They elect a man in good faith, believing they have a right to elect him, and because of some whim or caprice, through some change in popular majorities, when he presents himself for some reason or other he is objected to, and is told he cannot have a seat in this House because in the opinion of the majority he is disqualified.

It may be plural marriage to-day; it may be something else to-morrow, or some offense, real or imaginary, the next day; it may be the Mormon to-day, the man who believes in marriage, and it may be to-morrow the Shaker, the man who does not believe in marriage. It may be the Catholic next day and soon, to suit the ever-varying whim of popular caprice, if Congress can prescribe new regulations for Delegates from the Territories. Such will be the inevitable condition if the conclusions adopted by the majority of this committee shall prevail.

It has been stated that I represent a church; that I am the embassador of a church. Mr. Speaker, I represent the people of Utah Territory. I represent no church, and yet I represent every church that exists in that Territory. I am not here as an embassador from any church. I am here because the voice of the legally qualified people of Utah Territory have chosen me to represent them here. It has been asserted also that I have no votes outside of the community of which I am a member. I dispute that statement also. It is not true, if the testimony of voters themselves can be believed, for they have stated to me, many of them, that they voted for me.

We have a secret ballot in Utah Territory, and there is no means of knowing the candidates for whom votes are cast. I was voted for, if I may believe what I am told, by many non-Mormons. My last contestant that was in the Forty-fifth Congress received over 4,000 votes. There has been an increase of the non-Mormon element since that time, and as one prominent man from Utah said to me in this city recently, "Mr. Cannon, when we wish to get the seat of the Delegate from Utah we will send some man here with more votes than 1,357 to get the seat." This was said by a prominent non-Mormon of that Territory, and if the entire vote had been cast in the Territory at the last election I have no doubt there would be nearly 5,000 in opposition at that time. I am, therefore, a representative of the people of Utah, and if I do not represent them, certainly there is no one to represent them; but I am here because the law of Congress says that Utah Territory is entitled to a Delegate on this floor, and because the law said who should vote for the Delegate, and because the votes were cast for me.

But in regard to licentiousness, concerning which so much has been said, I wish to say a few words. Do gentlemen understand that if the people of my Territory, those who are accused of violating law in having more wives than one—I say do gentlemen, in considering this question, not understand that if licentiousness and lechery were the objects to be accomplished, that the people could reach this in a much cheaper and much more popular manner than by marrying women and sustaining and making legitimate their children? Why it needs no argument upon this point. The mere suggestion brings conviction to the mind of any person who reasons that the methods in vogue elsewhere and which provoke no wrath would be much more likely to have been adopted to accomplish such a purpose if that had been the object.

Why should I stand here and be assailed, abused, and denounced as I have been for lechery, because of marrying wives? Was it necessary that wives should be taken to gratify sensuality? I have no need to take any wife to accomplish that. I have no need to take to myself the burden and responsibility of a family for that purpose. The people I represent would not need to be kept out of the Union (that being, we are told, the great reason that Utah has not sooner been admitted as one of the States) if the motives which have been attributed to them on this floor were the ones which have prompted them to contract marriages. There would be no necessity to place themselves in such a peculiar position if the gratification of passion were, as alleged, the sole object. What, then, is it?

Mr. Speaker, the people of Utah have profound convictions concerning many things. They have left their homes more than once for the sake of religion, and have been forced to make themselves new homes in a distant land. Marriage is an institution concerning which they have strong convictions. It may be said that this is not religion; but whether it is or not, they believe it to be religion. The Catholic has ideas as to what is religion. The Episcopalian has his ideas also upon the same subject; so with the Presbyterians, the Methodists, the Baptists, the Quakers, the Unitarians, and others; and who shall decide, until the great day when men shall be judged and rewarded or punished for the deeds done in the body, between them?

My constituents believe that God has given a command concerning marriage and that He never gives a command without an object, and that object in this instance is to redeem the human family from the terrible evils under which in modern society it groans. It may be asked how redeem them? We answer by making marriage honorable; by uplifting it, by elevating it above its present condition; by giving every woman an opportunity to be a wife and mother. To cut off opportunity for prostitution and concubinage, and to leave no margin for lust to prey upon. It may be said that the sexes are so evenly divided that there is not sufficient disparity between their numbers to justify the adoption of such a principle.

The people of Utah do not believe that plural marriage ought to be or can be universal. In Utah itself it is not possible, for the males outnumber the females. But give every woman the opportunity to marry, punish fornication and adultery, and what woman would occupy an illicit relation with the other sex? The people of Utah believe that at the present time marriage is falling into desuetude, and in consequence corruption is spreading over the land. And we have felt that the country was big enough to allow us in far-off Utah, not interfering with others, not forcing our views upon others, to test the effect of the patriarchal system of marriage in checking the tide of vice and preventing the spread of evils which modern society acknowledges its powerlessness to extirpate.

I do not think it would be wise under present circumstances that I should say anything more on this question. You may depend upon it, however, that there are more arguments in its favor than you have heard here or are likely to hear, and that the men and women choosing to embrace that principle are able to assign good and sufficient reasons for doing so.

I shall not allude to it from a scriptural stand-point. I may say, however, that so far as the condemnation of the world is concerned we are willing to be placed on the same plane with Abraham. And when we pray to go to Abraham's bosom we expect he will not look upon us as aliens or law-breakers; and when we pray to go to the New Jerusalem over each of whose twelve gates is written the name of each one of the twelve patriarchs, the sons of Jacob, we expect when we pass through those gates we shall not be ashamed to be known for what we are.

Since the commencement of this debate the statement has been made, and it has been made so frequently that I feel as though I ought to say something in regard to it in connection with this case; I mean the statement respecting the alleged conduct of the people of Utah in absorbing all the public lands. In the first speech on the Utah case the allegation was made that the people of Utah, in pursuance of a well-defined and settled policy, had absorbed all the public lands. It would seem as though it were unnecessary for any person, and for myself particularly, to say one word in relation to this matter, it being so well known that in Utah Territory, as well as in the other Territories and States over which the land laws have been extended, every person can obtain land that is not occupied, every citizen who has the right to pre-empt or homestead land, and that there is no power in the local legislatures to alienate the lands or to take away the title and bestow it upon any individual. Acts of the Legislative Assembly of Utah Territory have been quoted to sustain the idea that they have really given title or sought to dispose of the public lands. At no time and under no circumstances was any action of this kind taken with a view to bestow the ownership or title upon any person who might occupy the land or to whom any grant might be given.

But our cañon roads had to be made, and it required some action on the part of the Legislature to induce men to build costly roads into our mountains and to build bridges over our cañon streams. I have known cañon roads there costing over $12,000 to be swept away by one single storm. Grants of this kind were given in the early days of the Territory for such purposes and also for herd grounds and for other purposes, that local rights might be preserved. If such had been the design it would have been futile. We lived in Utah Territory for twenty years before the land laws were extended over us; we had to do the best we could. As soon as these laws were extended over our Territory we then obtained title to our lands. These towns which have been spoken of could only get the same amount of land to their population that towns in other parts of the United States obtained. Where the inhabitants number one hundred, the law says, and less than two hundred, sites shall embrace not exceeding three hundred and twenty acres, and so on. The highest number that was allowed was 1,280 acres. That was to a town containing five thousand inhabitants. Now, Salt Lake City had outgrown the conditions for which the town-site act was designed and the inhabitants could not obtain title under it to their homes. My predecessor, Hon. W. H. Hooper, succeeded in getting a special act of Congress passed to meet the exigency.

The boundaries of the incorporated cities of Utah Territory were made very extensive. There was a good reason for this. It is to be found in the fact that the settlements of Utah Territory were differently situated from those of every other part of the country. We had to do our farming by means of irrigation. We had to adopt the Mexican system of living in pueblos or villages. And it was thought a wise thing for municipal authority to be extended over the farms, the fields, the water; so that the water could be controlled and come within municipal regulations, and that men who farmed in the country might be within the towns and have the social advantages, the school advantages, and other advantages that were there to be obtained. Besides it was an Indian country and we had to live in villages to secure protection. But under the old law no man could pre-empt inside of an incorporated city. This was found out after the land laws were extended over the Territory.

It was not supposed at the time these incorporations were granted that they would thus interfere with the settlement of lands outside of the town-site limits; and it put the Mormon people as much as it did all others to great inconvenience. They could not obtain title to their lands any more than any one else until a law was passed by Congress which relieved the people in that respect in that Territory and in all the Territories; so that every settler who came within the limits of an incorporated city could obtain his land if it was open to pre-emption or homestead entry. That is all there is connected with this allegation that the people of Utah have plastered the whole country with their incorporations in order to prevent settlement.

Another point, Mr. Speaker, in connection with this case. Let the resolution that has been proposed by the majority of the Committee on Elections be adopted and what will be the result? Nearly eighteen months have elapsed since the election for this Congress. President Hayes was President of the United States at that time. President Garfield succeeded him. President Arthur now fills the executive chair. During these three administrations the governor of Utah Territory, who ruthlessly violated the law and robbed the people of their franchises, still occupies that position.

Let this seat of the Delegate from Utah be declared vacant, and you say to every governor in the United States who acts as a ministerial officer in declaring the results of elections, "You can give certificates to men not elected with impunity if we are in power, as was done in the Utah case, and no one will call you in question." And the returning board which goes to Utah Territory under the law just passed, if not superior men, will feel emboldened to do the same thing with every man who may be elected under that law, and who may be displeasing to a majority of that board. They may assume the same right, and say to the man, "You have received the votes, but we question your right, your eligibility, and we refuse to give you the certificate." Gentlemen can see what the effect will be.

You may depend upon it that the consequences of this action, if the report of the majority of the committee be adopted, will not end with Utah Territory. Crystallize this fraud, make it effective by your votes, and its consequences will be far-reaching and extensive. The Delegate-elect from Utah may be an insignificant person, but a great principle is involved in this case. It will not be the Mormons always. There will be some one else, perhaps, who will be unpopular. There will be some party in the minority against whom strong prejudices will be aroused and strong feelings evoked. This case will be cited as a precedent for refusing right and justice to such persons, and it will be pleaded in justification that this Forty-seventh Congress indorsed such action by sustaining the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections. A great wrong of this character cannot be perpetrated even upon the people of Utah without producing terrible results, which will be far-reaching and widespread.

There is one statement which I feel that I ought not to permit to pass unchallenged. It was stated upon this floor by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BELTZHOOVER,] and he assigned it as a strong reason for joining in the majority report, that in the Forty-third Congress I had unequivocally denied that I was what I have since acknowledged myself to be. And the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE] made that the foundation for his argument. He read from the statement which I made in the Forty-third Congress, and he certainly has an admirable way of reading anything so as to make it suit the purpose of his own argument. He read:

> I deny that I am now living with four wives.

And then he paused. Well, if that were without qualification it would look as though the gentleman from Pennsylvania was quite correct in saying that I had unequivocally denied the accusation. But there is something else in the sentence. There is a parenthetical sentence—"or that I am living or cohabiting with any wives"—which may be omitted. It will read then in this way:

> I deny that I am now living with four wives in defiance or willful violation of the laws of Congress, &c.

I denied it then and I can deny it now. I never defiantly or willfully violated any law. In response to the tenth allegation contained in the statement, I said:

> I deny that I am now living or have ever lived in violation of the laws of God, man, my country, decency, or civilization, or of any law of the United States.

Every lawyer knows that in pleading for the purposes of the action in controversy allegations are denied and proofs are called for, or a defendant might violate the old common-law rule that a man is not bound to accuse himself but to leave the burden of proof to rest upon his opponent. But to show that the members of the committee in the Forty-third Congress understood exactly my position, for I want to make it so clear that it cannot be disputed, that that issue was raised and was accepted and was recognized as the true issue, I will read from their report. Before doing so I may say that the full committee decided, notwithstanding the accusation that had been made that I was not entitled to my seat because of marital relations, that these relations were not a disqualification for a seat upon this floor and the majority reported these resolutions.

> 1. Resolved, That George R. Maxwell was not elected, and is not entitled, to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Forty-third Congress as Delegate from the Territory of Utah.
> 2. Resolved, That George Q. Cannon was elected and returned as a Delegate from the Territory of Utah to the seat in the Forty-third Congress.

There the majority of the committee stopped. But a minority of the committee reported the following resolution:

> Resolved, That George Q. Cannon was duly elected and returned as Delegate from the Territory of Utah, and is entitled to a seat as a Delegate in the Forty-third Congress.

The issue in controversy, and upon which the contest was based, was brought plainly before the House, and the House by about a two-third vote adopted the majority report and the supplemental minority report. In the report which was made by the minority of the committtee it was stated that—

> The majority of the committee have failed and decline to report a resolution to the effect that George Q. Cannon was entitled to the seat upon the ground that he was disqualified by reason of the fact that he was the husband of more than one wife, and, as is assumed, is guilty of a violation of the act of Congress, &c.

You will see by this that the issue was fairly brought before the Committee on Elections; it was not only brought fairly before the Committee on Elections but it was brought fairly before this House. And this House, with the full knowledge of all the facts, thoroughly conversant with the statement made concerning me upon this point, and which I neither disputed nor denied, this House of a Republican Congress, by a vote of about two-thirds of the members present, confirmed me in my seat.

In the Forty-fourth Congress the same issue was made and the same resolutions were adopted. The House being pressed for time on account of business, the sub-committee did not report to the House, thinking it unnecessary to do so, as I already had my seat.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. I would like the indulgence of the House merely to clear up one other point.

There was no objection, and the time of Mr. Cannon, of Utah, was extended.

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. After I had been confirmed to my right to a seat in the Forty-third Congress a resolution was introduced by a member of the Committee on Elections making charges against me concerning marriages, and the committee was authorized to investigate the matter. The committee in submitting their report made this statement:

> Your committee think the evidence, unchallenged as it is by the Delegate, establishes, &c.

That is, that I was living with more wives than one. The committee then reported a resolution that George Q. Cannon, Delegate from Utah, being found upon due consideration of the evidence submitted, and not controverted by said Cannon, to be an actual polygamist, &c.

The committee was authorized to report to the House, but when it did report the House refused to consider the report, and the case was dismissed. That was in the Republican Forty-third Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I find myself in this position: I am here as the Delegate from Utah Territory regularly elected, properly qualified, fully entitled to the seat. My constituents, as well as myself, believed at the time of my election that there was no barrier to prevent me from taking my seat. Nothing has occurred since my election to interpose any such barrier. All these charges which are made against my constituency, which I have not time to allude to in detail or to disprove, but which I do state are false, all these charges were in existence years and years ago. They were in existence in the Forty-sixth Congress, in the Forty-fifth, in the Forty-fourth, in the Forty-third Congresses. I have sat here during those Congresses. My right to my seat has been fully vindicated by the House. I came here under precisely the same circumstances then that I come now. But it is now said that a law of Congress has been enacted which prevents me from taking my seat; that by the operation of this law I am excluded, and the seat is to be declared vacant. If this proposed resolution be sustained, then I say fraud will be supplemented by this method of strangling, of murdering the representation of Utah Territory on this floor.

If the report of the majority of this committee shall be sustained, I shall leave this Hall of Representatives with a feeling and a conscience which will give me far more satisfaction in the days to come than if I were a member of this House and voted in favor of the adoption of the report of the majority declaring this seat vacant. I am a resident of Utah Territory and one of those people who are everywhere spoken against and against whom many vile charges are made, as were made against their predecessors, the Church of Christ, in the early days, and as Jesus predicted would be the case; yet I do respect my oath, and I pity any gentleman who with nothing to sustain him but popular sentiment is willing to trample upon the Constitution and the law and to strike down a people against whom popular sentiment is strong. [Here the hammer fell.] Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I thank you for your kind indulgence.

Mr. CALKINS. I yield for a few moments to my colleague, [Mr. DE MOTTE.]

Mr. DE MOTTE. Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition to trespass upon the time of the House to discuss generally the various phases of this contest. There are some points, however, which present themselves in such a way that I feel called upon to say something in regard to them.

This is no ordinary contest, for there is more involved in it than the abstract right of a person to a seat on this floor. While that is the technical question submitted to us, the real one is, Shall the institution of polygamy continue to have recognition in this House? There could be no doubt, I think, as to the action of this House if the question of the recognition of polygamy was being thrust suddenly upon us. If a body of people anywhere in the United States were by positive enactment of their own or by asking legislation by this body attempting to establish polygamy and give it the sanction and protection of the law there would be but one voice everywhere. All Christendom would be aroused and the most positive and severe measures taken to throttle it at the beginning. There would be no one, even here, to secure for it a brief lease of life by dilatory motions and uncertain speeches. Like other evils of its class, it has crept stealthily upon us. Within the memory of a majority of the members of this House it was laughed at as the mere freak of a fanatic. When the leader of the Latter Day Saints announced to his persecuted and despised followers that God had revealed to him that plural marriages were the divine will it was scarcely deemed worthy of a sneer. Immediately after the announcement of this supposed revelation, as if frightened at the thought of so violent an innovation upon the civilization of the age, they wandered away from their fellow-men and hid themselves among the mountains of what was almost an unexplored portion of our national domain.

There for a time almost forgotten, they suffered and waited and labored as others of a better faith had frequently done before. Industrious, frugal, and zealous in the propagation of their religion, they rapidly increased in numbers and in wealth, while the outside world took no thought of them. The pioneer spirit of the people could not rest, and in about a quarter of a century they were no longer beyond the border, or upon the border, but were in the midst of us. In 1862, Congress, being controlled by that party which has never hesitated to grapple with evil wherever found or however strongly intrenched, passed laws declaring polygamy a crime and prescribing punishment for it. So strong had the institution become that those practicing it laughed at the idea of its being restrained by law. Public sentiment and the authority of the church were so strong in its favor that officers and juries could not be found to execute the law against it. The church was the supreme power. The church claimed polygamy as a part of its creed, and claiming the law to be unconstitutional, they have openly defied it for twenty years. Now they add another defiance to those of the past by sending to these Halls as their representative one who openly avows himself a polygamist and declares that the Constitution of the United States protects him in it. It is not unnatural that he should make this claim, reared as he has been amid the influences of his church. The most remarkable part of this is that he has found members on this floor who were not reared in the Mormon Church to assert that claim for him. Four of the distinguished gentlemen upon that committee advocate his claim and solemnly say to this House and to the country that the Constitution of the fathers protects the institution of polygamy in Utah. The distinguished gentlemen taking this position are without exception from the other side of this House.

It is but repeating familiar history to say that the greatest evils which have cursed us as a people have always found statesmen on the other side of the House to throw up constitutional breastworks for their defense and plead the letter of the law in their extenuation. Nearly a quarter of a century ago I sat in the Senate gallery, at the other end of the Capitol, and heard a brilliant Democratic Senator, in the interest of slavery, claim that the Constitution gave Congress no power to prevent slavery in the Territories; that the provision in the Constitution, "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States," now quoted and relied upon to some extent by all the members of the committee, gave no other authority than to sell or otherwise dispose of the public lands. Then I heard another distinguished Democratic Senator, in the interest of slavery also, insist that the clause quoted above made it obligatory upon Congress to legislate for the establishment and protection of slavery in the Territories. Thus it was that at every attempt to restrain or eradicate that evil the letter of the law was laid down and constitutional barriers raised up by gentlemen from the other side of the House to prevent. There was no power under the Constitution, they told us, to destroy that which was threatening to destroy us.

A little later, when rebellion had its grip on the national throat, a Democratic President—and I cheerfully remember that he was the last of his line, and unless his party has changed views on that subject since, I will doubtless be pardoned for hoping that he may continue the last for all time—sat like an imbecile while the enemy robbed us of our munitions of war and supplied himself, declaring that in the absence of positive legislation the Constitution gave no power to protect the Government against rebellion.

And now comes another evil that threatens to inoculate our social system with the leprosy of the Orient. It comes in defiance of positive law and asks to be publicly recognized by the admission of its representative to a seat in this House. Again we hear from the other side of the House that the Constitution, purged as it has been from every sentence, word, and letter which could possibly be construed as shielding evil, protects this man in his practice of polygamy, and that we must admit him.

In reading the reports in this contest we find that it has fallen to the lot of a gentleman from this side of the House to read the letter of the law in behalf of this representative of polygamy. The member of the Committee on Elections from Massachusetts, a State where Republicanism has generally assumed its most radical form, tells us that the letter of the law compels us to bestow membership upon one whom he thinks should immediately thereafter be expelled. While the argument is ingenious and the authorities skillfully marshaled, yet one is disappointed on arriving at the end to find that the entire web is woven to cover a bit of sentiment. The proposition made by the gentleman from Massachusetts would read well in a story book. A master-hand has tried it, and in my judgment he has succeeded in forming one of the finest climaxes in literature. Hugo describes a scene at sea. A gunner carelessly allowed a monster gun to escape from its fastenings. As the vessel rocked from side to side with the waves, the gun went thundering and pounding about the deck, threatening to send vessel and crew to the bottom of the sea. After an exhibition of extraordinary courage and strength the gunner succeeded in again securing it. Calling the crew together, the commander spoke of his brave act, and in recognition thereof pinned upon his blouse the cross of Saint Louis, and then ordered him instantly shot for allowing the gun to escape. As I said before, this reads well in romance. As narrated by the great novelist it is sublime, startling; but this is no place for such things. The legislation of the country is supposed to be, and I believe is, the sober second thought of the people, and romantic climaxes and elaborately clad bits of sentiment partake largely of the ridiculous. What has this man done that entitles him to this distinction? Has he shown an obedience to law and an attachment to republican principles which entitle him to such a reward? On the contrary, he is an avowed law-breaker.

Another thing in connection with the dealings of this House with polygamy deserves a passing remark. While I have, I think, as cordial a hatred for the crime of polygamy as any other, I am not disposed to go as far in denunciation of the Mormon people as many who have addressed the House recently on measures affecting them. As a people I do not believe they deserve the harsh words that in the heat of debate have been spoken of them.

The history of the past shows us that religious fanaticism has in all ages caused both the barbarous and the civilized to do many strange and unreasonable things. I call it fanaticism without meaning to speak lightly or contemptuously of it, for in its most unreasonable phases there is a kind of heroism about it one cannot help but admire. In the pagan world it manifests itself in long and toilsome pilgrimages and in self-inflicted torture. This is not confined to pagan people. In Christendom the humiliation and sufferings of the Man of Sorrows have been imitated by devotees in all ages. At one stage of our civilization men of great mental power and liberal culture, in obedience to what they thought their duty to God, fled from human society, and in caves and barren places spent their lives in solitude, privation, and suffering. At another, statesmen, philosophers, and divines, for conscience' sake, denounced the virtue of cleanliness as the vice of pride, and passed their lives besmeared with filth and swarming with vermin. In every age of the world since the death of the Saviour devoted, conscientious, and pure-minded men and women, in the firm belief they were pleasing God, have denied themselves the common comforts of life; have starved, scourged, and tortured themselves, literally "living in the agonies of which other men die."

I do not now recall an instance among Christians where the demands of the conscience of the devotee have led him to do anything but "crucify the flesh," except the instance of polygamy now under consideration. If we may believe our critics across the ocean, we are always doing something unusual and startling here in America, or doing something usual in a very unusual manner. It seems to have been left to us to first attempt to make the Christian religion contribute to the gratification of the desires of the flesh. That which all other Christian people crucify, the Latter Day Saint would gratify. That polygamy at its inception was the babe of lust I do not doubt, but it has grown into the youth of conscience. That the few master minds who arbitrarily control the Mormon Church may be insincere I will not dispute, but I would do violence to my sense of right and propriety if I joined in an outcry against the sincerity of the mass of the Mormon people. The fact that they are sincere in what they term their religious belief does not change the attitude of this question here. They may as well claim immunity from punishment for any other crime as for that of polygamy. Are the honorable gentlemen who are now claiming that polygamy is a religious tenet, and therefore protected by the Constitution, willing to bear the odium of the other conclusions to which their doctrines legitimately lead? Whether willing or not, the people will hold them and the party they represent responsible.

I am one of those who honor the patriotism of the fathers. They were the wisest and best men of their day. They had no Jupiter's brain from which they could strike forth a full grown Minerva, but they wrought as wisely as they knew, and left the completion of their work to those who came after them. I have felt when I saw the leaders of the Democratic party holding up the Constitution as a warrant for the extension of slavery, as a barrier in the way of protecting the life of the nation, and as an edict robbing men of citizenship, that they insulted the memory of those grand men. I feel it more forcibly now, when I see them erecting it as a shield for the loathsome crime of polygamy. I believed in the earlier contests of this generation as I believe in this contest, that the fathers put no word in the Constitution and left none out of it with intent to protect crime or tolerate oppression. As we have conquered the other evils, and saved the life of the nation by striking directly at them, I see no reason why we should hesitate now. I shall therefore deal as hard a blow as I can at polygamy by voting that its representative shall not have a seat in this House.

Mr. CALKINS. I yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Nevada, [Mr. CASSIDY.]

Mr. CASSIDY. Mr. Speaker, the American Congress has been an accessory to the crime of polygamy quite long enough. I am in favor of the suppression of polygamy in Utah, and to that end I am in favor of suppressing polygamists whenever and wherever one dares to raise his head. Especially am I in favor of placing a quietus upon the chief of all the polygamists in Utah, George Q. Cannon.

Every argument that has ever been urged by anybody anywhere against polygamy in Utah will apply with equal force to the case now under consideration by this House. The seating or non-seating of George Q. Cannon has a direct and important bearing on the true solution of the question of polygamy as it exists to-day in the Territory of Utah. Cannon is the representative man of the lecherous, law-defying element in that Territory; he is the representative head of all that is bad and debasing in the damnable system of polygamy. His mission here is well understood. First, he has been returned as the Delegate from Utah, Congress after Congress for ten years, to make polygamy respectable in the eyes of the civilized world.

Brigham Young declared that polygamy was a God-given revelation through him to the Mormon Church, and when his own people and the great body of the American people all over the land began to murmur about it, he publicly proclaimed that he would cram the vile doctrine down the throats of the American people and of the American Congress. That is why Cannon is here to-day; that is why he was sent here in the first place. Brigham Young knew of the liberality of our Constitution and laws with reference to the subject of religious liberty and toleration, and he also knew that if he could succeed in installing a leading polygamist in one of the highest official stations in the Government, that act in and of itself would go further toward popularizing polygamy with the Mormon people than any number of sermons from the most gifted of his apostles and pulpit orators. Subsequent events demonstrate clearly that he reasoned well. Cannon was accorded a seat in this body and polygamy at once boomed all along the line.

The rank and file of the Mormon Church saw that the Government of the United States recognized and respected, or at least tolerated, the new doctrine; that it was no bar to the attainment of the most commanding positions of official trust and honor and emolument under the Government; and hence they embraced it with great zeal and enthusiasm. The history and statistics of the Mormon Church show a marvelous increase in polygamous marriages in Utah immediately following the admission of Cannon to a seat in this body for the first time. The ratio of increase was unparalleled. The number of such marriages sprang from less than fifty for the year preceding his first admission to more than four hundred for the succeeding year, and the unlawful system has continued to grow vigorously and steadily year by year since that time; and all because, as I believe, this House gave countenance and dignity to polygamy and popularized it with the Mormon people by according George Q. Cannon a seat upon this floor almost without a word of protest from any source whatever. Every victory won by Cannon here is a victory for polygamy in Utah. Each succeeding triumph in Congress adds to the strength and vitality of the monster in the West. The best end to kill of a snake is its head.

There has not been a lawful election in Utah for twenty-five years. The ballot is tainted, yea polluted, with illegality from one end of the Territory to the other. Under Mormon law, girls under age and alien women of all ages are permitted to vote at all elections. An election in Utah is simply the recorded will of the Mormon Church as directed by the leaders of that organization.

But I have a stronger objection to the admission of Cannon. He is not a citizen. He is an alien. True, he holds an alleged certificate of naturalization, but there is no record of a court of competent jurisdiction behind it. He was not qualified to become a citizen of the United States at the time this certificate purports to have been issued. Contemporaneous facts and circumstances are conclusive to my mind that he had not resided in this country over two years prior to its issuance. Governor Murray was cognizant of these facts. He went into an exhaustive examination of all the circumstances, arriving at the conclusion that Cannon was not a citizen. I believe that that decision was correct.

But gentlemen on this side say the governor usurped powers that did not belong to him. They talk of the sacredness and the binding effect of precedents. The nearest parallel that I have been able to find to the course of Governor Murray was that raised in the celebrated Cronin case in Oregon in the Presidential year of 1876. Governor Grover, of Oregon, held that Watt was ineligible to the office of Presidential elector because he held a Federal post-office. Governor Grover's position was sustained by some of the ablest Democratic lawyers in the United States, and there was hardly a Democratic politician anywhere who was not willing and anxious to accept the Presidential election by the aid of Cronin's vote. Governor Murray has said that Cannon was not elected because ineligible. The parallel in the Oregon case is complete to this extent, and the Democratic portion of the electoral commission also concurred in the opinion of Governor Grover, holding, every man of them, that Watt was not eligible, and therefore not elected. But it is true that they did not claim that Cronin was elected. They simply held that there was no election at all, which our committee now says, by the report of its majority, was the case in Utah. The pending resolution goes no further.

Then we have the Mountain Meadows massacre and the terrible work of vengeance of the Destroying Angels in Utah, all directly traceable, as I hold, to the Mormon system. Cannon was always high in the councils of the Mormon Church. He was second in command to Brigham Young. The leaders condoned and concealed the bloody work of the murderous members of their church for more than twenty years, thereby becoming accessories after the fact to all of these terrible crimes. I hold George Q. Cannon morally responsible for his share of these offenses against mankind and civilization. Morally he comes here red-handed from the Mountain Meadows massacre and the hundreds of assassinations perpetrated by the Destroying Angels of the Mormon leaders. He also comes as a self-confessed bigamist, and therefore a self-confessed felon under the law. I am against him and the whole foul and disgraceful system which he represents. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, in presenting this question to the House I had intended to submit a purely legal argument, and not extend my remarks to any phase of the case not strictly within the record; but the remarks made by the contestant in this case I must not allow to pass without challenge. I do not wish to be considered as having struck an unnecessary blow at a man or a people who now seem at least not to be in the ascendency; but I deem it just to history, just to the people of the United States, and just to the people whom the gentleman says he represents, to say that all is not so fair in the history of that people as would appear by his remarks; for I remember that as early as 1855 a speck of war appeared in the Territory of Utah, growing out of the defiance of the Mormon people to the authority of the Government, and to suppress that insurrection the Government was compelled to and did send there its Army, headed by that brave and gallant man who afterward fell fighting on the other side at the battle of Shiloh.

I am also reminded that coming up out of the past is a tale of blood, the equal of which is scarcely found in any of the annals of bloody crime that history records, and using language that my distinguished friend sitting in front of me [Mr. BURROWS] once used, "so horrible and atrocious that a savage might have sat at their feet, and learned deeds of cruelty."

I remember that a peaceable Arkansas colony, on its way to the land of the setting sun, fell victims, after having surrendered under a truce, to a horrible butchery. I remember that one of the leading members of this Mormon colony many years afterward was convicted and punished for having been a particeps criminis to that horrible massacre. So with the fair scenes and pictures that have been presented in this House to-day these of darkness and bloodshed should not be forgotten, as well as the fact that, with all the virtues which have been referred to as belonging to them, there they stand to-day confessing as a part and parcel of the religious tenets of their creed a crime against our civilization so heinous that no man upon this floor save the contestant himself has dared to apologize for. These are some of the historical facts allied to and connected with the contest now presented.

I shall spend no further time upon this part of the subject, Mr. Speaker; I think it is unnecessary. Allow me to pass now to the consideration for a few moments of the merits of this contest, as well as to answer some of the objections which have been urged against the majority report, and first let me say in answer to so much of the contestant's remarks wherein he says that he had no fear of the majority report before the passage of the recent Mormon law, because the best lawyers on both sides of the House had condemned it, that if the statement be true, and if the best lawyers on both sides of the House did condemn it, and thereby find a way by which they could stultify the sentiment of this country, and vote to seat him on this floor, I am content to take my seat upon the back row, and find my vindication in the familiar quotation—

Where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise.

I admit that there is room for argument and for disagreement, not only between good lawyers, but between all lawyers, upon the constitutional question; but I claim for the report that in no Congress nor by any tribunal has the doctrine there asserted been denied. No judicial body or tribunal has sat upon it, or has ever passed judgment upon the question involved. Now, what is the question presented by the report? When you reach it it is well and sharply defined. It is said by those who criticise the report that Delegates in Congress are within the terms of the Constitution so far as membership is concerned, and that the Constitution applies in terms to Delegates.

Now, what are the constitutional provisions? What are the provisions relied upon and quoted in support of the questions presented here? The first one is the first clause of section 2 of article 1, which defines what the membership of the House shall be, or what shall constitute the House of Representatives. The clause in question is as follows:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature

It is here clearly expressed in words unmistakable, and in precise and unequivocal language, who and what members of Congress are. They shall be "chosen every second year by the people of the several States;" not by Territories, but by the people of the several States.

Let us pass to the next step. For some purposes this is a separate and distinct legislative body. This House is separate and individual in reference to all powers of its own organization, with reference to the election, organization, and the returns of its own members, with reference to the expenditure of its contingent fund, with reference to the punishment of infractions of its dignity, and with reference to its power and right to expel a member. For these purposes the House is separate and distinct as much as if it relied on no other branch of the Government for legislative purposes. So when you apply the constitutional provisions to the power of the House over the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members, it stands, as the text of the Constitution shows, as a judge to pass upon these qualifications and elections.

Take the next step. What are the qualifications of a member of the House? They are defined in the Constitution; and here comes the first point of divergence between myself and those who disagree with me. The framers of the Constitution being familiar with the history of parliamentary bodies knew, as everybody knows who has studied it, that every parliamentary body ought to be and is the sole judge of the qualifications of its own members; so they defined what the qualifications of a member of Congress should be, but did not define what his disqualifications might be. They separate the positive qualifications which must attach to him from the disqualifications which may attach to him. What did they do? They provided that a member at the time of his election should have three requisites, namely, citizenship, age, (twenty-five years,) and inhabitancy, and reserved to the House itself the right to say by a two-third vote what should be ground for expulsion from the body for any misconduct, for any misbehavior, for any crime involving moral turpitude; in short, what might be or become a disqualification; and the provisions of the Constitution in this regard were made to apply to the members elected from the States. That is all. Then it is provided that for any disqualification which may be found attached to any member which in the judgment of the House is sufficient by a two-thirds vote of the members he may be expelled.

I repeat that if it were not for the constitutional restriction upon this body for any cause which it might see fit or deem proper, it could expel or exclude a member from a seat on the floor by a majority vote. Upon that point, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the history of the House of Commons and its rules respecting the power of that body over its own members. I call attention to section 58 of Cushing's Parliamentary Law, wherein the author says that it never was pretended that there was any power restraining that body from exercising this authority over its own members, and in its exercise of that right so capricious was it that it allowed men to take their seats upon the floor who were under twenty-one years of age, and then in other parliaments it would expel them and refuse to allow them to take their seats, and in other parliaments it would again allow them to sit.

The position of the majority of the committee in this case, in a few words, was this: that a Delegate not being within the constitutional provisions is remitted in his standing before this body to the general power of the House to judge of the qualification of its members, which power resides exclusively in this House. It obtains that power in two ways: first, as to its members, by a direct provision of the Constitution; second, it resides in this House by common parliamentary law which has existed ever since parliamentary bodies were established. Hence, as regards any person attached to this House not a member in a constitutional sense, his qualifications are remitted to this House as a parliamentary body to say what his qualification shall be, as well after he is sworn as before. Not being within the provision of the Constitution, he is not subject to the two-thirds clause relating to expulsion; and a majority at any time may expel him. That is the proposition and there is where we divide, and, so far as I am able to discern, the only real difference between us.

Now, what do those who oppose this view say? They all admit that Delegates are not within the constitutional provision and are not members in the constitutional sense. What do they say? That by the act of September, 1850, Congress extended the Constitution and laws of the United States over the Territories, and thereby the Constitution became by positive law a part of the law of Congress, as applied to Territories, and being applicable in cases of Delegates, the same rule should apply to Delegates as applies to Members. That is their argument—that Congress having extended the Constitution and laws of the country over the Territories, therefore, as a matter of statute law, the Constitution should be applicable. I deny it. I deny that the constitutional provision is applicable or can be applicable so far as it relates to the election, qualification, and returns of a Delegate. It cannot be applicable by any rule of construction with which I am familiar. I never heard of a respectable text-writer who said you could carve out a part of a section and make it applicable and controlling to a given subject, and disregard the residue. The whole must be applicable or none. And if you make it applicable to the case of Delegates, you must extend to them the right to vote. You cannot step half way; so your position proves too much and is wholly illogical and cannot stand.

Apply another familiar maxim, namely, "Where the reason is the same, then the rule is the same." Is the reason the same as applied to Members and Delegates? My friend from Texas, [Mr. JONES,] in an able and earnest speech to-day, said that the reason was precisely the same. I beg his pardon. What is the potent power of a member of this House? Is it simply the indulgence and right to talk and introduce bills and exercise the franking privilege? Is that it? Oh, no, the potent power of a member of Congress is his vote. It is his vote that renders him powerful and potent on this floor. For all other purposes he might as well stay in his district if he could by staying there reach this House just as well by telegraph, and through the public press get his speeches and his bills before Congress. It is his vote that levies the taxes and distributes the money and gives direction to general legislation affecting fifty million people. That makes the member potent on the floor. This essential feature every Delegate lacks. He lacks it by law. And I doubt whether Congress in exercising any constitutional power could extend it to him. At least it has not been so claimed by any gentleman on the other side. And I most positively deny the right of Congress to do it. The potency, I say, of a member is the right to vote.

Very many times, Mr. Speaker, I have heard the vote of a member lightly spoken of, but I hold in my hand a volume, part of the records of this body when there were troublous times in the country; and I recall now the value of one vote in this House. It was the time when Kansas was applying to be made a State in this Union. You will remember it was the policy of a large part of the Democratic party whose representatives were then in Congress to fasten upon Kansas, when admitted as a State, a slave constitution. You will remember that the Lecompton constitution—an instrument conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity—was before the House, and when the scales were finally held up at the Speaker's desk, and freedom was on one side and the slave and the shackle on the other, the question was put whether the Lecompton constitution should be saddled upon that free Territory in the West. The roll of members was called down to the last name; and, trembling even in the balance, the last vote recorded settled the question in favor of freedom, and Kansas was free. That illustrates the power and potency of the vote of the member; and that is what the Constitution designed to protect when it defined the rights of members of this House.

The reason, then, is not the same. There is no reason why a Delegate should be twenty-five years old. It may be presumed that the framers of the Constitution believed in fixing the age of members at twenty-five, that they should have arrived at mature and considerate years before being intrusted with vital questions in the government of a great people. What reason is there why a Delegate over twenty-one years of age should not be a competent member? The whole thing is answered, Mr. Speaker, inferentially and argumentatively in the speech made by Mr. Madison away back in 1794, when he said that Delegates were not constitutional members, and you could not impose upon them the duty of taking the oath as other members of Congress did; and Mr. White was seated without being required to take it.

So the position that because by law the Constitution and laws of the United States were extended over the Territories, and the reasons being the same the rule ought to be the same, in my humble judgment fails. The reasons are not the same. Besides, the law expressly says that the Constitution and laws shall be extended over the Territories only in cases where their provisions are applicable, and we all know what that was intended to do. It did not refer by any manner of means to the right of the people of a Territory to elect a Delegate to Congress. It was intended to bring them within the purview of the Constitution and laws of the country so as to provide them with courts, protect the people in person and property, organize them in bodies-politic and prepare them for final admission as States into the Union.

It is urged that the Constitution having been construed, and the true construction of it being that Members possessing the three qualifications before alluded to are entitled to seats on this floor, by parity of reasoning it applies to Delegates as well, who must first be seated before they can be excluded or expelled for causes not included in the constitutional qualifications. The same reason why this proposition is not sound is the one given in my answer to the other. There is no reason why the House should do so foolish a thing as to seat a Delegate for the purpose of expelling him the next moment. If it can expel him by a majority vote, then, without a constitutional limitation upon it, as in the case of members from States, it can do the same thing in the first instance by denying him a seat; and a Delegate being without the pale of the Constitution, this House can exclude him in the first instance by a majority vote.

I come now to an argument which has been urged by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSE] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MOULTON.] They say that those who join in the majority report will be "hoist by their own petard," for Congress has recently passed an anti-polygamy law, and if our position is correct the next House of Representatives may seat a polygamist notwithstanding the law. Now, I beg the gentlemen to look at the law. It does not pretend to fetter this House. It is a limitation upon the people of the Territory who are debarred from the right of sending such a man here to represent them.

Mr. SPRINGER. Suppose they do.

Mr. CALKINS. Suppose they do. Then my judgment is that the rule laid down in the law would be a wholesome rule for Congress to adopt, as we are about to adopt it now.

In further answer I must be permitted to say: we have on the statute-book a law which prescribes the manner in which contestants and contestees shall proceed to take testimony in contested-election cases. That law was passed by the House and the Senate and approved by the President. Yet there has never been a House since that law was passed that has not violated it almost every time it has tried a contested-election case. And why? Because it has been truly said that Congress cannot pass a law limiting the right of each House to judge of the election, qualification, and return of its members. And Justice Strong, who was the author of that law, admitted upon the floor when it was passed that it did not bind any House but the one which passed it; that it was a wholesome rule and should be followed, but that it did not have the effect of positive law, and was only binding when this House chose to follow it. McCrary in his valuable work on elections takes the same view.

Mr. SPRINGER. Do I understand my honorable friend to say that no matter what qualifications Congress may by law prescribe for a Delegate, a subsequent House may disregard those qualifications and admit any Delegate that the majority of that body may see fit to admit?

Mr. CALKINS. I am coming to that in a moment. The next proposition urged is that Congress, having the constitutional authority under that clause of the Constitution which has been so often quoted giving to Congress the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territories of the United States—that Congress under that clause has the power to provide for a seat for a Delegate on this floor, and, having provided for it, it necessarily follows that this body is bound to receive the Delegate whom the people have chosen. Now, does that follow?

To provide the right to a seat for a Delegate is one thing; to provide who may fill that seat is another thing. If that position is correct, then when Congress under that constitutional power has provided the seat, this body is stripped of all right to examine at all as to the qualifications of the person to fill it. And, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. MOULTON] argued, as I understood him, you must let the man who comes here, though he be a Comanche Indian, fill that seat. For if Congress has the constitutional power to provide the seat and there is no law, as there confessedly is none, fixing the qualifications of Delegates, and if this body has not the right to judge of the qualifications of its own members when unfettered by constitutional restrictions, then as a logical sequence you must seat any man the people of a Territory may send here, no matter who or what he may be and regardless of all qualifications.

Again, this position proves too much, and we cannot stand upon it. The true doctrine is that this House is remitted to that power under the constitutional clause respecting the qualifications of members, or under the power of general parliamentary law, which gives to every legislative body the right to pass upon the qualifications of its members. Upon this doctrine we can all safely stand, and I submit it is the only safe one.

Mr. SPRINGER. Do I understand the gentleman to hold that after Congress has provided by law for the election of a Delegate from a Territory and has prescribed the qualifications of that Delegate, when a person comes here possessing those qualifications this House may refuse him his seat because he has not some other qualifications which the House may set up?

Mr. CALKINS. That is precisely it. I take the ground just as the gentleman has stated it. Congress cannot bind this House as to the qualifications of its own members, except as the Constitution has bound it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Not Members, but Delegates.

Mr. CALKINS. Delegates in this House are the persons I am speaking of, and they are not constitutional members.

Mr. MOULTON. The law settles it.

Mr. CALKINS. There is no law that settles it. The moment Congress attempts to pass a law upon that subject the House divides the right which resides alone in it, that power which this House as a legislative body possesses, which is inherent in it as a parliamentary body, and it surrenders the right to judge of the qualifications of its own members. Such a law is clearly unconstitutional and wholly void, and Congress cannot prescribe such qualifications; because, if that were admitted, this House might propose a bill fixing one qualification for Delegates; the Senate might fix an entirely different qualification, and the bill going to the President might be vetoed by him because it did not correspond with his views. Thus you would have the Senate and the President prescribing the qualifications of Delegates who are to sit in this body.

Mr. SPRINGER. Nothing would be prescribed until the law had been passed by both Houses and approved by the President.

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly not; but the moment you say that the law prescribing the qualification must be submitted to the Senate and the President, you take away the power of the House on this subject.

Mr. SPRINGER. Allow me one question more. Suppose Congress should pass such a measure as that which is known as the "Pendleton bill," admitting members of the President's Cabinet to seats on this floor to speak on questions of legislation. Suppose such a bill, after passing both Houses, should be approved by the President, would a subsequent House of Representatives be authorized to refuse to members of the President's Cabinet seats on this floor?

Mr. CALKINS. Assuming that Congress has the constitutional power to pass such a law, I say that this House, and this House alone, would be the judge of the qualifications of those Cabinet officers if they should become members.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then this House could exclude them.

Mr. CALKINS. This House could exclude them, because it is a power residing unfettered and unrestricted in every parliamentary body. Without it the House could be imposed upon to an unlimited extent. This House and every legislative body must have this power in order to protect themselves.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the gentleman to give way now for a motion to adjourn. He can finish his remarks in the morning.

Mr. CALKINS. I shall be through in ten minutes.

Mr. ATKINS. We can vote in the morning just as well as this evening. It is a piece of tyranny to force us to stay here longer to-night.

Mr. CALKINS. I shall be through in ten minutes, and I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me now.

My friend from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSE] was pleased to enter into some animadversions with reference to the report of the majority of the committee. One of his points, I am free to say, was very well taken. Where the word "legal" occurs it was, I admit, inaptly used. But the gentleman understands the sense in which it was used. It was in contradistinction to the idea that some qualification might not be prescribed by the House. In a technical sense my friend was right, but I submit to him that criticism of the use of language is not a forcible answer to the substance of the question; and when arguing the question as a matter of substance he was, I submit, quite disingenuous in his remarks. Again he said, after quoting from the report of the majority:

> Mr. Speaker, I stand silent in the presence of this logic and this law.

Now, that was designed as satire!—cold, crushing satire!—nipping, biting satire! But as a matter of fact, my friend did not stand silent very long, for he immediately proceeded to exercise his lung power, and his eloquence, and his pursuasive faculties, and his legal genius, to make his hearers walk contentedly by the "wheel of the Mormon chariot." How far he succeeded will very soon be seen. I am content to let the report and the remarks I have made with reference to this constitutional question go down side by side with the gentleman's speech, and let the pen of impartial history say which is right.

I now come, Mr. Speaker, to the last point which I desire to discuss in connection with this case; it is the religious phase of the question. It is true that under the Constitution we are prohibited from passing any law which shall impair the right of any person to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience. But an examination of the authorities discloses a distinction between that which as religion is harmless or beneficial to society, and that which, under the guise of religion, is mischievous. The law says that no man can put on the robe of sanctity and use it as a cloak to commit offenses against public morals and public decency. Whenever any one undertakes to do so, the law-making power and the courts step in to prevent it, in spite of the religious garb attempted to be set up as a defense and justification. I admit that vagaries which harm nobody except those who practice them may be practiced under the cloak of religion without the interference of the law and even under its protection. But whenever any one under the garb of religion attempts that which is harmful to the public, and which degrades morality, that moment the robe falls, and the law seizes the offender, as it does another malefactor or law-breaker who violates decency without such pretense.

My friend from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSE] said yesterday:

> The history of the world and of the religious persecutions that have disgraced churches and governments establishes this fact beyond controversy or doubt. "The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church" has held good in all the past, and will prove true to-day.

In answer to that statement, as well as to that part of the contestant's remarks in which he spoke of the Mormon Church as a church receiving inspiration and new life from Heaven, I desire to say that for eighteen hundred years, wherever civilization has blessed a people, the foundation, the corner-stone of the laws of that people has been the doctrine taught by the Nazarene. Wherever that doctrine has been departed from decay, inevitable decay, has followed swift and fast.

The name of religion cannot cover crime. Men may steal the livery of Heaven to worship at the shrine of Beelzebub, but it cannot be religion. Freedom of conscience is the offspring of liberty, but the love of liberty is the love of law. The contestant has spoken of tearing out the corner-stone of our Constitution by the suppression of polygamy. He says it is their religion. Our civilization has for its central vitalizing power the pure truths taught by the Nazarene. The debasing dogma of plural wives finds no sanction there. Our laws, liberties, and growth are interwoven with the doctrines and morals of the sacred code. Paganism, of which Mormonism is the latest example, is the destroyer of homes and the cancerous rot of empire.

I hold in my hands the letters of Pliny the Younger, written in the second century after the birth of Christ, and I desire to read a sentence to show that the early Christians practiced the doctrines of the Nazarene as they are now taught. In a letter by Pliny to the Emperor Trajan he said he had not yet been present at the trial of the Christians, and desired to take advice from him what punishment to inflict. Here is his description of what the Christians said when brought before him:

> They affirmed, however, that this had been the sum, whether of their crime or their delusion; they had been in the habit of meeting together on a stated day, before sunrise, and of offering in turns a form of invocation to Christ, as to a god; also of binding themselves by an oath, not for any guilty purpose, but not to commit thefts, or robberies, or adulteries, not to break their word, not to repudiate deposits when called upon. These ceremonies having been gone through, they had been in the habit of separating and again meeting together for the purpose of taking food—food, that is, of an ordinary and innocent kind. They had, however, ceased from doing even this after my edict, in which, following your orders, I had forbidden the existence of fraternities.

This was the oath these early Christians took. These were the teachings of the Nazarene. These are the truths which make men better, which make republics better, which give substance and foundation to governments, but when ignored, everything that is pernicious must necessarily follow. [Applause.]

This is the corner-stone of this Republic. It has been the theme of every American statesman—it will continue to be while the Republic lasts. To-day in all the laws of all the States this same doctrine is universally recognized; and I say to the gentleman from Utah, and all his aiders, abettors, apologists, and followers that the doctrine of plural wives must be forborne, and the Mormons must yield not to the demands of the Republican party, not to the demands of the Democratic party, but to the universal voice of the civilized world. [Great applause.]

Several MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. CALKINS. I have fifteen minutes left, which I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RANNEY.] [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I have not been permitted to occupy the floor on this subject because of the limited time for debate, and I therefore ask, by unanimous consent, for leave to print my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and leave is granted to the gentleman from Alabama to print his remarks in the RECORD. [See Appendix.]

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. ROBESON. We have fifteen minutes left on this side.

Mr. CALKINS. I yield what time I have left to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RANNEY.]

Mr. RANNEY. Mr. Speaker, I had intended to address this House on this subject very briefly on certain questions of law. I had desired simply to show that the recent act of Congress, approved March 23, 1882, would cover my vote in this case. I believe by the operation of that act Mr. Cannon should be excluded from his seat. I had intended to occupy the time of this House in discussing the operation of that new act, but it is so late, and gentlemen are so anxious to proceed to vote, I will simply ask to make a brief statement of my position on that matter, and to put it on record.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts is granted. [See Appendix.]

Mr. RANNEY. This case has assumed a new phase since it was heard and reported upon to the House. It has been argued in two aspects: first, as it stood under the law prior to the act of March 23, 1882; and, second, under that act.

I do not propose to discuss the case in the view of the law as it was. I have already presented my views in committee, and they are before the House in print. All I desire to say is that I could not vote for the pending resolutions on the grounds assigned in the majority report. I dissented from them in committee, and I do the same now. I deem the doctrine so predicated to be in contravention of all authority and precedent, unsound in principle, and mischievous in practice.

But I can now, and propose to, vote for the pending resolutions, because the new act expressly provides that a polygamist shall not be entitled to hold any office or place of public trust, honor, or emolument, &c.

I have no doubt that this act applies to the present case because of this clause, nor of the fact that Mr. Cannon can safely be assumed to be a polygamist now upon his written admission filed. He is presumed to continue in that relation, and there is no pretense that there has been any change in his status since that written admission was filed and made a part of the record, and under the issues raised presenting that question for action.

Contestant cannot be admitted to a seat which he would not be entitled to hold if already in the same. A public office of the kind is subject to Congressional control, as it is but the creature of a statute, and the salary is only an incident and must fall with it. There is no ground whatever in my judgment for the charge that the law is unconstitutional for any of the reasons urged or otherwise, and I hardly deem these objections worthy of an answer.

These views I would like to express and elaborate more at length, but the time set for this vote having been reached without my being given the half hour allotted to me, there is no opportunity allowed for doing so.

I say the doctrine of the majority is likely to be mischievous, for their views may be invoked hereafter to defeat the operation of the very act now passed and come up to plague the friends of the same. For if the House can disregard the statutes as they stood before, they can do the same as to the present one hereafter.

In my judgment it would be much better to adhere to the established doctrines, and apply the present law to this case, thus emphasizing it, and avail ourselves of this the first opportunity to apply it.

Mr. CALKINS. I now call for the vote.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I am well convinced, Mr. Speaker, of the fact that a large majority of the House is opposed to the resolution I have submitted as a substitute, and for the purpose of saving time I now withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MOULTON,] which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Resolved, That George Q. Cannon was duly elected and returned as Delegate from the Territory of Utah, and is entitled to a seat as Delegate in the Forty-seventh Congress.

Mr. MOULTON. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 79, nays 123, not voting 89; as follows:

Mr. CALKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was rejected; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions reported by the majority of the committee will now be read.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That Allen G. Campbell is not entitled to a seat in this Congress as a Delegate from the Territory of Utah.

Resolved, That George Q. Cannon is not entitled to a seat in this Congress as a Delegate from the Territory of Utah.

Resolved, That the seat of Delegate from the Territory of Utah be, and the same hereby is, declared vacant.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the vote will be taken on the three resolutions together.

There was no objection.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. CALKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SHULTZ, for ten days.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ROBESON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at six o'clock and fourteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. AIKEN: The resolutions of the Board of Trade of Columbia, South Carolina, urging the construction of a free ship-canal between the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays—to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. BERRY: The petition of citizens of Colusa County, California, for the repeal of the law imposing a tax on banks, bankers, and trust companies—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BROWNE: The petition of 864 citizens of Wayne County, Indiana, asking that decisive action be taken to secure for American citizens now confined in British prisons a fair and speedy trial or an immediate and unconditional release—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. DAWES: The petition of Lewis Sycks, of Clarington, Monroe County, Ohio, for the passage of an act to pension soldiers and sailors of the late war who were confined in confederate prisons—to the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay.

Also, the petition of J. T. Morrill, of Clarington, Monroe County, Ohio, relative to double or reply postal cards—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. DIBRELL: The petition of the Board of Health of Tennessee, asking Congress to make an appropriation to prevent overflows, &c.—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. DINGLEY: The petition of the Board of Managers of the National Temperance Society, asking the early concurrence of the House of Representatives to the Senate bill to provide for a national commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic—to the Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

By Mr. FISHER: The petition of citizens of Franklin County, Pennsylvania, for the passage of a bill for the construction of a ship-canal between the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays—to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. HOUK: The petition of Jonathan D. Hale, of New Hampshire, for compensation for services rendered the Government during the rebellion; also for supplies furnished the United States Army during said war—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. MILES: Two petitions, embracing the names of 215 citizens of Winchester, Connecticut, for a speedy trial or release of American citizens now imprisoned in British jails—severally to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, for the passage of the Lowell bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PEELLE: The petition and proof of E. P. Thompson, in support of claim for loss of postage-stamps stolen and destroyed—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SHACKELFORD: The petition of citizens of North Carolina, for the establishment of a mail-route from Fayetteville to Keyser, in said State—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. OTHO R. SINGLETON: The petition of M. G. Parker and others, for the construction of a ship-railway across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec—to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. TUCKER: Papers relating to the claim of Edwin De Leon—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. J. T. UPDEGRAFF: The petition of W. H. Sunderland and 26 others, citizens of Ohio, for an appropriation for the establishment of schools in Alaska—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. THOMAS WILLIAMS: The petition of T. J. Pennington and others, citizens of Coosa County, Alabama, for Congressional aid for the education of the illiterate—to the same committee.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 20, 1882.

Prayer by Rev. GEORGE MORRISON, of Baltimore.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of the Board of Managers of the National Temperance Society, praying that the pending bills for the admission of Dakota and New Mexico as States be so amended as to require in their respective constitutions the proviso that the distilling, brewing, and sale of all alcoholic liquors for drinking purposes shall be forever unlawful in the proposed new States; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. PENDLETON. I present the petition of M. M. White, W. A. Goodman, J. D. Hearne, B. Cunningham, and L. B. Harrison, respectively, presidents of national banks in Cincinnati, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 5656) to amend the laws relating to the entry of distilled spirits in distillery and special bonded warehouses and the withdrawal of the same therefrom. I present also the petition of Paxton, Brothers & Co., of Cincinnati, to the same effect; the petition of R. Macready & Co., Isaac Reis, and 5 others, citizens of Cincinnati, to the same effect; and also the petition of G. Hotterhoff and H. C. Bruce, Feldman, Walker & Co., and George F. Dieterle, of Cincinnati; and the petition of the Mohr & Mohr Company, Stevens, Davis & Co., and ten other firms of Cincinnati, all praying for the passage of the same measure. I move the reference of the petitions to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I present the petition of George C. Richardson & Co., and a large number of other individuals and firms resident of Boston, Massachusetts, and largely engaged in the China trade, who have become very much alarmed at the prejudicial effect, as they believe, of the legislation now pending in Congress in reference to immigration from China, and they earnestly ask that that feature of such legislation may be carefully considered by the committee having the bill before them. If that bill has not been reported, I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would inform the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senator from California [Mr. MILLER] reported yesterday the House bill on that subject.

Mr. DAWES. Then let the petition lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie on the table.

Mr. MILLER, of California, presented a petition of citizens of California, praying for the passage of the bill to extend the limits of the Yosemite grant; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GROOME. I present a petition signed by the presidents of all or nearly all of the steamboat companies whose lines run out of the city of Baltimore, and by all or nearly all of the principal vessel owners of that city, praying that the bill amending an act entitled "An act to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States," approved June 2, 1879, may not be passed. The petition states in cogent language the objections that the petitioners have to the proposed legislation. It is very short, and as the bill has been already reported to the Senate, the only way that the petition can have any effect with the Senate is to have it read. I ask that it may be read at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be read if there be no objection.

The petition was read, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

The petition of the undersigned, engaged in the shipping business in the city of Baltimore, respectfully shows that there is now a bill pending before your honorable body styled a bill amending "An act entitled 'An act to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States,'" approved June 2, 1879; that in section 5 of said bill it is provided "that the expenses, services, and necessary charges which shall have been incurred by the health officer at any port of entry within the United States in the care and detention of such passengers as shall be detained under the provisions of this act, or under the rules and regulations made in pursuance thereof, shall be a lien on the vessel bringing such passengers on account of whom such expenses, services, and charges have been incurred; and if the masters, owners, or consignees shall not pay such expenses and charges within three days after they shall have been rendered, the health officer shall proceed to enforce said lien, or he may have and maintain action against the masters, owners, or consignees of such vessels to recover the amount of such expenses, services, and charges in the district court of the United States within whose jurisdiction the port of entry is situated."

And in section 6 of the same bill it is furthermore provided that, "to pay the necessary expenses of placing vessels in proper sanitary condition to be incurred under the provisions of this act, the National Board of Health be, and hereby is, authorized and required to make the necessary rules and regulations fixing the amount of fees to be paid by vessels for such service, and the manner of collecting the same."

Now, your petitioners represent that while a national quarantine system may be desirable, there is no good reason why the system should be maintained chiefly at the expense of a special interest already too heavily taxed. The proposed quarantine is for the benefit of the people at large, and on them, and not on any particular branch of commerce, should the expense be imposed. It is respectfully suggested that the shipping interest at this time needs the fostering care of Congress, and that national and local duties and charges on vessels, such as those for pilotage, wharfage, harbor-masters', port-wardens', United States inspectors' fees, tonnage dues and consular fees in foreign ports, as well as the State quarantine fees, are already of so grave a character as to seriously jeopardize the shipping business, and that this property is now much more heavily burdened than is any other class.

For these, and for the further reason that an unlimited discretion as to amount of these charges is vested in the board, and for other obvious reasons, your petitioners respectfully but earnestly protest against the passage of that portion of the bill which imposes on the interest which they represent a large part of the expense of maintaining a national quarantine.

Mr. HARRIS. As the bill has been reported to the Senate, I ask that the petition lie on the table. I desire to say that the petition addresses itself to the bill as originally introduced, but the features of which it complains do not appear in the bill as reported from the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will lie on the table.

Mr. BLAIR presented the petition of Caroline French, widow of the late William H. French, brevet major-general, United States Army, praying to be allowed a pension and other relief; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GEORGE presented a petition of farmers and members of the grange in the State of Mississippi, praying for the passage of the bill for a ship-canal across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec; which was ordered to lie on the table.

PROVIDENCE HOSPITAL.

Mr. BUTLER. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to ask unanimous consent of the Senate to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 1127) for the relief of Providence Hospital, of the city of Washington, District of Columbia, was indefinitely postponed, with a view of asking its recommittal to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote by which the bill was postponed indefinitely will be reconsidered, if there be no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the ground of the application?

Mr. BUTLER. The ground of the application to recommit is because the committee at the time it made the adverse report was not fully in possession of all the facts which it has come in possession of since; and it therefore wants to reconsider the subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is satisfactory to me, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the vote by which the bill was postponed indefinitely is reconsidered, and the bill is recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1612) to provide for the closing of an alley in square 751 in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and for the relief of the Little Sisters of the Poor, reported it without amendment.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 1754) to punish breaking and entering banks, shops, stores, and other buildings in the District of Columbia with intent to commit larceny or any felony therein; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 717) for the relief of William M. Beebe, jr, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JACKSON. The Committee on Pensions have directed me to report the bill (H. R. No. 5158) for the relief of James F. Cullen adversely. There is a majority report adverse to the allowance of the pension and a minority report favoring it. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BLAIR. There is a minority report in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was so stated. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 140) to regulate the disposal of coal lands in the State of Alabama, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. COKE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1620) to authorize the construction of a street-railway and wagon-road bridge over the Rio Grande River between the city of El Paso, Texas, and Paso del Norte, Mexico, reported it with amendments.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the petition of Oliver Evans Wood, praying payment of his claim for royalty on knapsacks made for the Government, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1588) to authorize the changing of alley-ways in the city of Washington, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CALL, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1541) for the relief of Isaac E. Palmer, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. ALDRICH asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1755) granting a pension to Mrs. Kady Brownell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CHILCOTT asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1756) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to dispose of the military reservation at Fort Lewis, in the State of Colorado, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONGER asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1757) to provide for the erection of a public building at Detroit, Michigan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. KELLOGG asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1758) for the relief of the Citizens' Bank of Louisiana, in the State of Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution correcting the enrollment of the bill (H. R. No. 3869) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 1290) to amend sections 2586 and 2587 of the Revised Statutes of the United States by creating the collection district of Yaquina, in the State of Oregon, and authorizing the appointment of a collector therein; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

SOLDIERS' HOME AT HARRODSBURGH.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask leave to call up Senate bill No. 506, which was reported by the Committee on Military Affairs and was passed over without prejudice some days ago when reached on the Calendar, at the request of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. SEWELL.] He consents now that the bill be taken up and passed.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 506) authorizing the board of commissioners of the Soldiers' Home to sell certain property at Harrodsburgh, Kentucky, belonging to the Soldiers' Home.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert—

That the board of commissioners of the Soldiers' Home be, and are hereby, authorized to sell the property belonging to the Soldier's Home situated at Harrodsburgh, Kentucky, and known as the Harrodsburgh Springs property.

SEC. 2. That said property shall be sold on the premises, and to the highest and best bidder, on a day to be fixed by the board of commissioners, after they shall have advertised the time, terms, and place of sale for thirty days in the Louisville Commercial, the Louisville Courier-Journal, and two other papers published in the vicinity of the property: Provided, That the commissioners shall be, and hereby are, authorized to withdraw said property after it shall have been offered on the day of sale if a satisfactory bid shall not be received, and to readvertise said property for sale as above designated should there be a failure of sale from any cause.

SEC. 3. That the said board of commissioners shall sell said property for cash in hand, and that an immediate payment of $500 shall be paid by the purchaser at said sale, to be deducted from the cash payment to be made by him on delivery of the deed, from which sum all the expenses of the sale shall be deducted in case said purchaser fails to comply with the full terms of the sale within thirty days from its date, the balance, if any, to be returned to the person making such payment; and when the purchase-money shall have been paid to said board of commissioners they are directed to make to the purchaser a deed of conveyance for said property, and when said deed shall have been made and properly acknowledged the United States shall be divested of the title to said property, and the purchaser shall be invested with the full title to the same.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is a very short report accompanying the bill, which may be read. It states the case much better than I could.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. LOGAN January 24, 1882:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 506) authorizing the commissioners of the Soldiers' Home to sell certain property at Harrodsburgh, Kentucky, belonging to the Soldiers' Home, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

In reply to a communication from the committee, the commissioners of the Soldiers' Home answered as follows:

"OFFICE OF THE BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF THE SOLDIERS' HOME,
"(Room No. 16, Winder Building,)
"Washington, D. C., December 17, 1881.

"SIR: The commissioners of the Soldiers' Home have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your request of the 16th instant for a report upon the merits of a bill, Senate No. 506, a copy of which was inclosed, to authorize the board to sell certain property of the home near Harrodsburgh, Kentucky, known as the Harrodsburgh Springs property.

"It is the earnest desire of the commissioners that Congress shall authorize the sale of the property mentioned, as it has not been for many years, and probably never will be again, occupied by the Soldiers' Home.

"The bill appears to be the same as the one that passed the House of Representatives January 24, 1879, and was reported in the Senate and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary January 28, 1879, except that the House bill fixed a minimum price of $10,000 for the property, and made the terms of the sale one-third cash in hand, one-third in six months, and the remaining third in one year. The present bill mentions no price and proposes a cash sale.

"There appears to be but one objection to the bill under consideration. If it shall become a law and the commissioners shall commence proceeding under it, there will be no means of protecting the interests of the Home against any contingency which might limit the highest and best bid to a sum that would be half the value of the property, or less. The requirement in section 2 that the property shall be sold to the highest and best bidder, on a day to be fixed, would compel the commissioners to sell it on that day without remedy against any combination to obtain it at less than its value. The commissioners should be authorized to withdraw the property after it shall be put up on the day of the sale if a satisfactory bid shall not be received, and to repeat the advertisement and sale as at first, in the event of no sale from any cause.

"It is suggested that the sum of $500 be named in the bill as a forfeit, payment to be made cash in hand by the successful bidder at the time of the sale as soon as the property is struck off, from which sum all the expenses of the sale shall be deducted to reimburse the home in case said bidder fails to comply with the full terms of the sale within thirty days from its date. The balance, if any, to be returned to the person making such payment.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

"JOS. K. BARNES, Surgeon-General, U. S. A.,
"R. MACFEELY, Comy. Genl. of Sub., U. S. A.,
"R. C. DRUM, Adjutant-General, U. S. A.,
"Commissioners of the Soldiers' Home.

"To the CHAIRMAN
"Of the Committee on Military Affairs, United State Senate."

The use of the property for the purpose originally designated was discontinued many years since, for the reason, among others, that the number of applicants from the Army was not sufficient to keep up two establishments, and consequently the one at Washington was retained and this one closed. The place is rapidly going to waste, the buildings and improvements are destroyed, and the property is leased at a low rate.

The committee agree with the commissioners in recommending its sale, and in accordance with the changes proposed report herewith a substitute for the bill, and recommend its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OMAHA INDIAN RESERVATION.

The bill (S. No. 1255) to provide for the sale of a part of the reservation of the Omaha tribe of Indians, in the State of Nebraska, and for other purposes, was announced as the first in order upon the Calendar, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

Mr. SAUNDERS. On reflection I have come to the conclusion, so far as I am concerned, that it would be well to adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] That would secure to the Indians all the rights which they may have acquired on this land prior to the passage of the bill, if any. I consent to that in order, as much as anything else, to get rid of the question raised by the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] and dispose of the bill, because the question will evidently come up on the bill which is now before the Senate providing for distributing lands in severalty among the Indians of the several tribes throughout the whole country, both in the Territories and in the States. Inasmuch as the question will necessarily almost have to be discussed at that time, I think it would be well to let it go over until that bill comes up and to adopt now the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, which will give all that will be required in this case. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate. I merely rose to state that much as being my own views on the subject now.

Mr. INGALLS. Under parliamentary practice the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts is not strictly in order until my motion to amend has been first disposed of. But as I believe that the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts will dispose of the point that I raised and reserve the general subject of exemption from taxation to be considered hereafter, with unanimous consent I will withdraw the amendment I offered in order that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts may be acted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas withdraws his amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I now offer my amendment, and I should like to have it read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The ACTING SECRETARY. In section 4, line 6, it is proposed to strike out all after the word "provided," as follows:

That patents issued to Indians shall expressly state that the lands conveyed shall, for the period of twenty-five years from the date thereof, be inalienable and exempt from incumbrance and taxation, and that the title in its descent shall conform to the laws of the State of Nebraska.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That any right in severalty acquired by any Indian under existing treaties shall not be affected by this act.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Massachusetts perhaps explained that amendment yesterday. There is no report accompanying the bill, and I happened to be in attendance on a session of a committee yesterday. I want to vote intelligently upon the amendment, and would be glad to hear what it means.

Mr. DAWES. The adoption of this amendment does not affect the merits of the whole bill. The whole bill rests upon a recommendation of the committee that it is proper to sell off from this reservation of about one hundred and fifty thousand acres 50,000 acres in a block on the western side of it. That is one question. But the Omaha Indians have the whole reservation and occupy it under an existing treaty in which it is stipulated that any Indian may go upon any part of the whole reservation and occupy one hundred and sixty acres for the head of a family, and eighty acres for a single individual, and shall be entitled under the treaty to an instrument in writing from the United States which is equivalent to a qualified patent.

It is said by the Senator from Nebraska that no one of the Indians has so gone upon the 50,000 acres which it is proposed to sell. There are, however, quite a number of them who have gone onto some part of the reservation and made such locations, and who are entitled under existing treaties to the qualified patent; they have come to Congress praying that Congress will give them the patent. To make it perfectly safe and preserve the rights of any Indian who may have located upon this land is the design of my amendment. I do not know that it will apply to any Indian, though I am not quite certain but what it will. Whether the bill with that amendment ought to pass is quite another question.

Mr. BECK. The only object I have, after hearing some of the discussion yesterday, but not much of it, is to so vote as to carry out the idea that, as the Indians have by treaty this reservation now, and the United States does not presume to tax it, and as they have a right to go upon any part of it and we have a right to locate them in severalty, we should assert the right to locate them in severalty. Mr. President, I cannot hear myself, and I do not propose to talk in the midst of so much confusion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will please come to order. Gentlemen who are here by the courtesy of the Senate will take seats. Does the Senator from Kentucky consent to be interrupted under the five-minute rule?

Mr. BECK. I do not desire to be interrupted by people talking all over the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire to be interrupted by any Senator?

Mr. BECK. On any question he may desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then it will be taken out of the Senator's time.

Mr. BECK. Certainly; I am seeking information now.

I desire that we shall have the right to locate in severalty these Indians upon their land and that we shall not tax them, and that when we do so locate them we shall put such a limitation as will enable them to hold the land for twenty or twenty-five years, so that no white man can swindle them out of their property. As we hold the whole reservation by treaty, on which we impose no taxes, I do not at all agree with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] that the State of Nebraska, or any other State, has the right of taxation. When we locate an Indian upon a portion of the territory in which he is now free from taxation, for the purpose of making the experiment of civilizing him by giving him a home of his own, we should protect him from taxation; we should protect him from being swindled; we should prevent white men from trading with him and taking that land away from him. We are about to enter upon the experiment of civilizing the Indians by giving them separate homesteads and by encouraging them in the arts of agriculture. If, when that is done, we are obliged, as seems to be intended, to submit them to State and other taxation, they will lose their land by taxation. If we allow white men to trade with them, they will get it away from them.

If we begin with the Omahas now and make their lands subject to taxation and give them the right to trade, and if the experiments we are now making are failures, then other Indians will not come under the terms we are now seeking to impose upon the Omahas unless they are protected—protected against themselves, protected against the right of white men to take their lands away from them. If this is an experiment made with uncommonly intelligent Indians, and if we can make it a success by giving them homes and protecting them from themselves, protecting their lands from sale, taxation, or anything else in the reservation that now belongs to them, then we are making a step in advance, and we can point the other Indians to it and show how the Omahas were protected by the Government in their efforts at civilization and in having homes of their own; whereas if the other rule prevails and we give it to them absolutely, and it can be taken away for taxes or by sales under judgments, every other Indian will point to the fact that the Omahas made the experiment and that it was a failure; and we may as well quit trying to give them homes.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I appreciate very fully the importance of this question, but I do not think my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has stated it in all its length and breadth. If I understand the bill, it proposes to authorize the sale of an Indian reservation located in the body of a State. The Indians desire to sell the lands, and it is not denied that the lands may be purchased by white people as well as by Indians; they are to be put up to the highest bidder and sold for the benefit of the tribe. It is understood that an Indian has the right of purchase the same as a white man with respect to the land.

I want to know if the Senator from Kentucky is prepared to advance the doctrine that when a white man or half a dozen white men purchase titles to land within this reservation and settle down with Indians on it, the one may be taxed by the State of Nebraska and the other not? Is that to be the rule?

Mr. BECK. I mean to say, if the Senator will allow me, that this reservation and all Indian reservations may be divided up into a hundred lesser reservations, and if there are forty-nine thousand acres of this fifty thousand acres sold to white men, and the remaining one thousand acres held by Indians and allotted to them in severalty, we have a right to regard that one thousand acres of the fifty thousand acres as still remaining a part of the Indian reservation, and we can protect them against taxation and against sales as we could if the original reservation had never been broken up, and it is only so far——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I have but five minutes.

Mr. BECK. They are not taxed, they cannot be; and if they are our wards why may we not protect them?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not deny the right of the Government to deal with the Indians in a tribal organization, but I cannot subscribe to the principle put forth by the Senator from Kentucky in this case. I say we may divide up an Indian reservation into lots, and give each Indian his share, and keep from among them the white people; but if the General Government undertakes to mix up that Indian reservation with the territory of Kansas and authorizes the sale of their lands and the purchase of them by white men, and they are put side by side, you can never exempt the Indians from taxation in such a case as that without leading to great trouble and confusion.

What was the case of Georgia? The General Government recognized the right of the Cherokees to maintain their independent organization. The State of Georgia insisted upon her laws being extended over them. It created a controversy that almost drove the two peoples into bloodshed. The mandate of the Supreme Court was disregarded. The State of Georgia asserted her right over the Indians, and this Government denied it. We do not want any more troubles like that.

If you undertake to sell the Indian lands, and to permit the white people to buy them and settle side by side with the Indians, and thus consolidate and unite these two populations together, you cannot apply one rule to one and another to another. If you want to give Indians land in severalty, separate them from the white masses; recognize their independent organization, but do not undertake to mix them up side by side with the white people under such a system as this.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. I understand from him that it is proposed to sell about fifty thousand acres of this reservation to anybody who chooses to purchase, Indian, white man, or anybody else. Do I understand that the Senator proposes to protect an Indian who purchases part of that 50,000 acres and takes it in severalty—does he propose to exempt that Indian from taxation?

Mr. DAWES. The Senator was not present, I presume, yesterday during the discussion, for such a case as this was expressly excepted. If my amendment is adopted the question now raised becomes an abstract question so far as this bill is concerned. It has no application to this bill. It is a very important question. I agree with the Senator from Kentucky that if we are under treaty stipulations with Indians whom we have put upon a reservation that we will guarantee them the land upon which there is a tribe whenever they choose to take it in severalty, quoad hoc each individual Indian occupies to that extent the reservation, with all the treaty stipulations around him to protect and guard him; but if an Indian buys like a white man any portion of this 50,000 acres, to come back to this bill, no one supposes that he ought to be upon any other ground than a white man who purchases a part of it.

But the reason for this discussion and the purpose of the original phraseology in the bill was to reach another class of Indians, a class of Indians who had gone under treaty stipulation in severalty upon certain portions of the one hundred and fifty thousand acres, and claim under the treaty a right in severalty to that land under treaty stipulations which protect the whole tribe when they occupy it in common from taxation and from judgments; and it has always been supposed that we had authority under such circumstances to protect the Indian who took his title not by purchase as a white man does, but under treaty stipulation from taxation. But this amendment takes care of all those Indians without raising the question or passing upon the question suggested by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BUTLER. Why should not the principle apply just as well to the Indian who purchases outside of his reservation? The treaty stipulations apply, it seems to me, just as well if it is part of his land.

Mr. DAWES. The Indians as a tribe consent. This bill goes upon the theory that the Indians as a tribe consent to part with fifty thousand acres of their land, and to take in lieu thereof the proceeds of the sale. [The President pro tempore rapped with his gravel.] I hope the Senate will indulge me to answer the question. The bill provides for the mode of selling the land. If an Indian comes in as a purchaser, he comes in precisely as a white man. That is the answer.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] raises a new question about which I should like to have some information. This bill proposes to sell 50,000 acres of the Omaha reservation. It seems to me before we agree to make this sale, or assent to it, we ought to know exactly how much land there is in the Omaha reservation, and whether it is a wise thing for us to part with this amount of their land on their account; and I should be glad to have somebody familiar with this bill inform us the extent of this reservation, the number of Indians upon it, and what there will be left for them in the way of agriculture when these 50,000 acres shall be sold, because if our general theory be true with reference to the Indian tribes that they ought to be made self-supporting and that they ought to take their lands in severalty at some time, we certainly ought not to part with the lands which they must in future occupy in that way. So I think somebody who has charge of this bill or who has particular knowledge of it ought to give us some information on these points.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I think I can answer to the satisfaction of the Senator from Iowa and others the question he has stated. The question was raised some time ago when this bill was before the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I took it upon myself to write to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to ascertain whether I was correct or not as to the number of acres included in the reservation. I have this reply:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, December 15, 1881.

SIR: Replying to your note, received this morning, relative to the amount of land contained in the Omaha reserve, I have to say that the reserve contained 143,225 acres. The Omahas number 1,121, which would give each member of the tribe about one hundred and twenty-eight acres.

Yours, respectfully,

H. PRICE, Commissioner.

Hon. A. SAUNDERS, United States Senate.

Deduct this from that, and it will leave 93,000 acres, or more than eighty acres to each individual member of the tribe, which is more than is required by any bill now before the Senate on the subject of dividing Indian lands in severalty. That letter is from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs himself, so it is evidently correct.

While I am on the floor I wish to state that I was probably misunderstood yesterday by some Senators who understood me to say that this land would be sold at $2.50 per acre. What I meant to say, and what I think I did say, was that none of it according to this bill would be sold for less than $2.50 per acre. It is to be appraised by three individuals, one to be selected by the Indians themselves, and two by the Secretary of the Interior, and the land is not to be sold for less than the amount appraised by these individuals. I have gone further than any other bill that I know of in requiring the land to be put up to the highest bidder above that. No one can buy for less than the appraised value, but every one will have to give the highest price offered at the sale. I do not know of any bill that has made that provision except this one. I thought it was proper to do so, lest it might be said hereafter that the land was thrown into the market at a low rate. As the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] suggests, it is generally sold to the lowest bidder; but this bill requires it to go to the highest bidder, and then at not less than the appraised value, and none of it to be sold for less than $2.50 per acre. I know of nothing fairer that could be got up on this subject. The object of the Government is to sell this land and get it into cultivation, and the object of the Indians is to get the money and have it put in trust for them here in Washington where they can draw their interest.

There are eighteen miles of railroad running through this land that has not a house, or a tree, or a fence in it, or a fence-rail on it, nothing yielding anything in any shape or form. Every Senator here will see, when he knows that it is a first-class country, that the land will bring a good price, and that it ought to be sold and put into cultivation. The only thing was to see that the Indians themselves were ready for it. Twice they have expressed themselves already in open council in favor of it, and the bill requires that it shall be done a third time, and that the land shall not be sold until they do decide in open council that they want it sold. So there is nothing fairer than this bill as I have presented it now, and I am ready to answer any questions I can on the subject, if the Senate is not already fully satisfied.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KICKAPOO LANDS IN KANSAS.

The bill (S. No. 469) to provide for the sale of certain Kickapoo Indian lands was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to cause to be appraised and sold, for cash, to the highest bidder, after due advertisement, in tracts not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres to any one person, the following-described tracts of land in the State of Kansas, reserved, in accordance with the provisions of the amended eleventh article of the treaty made June 28, 1862, by and between the United States and the Kickapoo tribe of Indians, for mill-site and missionary and agency purposes, namely: the south half of section 4, township 5, range 16, and the north half of section 9, township 5, range 16, for mill-site purposes; the south half of section 33, township 4, range 17, reserved for mission purposes; lots 5, 6, and 7, section 3, township 5, range 17, and lot 6, section 15, township 5, range 17, reserved for agency purposes: Provided, That no tract shall be sold for less than the appraised value thereof, and in no case for less than $6 per acre.

SEC. 2. That the net proceeds of the sale of said lands, after deducting therefrom the expense incident to said appraisement and sale, shall be deposited in the United States Treasury to the credit of the Kickapoo tribe of Indians, and shall bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum; and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to expend the interest annually accumulating thereon, and all or any part of the principal fund, at such time and in such manner as he may deem for the best interests of said Indians: Provided, That if the Secretary of the Interior shall direct the payment of said principal sum in installments, the unpaid portion thereof shall continue to draw interest until paid.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause patents in fee-simple to be issued to the purchasers of the land sold under the provisions of this act in the same manner as patents are issued for the public lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the sale of certain Kickapoo Indian lands in Kansas."

APPOINTMENT OF ORDNANCE OFFICER.

The bill (H. R. No. 721) to authorize the appointment of V. McNally as an ordnance storekeeper in the Army was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 4, after the word "appoint," to strike out "V. McNally, the present chief clerk of the Ordnance Department;" so as to make the bill read:

That the President is hereby authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint an ordnance storekeeper in the Ordnance Department of the Army; and all laws inconsistent herewith are hereby suspended for the purposes of this act only: Provided, That prior to his appointment he shall have passed a satisfactory examination before a board of ordnance officers.

Mr. ALLISON. When this bill was under consideration a day or two since I objected to it. I shall not object now to its consideration, but I should be glad to have the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] who seems to be interested in it, explain the necessity of the passage of this bill at this time. It adds one ordnance storekeeper to the number now authorized by law in the Army, giving him the rank and pay of a captain of cavalry. I think there should be some great necessity for this departure.

Mr. HAWLEY. Lest I may forget it I will at once correct the Senator on one point. The existing law gives a fixed pay of $2,000 a year to an ordnance storekeeper. The necessity for this bill is to my mind and that of the committee entirely clear. In the act of June 23, 1874, in one of the bills reorganizing portions of the military service, it was provided among other things that the office of ordnance storekeeper should run out, so to speak, that no vacancy should be filled; the consequence of which has been that out of eleven storekeepers now upon the rolls only four are active and fit for service. The others are either upon permanent sick leave or are over seventy years of age. Six or seven of them will be retired if the retirement clause in the Army appropriation bill shall pass the Senate.

The Ordnance Department is entirely clear as to the necessity for a limited number of these officers. I will state the value of the property and the actual expenditures at four armories and arsenals:

National armory, Springfield, Massachusetts, the value of arms and other ordnance stores and supplies is about six million dollars. The expenditures last year were $449,496.

At Watervliet arsenal $3,500,000 of property, and the expenditure last year was $133,093.

At Frankford arsenal $2,250,000 of property, and last year the expenditure was $136,940.

At Rock Island arsenal we have about two million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars of property, and last year the expenditure was $348,786. Besides there is a large quantity of ordnance stores in other places.

So long as these old storekeepers were able to perform the duty there was no difficulty arising from the law of 1874, but they are passing away, they are getting old, they are becoming disabled. The Ordnance Department needs storekeepers; and how shall it get along? It can take some young lieutenant of the Ordnance Department, and put him on duty there. He must receipt for a very large amount of property, he has these large sums to disburse, he gives no bond, and in a month or two or three he is called upon to go elsewhere to other service. It is not his business to be a mere storekeeper of property. It is not worth while to educate men at West Point to be mere storekeepers; but nevertheless the place requires, as the Senate will see, responsible and capable men.

The storekeeper known to the statute gives a bond for $40,000 and is supposed to stay some time and to understand this business, and the Department, I have no doubt correctly, states its need of another officer of this kind. The papers on that part of the subject are abundant.

The original bill provided that the President might nominate one Victor McNally for this additional place as storekeeper. That is all well enough, because McNally has been in the service twenty years and has in the very highest degree the confidence of the whole Department. He has been eleven years its chief clerk, but the Senate Military Committee thought, and I think on the whole wisely, that it is enough for us to make an office and not to usurp the appointing power of the President; and therefore the committee instructed me to present this amendment, striking out all that refers to McNally and simply giving the Ordnance Department another storekeepership, which the President may fill as he sees fit.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the appointment of an ordnance storekeeper in the Army."

LANDS IN SEVERALTY TO PEORIAS AND MIAMIES.

The bill (S. No. 447) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to the United Peorias and Miamies of the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 2, line 19, after the word "acres," to insert "except the chiefs of each tribe, who shall receive two allotments each, or four hundred and forty acres;" so as to make the clause read:

Each share or allotment not to exceed two hundred and twenty acres, except the chiefs of each tribe, who shall receive two allotments each, of four hundred and forty acres.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senator from Kansas if these Indians have their chiefs elected annually? How is that?

Mr. INGALLS. I understand that their chiefs are chosen by popular vote each year, but that, as a matter of fact, the office is practically hereditary, and that the same persons are re-elected from time to time so long as their services are acceptable.

Mr. COCKRELL. And this proposes to give those who may happen to be chiefs at the time this act passes the additional two hundred and twenty acres?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "the," in section 2, line 23, to strike out "agent and;" in line 25, after "approval," to insert "and revision;" and to insert, after "Interior," in line 26, "the same to be forwarded to the Secretary of the Interior as soon as practicable;" so as to make the clause read:

Rolls containing the names of all such persons so entitled to a distributive share in said lands shall be made out and certified by the chiefs of said tribes, who shall have power to decide as to who are entitled to be placed upon either of said rolls, subject to the approval and revision of the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 7, after "of," to strike out "said;" in the same line, after "months," to insert "after the date of their appointment;" in line 18, after "wards," insert "and persons of unsound mind;" and in line 39, after the word "Indians," to insert:

Provided, That before any selections of lands are made twenty acres shall be set aside for school-house and cemetery purposes on each reserve, to be selected by the chiefs of said tribes.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That within six months from and after the date of the passage of this act a commission of three persons shall be appointed, two of whom shall be selected by a council of said United Peorias and Miamies, and the other shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and whose duty it shall be within the period of six months after the date of their appointment to complete the allotment of the said lands in severalty to the said United Peorias and Miamies, said commission to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior. The salary of the said commission shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior at the time when the said commission is selected. The Secretary of the Interior shall furnish to the said commission any and all plats, reports, and papers showing the legal subdivisions by the surveys made of said lands. All allotments of said lands under the provisions of this act shall be made, if by an adult, by individual selection, heads of families selecting for their minor children, and guardians for their orphan wards and persons of unsound mind, in lots or parcels, contiguous or not, as may be fixed or agreed upon by the council of the said United Peorias and Miamies, and in such manner, as nearly as practicable, to embrace the improvements of the Indians making selections: Provided, That where the improvements of two or more members of said tribes shall have been made upon the same legal subdivision, and said parties cannot agree, the said commission shall have the power to decide, and their decision shall be final. The said commission shall, on completion of their duties as herein set forth, forward to the Secretary of the Interior a complete list of all the individual allotments made under this act, with apt description of the same, in order that patents, as hereinafter provided, may issue therefor, and shall also submit a statement showing the description and amount of any surplus land, if any there be, after said allotments have been made. Should any surplus remain after all said allotments of land have been made, the same may be disposed of to any member or members of said tribes upon such terms and conditions as the chiefs of the said tribes and the Secretary of the Interior may see fit, or that they may deem most advantageous to said Indians: Provided, That before any selections of lands are made twenty acres shall be set aside for school-house and cemetery purposes on each reserve, to be selected by the chiefs of said tribes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, line 10, after the word "provided," to strike out "for in case of lease;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the lands acquired by any Indian under and by virtue of this act shall not be subject to alienation, lease for a longer term than two years, or incumbrance, either by voluntary conveyance or by the judgment, order, or decree of any court, or subject to taxation of any character, but shall be and remain inalienable, and not subject to taxation, lien, or incumbrance, except as hereinbefore provided, for the period of twenty-five years from the date of the patent, which said restrictions shall be incorporated in the patent when issued; and if any conveyance shall be made by any allottee of the lands set apart and allotted to him or her before the expiration of the time above mentioned, the contract shall be absolutely null and void.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to add to section 5:

The laws of the State of Kansas concerning descents and distributions, and guardians and wards, are hereby made applicable to the said Miami and Peoria Indians and their descendants.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out section 6, in the following words:

SEC. 6. That the unallotted lands of the Miami Indians in Kansas, including the school sections, shall be disposed of in the following manner, to wit:

That each bona fide settler occupying any portion of said lands at the date of the passage of this act, and having made valuable improvements thereon, or the heirs-at-law of such, who is a citizen of the United States, or who has declared his intention to become such, shall be entitled at any time within one year from the passage of this act to purchase, for cash, the land so occupied and improved by him, not to exceed one hundred and sixty acres in each case, according to the Government survey, at the appraised value thereof, as heretofore ascertained by the Secretary of the Interior, in accordance with the provisions of the act of March 3, 1873, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe. And such persons who are entitled to purchase said lands as aforesaid shall be permitted to make payment therefor in three equal annual installments, the first installment to be payable on the day of the entry of the land, and the remaining two installments annually thereafter, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the date of entry.

That all lands not entered by said settlers at the expiration of one year from the date of this act, together with all the unoccupied and unallotted lands of the Miami Indians, shall be offered at public sale in the usual manner, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, at not less than the appraised value, notice of said sale to be given by public advertisement, of not less than sixty days, in three newspapers having general circulation in the State of Kansas; and any tract or tracts not then sold, together with such as may be hereafter entered, but wherein default may be made in the payment of any portion of the purchase-money, or the interest thereon as herein provided, shall be thereafter subject to private entry at the appraised value of the same.

And the net proceeds of the sales of said lands, after defraying the expenses of the sale, shall belong to said Miami Indians, and shall be disposed of as now provided by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, [8,] line 15, after the word "wards," to insert "and persons of unsound mind;" in line 19, after "tribes," to strike out "with the assistance of the agent;" in line 22, after "chiefs," to strike out "and agent shall have power to decide;" in line 23, after "decide," to insert "being the sole judges as to;" in line 24, after "rolls," insert "subject to the approval and revision of the Secretary of the Interior;" in line 29, after "of," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty-five;" in line 32, after "of," strike out "four" and insert "five;" in line 35, after "fund," to strike out "the same to be invested in said bonds;" in lines 38 and 39, to strike out the words "the said bonds shall be sold and the proceeds of the same;" in line 39, after "same," to insert "said principal sum shall;" and in line 14, to insert "Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to at once pay to the Peoria delegation now in Washington, District of Columbia, $1,000;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That within ninety days from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay over to the said Peoria, Wea, Kaskaskia, and Piankeshaw Indians, except as hereinafter provided, all money belonging to said Peoria, Wea, Kaskaskia, and Piankeshaw Indians, and heretofore invested by the United States for the benefit of said Indians, together with all money now in the custody of the United States and belonging to said Indians, and arising from any and all sources whatsoever, principal and interest, the same to be paid out under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior per capita to all of said Peoria, Wea, Kaskaskia, and Piankeshaw Indians who may elect to receive their full proportion of said tribal funds, heads of families choosing for their minor children, and guardians for their orphan wards and persons of unsound mind. All persons entitled to such per capita share shall make known to the chiefs of said tribes their decision within thirty days from and after the passage of this act; whereupon the chiefs of said tribes shall cause rolls of the same to be made out and forwarded to the Secretary of the Interior as soon as practicable thereafter; the said chiefs being the sole judges as to who are entitled to be placed upon either of said rolls, subject to the approval and revision of the Secretary of the Interior. That from the total amount of all of said funds found due and payable to said Peoria, Wea, Kaskaskia, and Piankeshaw Indians there shall be deducted and retained by the United States the sum of $25,000, the same to be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Secretary of the Interior in trust for said Indians, which shall bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, the interest to be paid semi-annually, and to be known as "the Peoria, Wea, Kaskaskia, and Piankeshaw Indian school fund," for the period of ten years, or until such time as a Territorial form of government shall be established over said Indian Territory, when said principal sum shall become due and payable to said Indians in such manner as they shall decide: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to at once pay to the Peoria delegation now in Washington, District of Columbia, $1,000.

The next amendment was, in section 8, [9,] line 3, to strike out, after the word "as," the word "hereinafter," and insert "herein;" in line 11, after "wards," to insert "and persons of unsound mind;" in line 12, after the word "tribe," to strike out "with the assistance of the agent of said tribe;" in line 15, after "said," to strike out "agent;" in line 17, after "rolls," to insert "subject to the approval and revision of the Secretary of the Interior;" in line 21, after "of," to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty;" in line 24, to strike out "four" and insert "five;" in line 26, after "fund," to strike out "the same to be invested in said bonds;" in line 29, to strike out, after "when," "the said bonds shall be sold, and the proceeds of the same;" in line 30, after the word "same," to insert "said principal sum;" in line 34, after "received," to strike out "up to the date of the passage of this act;" to strike out, in lines 36 and 37, the words "including the school sections referred to in section 8 of this act;" and to add, at the end of the section, "Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to pay to the Miami delegation now in Washington, District of Columbia, $1,000;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 8. That within ninety days from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay over, except as herein provided, to the said Miami Indians, all money belonging to said Indians, or that may be due to said Miami Indians from the United States arising from any and all sources whatsoever, principal and interest; the same to be paid out under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior per capita to the members of the said Miami tribe of Indians, to the heads of families for their minor children, and to guardians for their orphan wards and persons of unsound mind. The chiefs and councilors of said tribe shall cause pay-rolls to be made out, and forward the same to the Secretary of the Interior as soon as practicable thereafter; said chiefs and councilors shall have the power to decide who are properly entitled to be placed upon said rolls, subject to the approval and revision of the Secretary of the Interior. That from the total amount of all of said funds found due and payable to said Miami Indians there shall be deducted and retained by the United States the sum of $20,000, the same to be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Secretary of the Interior in trust for said Indians, which shall bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, the interest to be paid semi-annually, to be known as "The Miami Indian school fund," for the period of ten years, or until such time as a Territorial form of government shall be established over the said Indian Territory, when said principal sum shall become due and payable to said Indians in such manner as they shall decide. That all money received and now in the custody of the United States, or that may be received, arising from the sale of the unallotted lands in Kansas, shall immediately be available after the passage of this act; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay the same to said Miami Indians, in accordance with the provisions of the act of March 3, 1873: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to pay to the Miami delegation now in Washington, District of Columbia, $1,000.

The next amendment was, in section 10, [11,] after "sections," in line 7, to strike out "eight" and insert "seven;" and in the same line, after "and," to strike out "nine" and insert "eight;" so as to make the clause read:

Upon the selection of the same the chiefs of each tribe shall notify the Secretary of the Interior, giving the names of the persons so selected, and all money provided for by sections 7 and 8 of this act for the benefit of the educational interests of said Indians shall be paid to said boards upon their official application therefor by the Secretary of the Interior, &c.

The next amendment was to insert, after section 10, [11:]

SEC. 11. That upon the organization of a form of government over the Indian Territory any adult member of the said Peoria or Miami Indians who shall desire to become a citizen of the United States, and shall prove to the satisfaction of the proper court established therein that he or she is sufficiently intelligent and prudent to manage his or her own affairs, and is able to maintain himself or herself and family, and has adopted the habits of civilized life, and shall take an oath of allegiance to the United States, he or she shall be declared by said court to be a citizen of the United States, and that the lands held by him or her shall be free from levy, taxation, sale, or forfeiture, as provided by section 4 of this act.

The next amendment was, in section 12, line 1, after "that," to strike out "it is distinctly understood that;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 12. That no person or persons who have heretofore been attached to either of said tribes, and who have withdrawn from either of said tribes and become citizens of the United States, and been paid any portion of the funds set apart for them and their families, shall have or be permitted to have any part or interest in and to any portion of the land or money allotted or paid to the said Peoria or Miami Indians under the provisions of this act. Where present members of either of said tribes shall have intermarried into each other's tribe, respectively, he or she shall not be barred from receiving his or her full share of all land and money divided per capita under this act among the tribe from which he or she originated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 14, after the word "act," in line 2, to strike out "either as to land or money;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 14. That any act or acts of Congress heretofore passed that may conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas why 4 per cent. is stricken out and 5 per cent. inserted, making the Government liable to pay 5 per cent. upon this fund instead of 4 per cent.?

Mr. INGALLS. There is no reason except that upon deliberation in the committee it was thought, in view of the condition of these Indians and from the further fact that the funds that they now possess bear that rate of interest, that 4 per cent. was insufficient and that 5 per cent. should be recommended for the judgment of the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

H. C. LINN.

The bill (S. No. 1367) for the relief of H. C. Linn was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $133.25 to H. C. Linn, Indian agent at the Pottawatomie agency, Kansas, that sum being the amount of fees and costs rendered by the district court of Brown County, Kansas, against Linn in the case of Pah-pah-she-not, an Indian who was arrested and tried for stealing a horse from a member of the Kickapoo tribe of Indians.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELECTION OF EXECUTIVE OFFICERS.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 46) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That can go over. I give notice, however, that on Thursday of next week I expect to call it up for a second reading, when I shall submit some remarks upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

HIRAM JOHNSON AND OTHERS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 488) to pay Hiram Johnson and other persons herein named the several sums of money herein specified, being the surplus of a military assessment paid by them and accounted for to the United States in excess of the amount required for the indemnity for which it was levied and collected.

Mr. INGALLS. Let that bill pass over for the present.

Mr. JACKSON. Let it go over without prejudice.

Mr. CONGER. I hope that bill will go to the Calendar, so as to be taken up at some time other than the morning hour.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the bill may be permitted to hold its place on the Calendar. I shall be glad to consider it either in the morning hour or at any time the Senate will consent to do so, but I hope it will be passed over at present without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be so done unless there is objection.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say in regard to this bill that from information which I have obtained since the matter was before the Committee on Claims, I am satisfied that the time for discussing the bill should be longer and more general than can be allowed under the five-minute rule, and so far as I have the power I shall object to its consideration in the morning hour; but I may be absent when it is reached again, and therefore wish that it may be disposed of now so that I shall know it is not to come up in the morning hour in my absence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will remain on the Calendar.

Mr. HARRIS. I shall not insist, of course, now or at any other time, if any Senator thinks that the bill cannot be discussed under the five-minute rule, but shall ask the Senate to fix some time at which it will consider it; but I hope the Senator will not force it to lose its place on the Calendar by a peremptory objection at this time.

Mr. CONGER. If there can be an understanding that if it comes up in my absence it shall not be considered in the morning hour——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will recollect it.

Mr. CONGER. Very well.

MEMPHIS HARBOR.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1413) making an appropriation for continuing the improvements of Memphis Harbor, State of Tennessee.

Mr. CONGER. The Mississippi River commission bill proposes, if it shall pass and become a law, to embrace all the appropriations for the Mississippi River, including this, and until that is disposed of it would be better not to take up these separate appropriations and pass them, but to leave all to the work of the commission.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me to suggest to him in connection with the point he is now making that the same committee that reports the Mississippi River bill, as it is termed, reported at a previous day this appropriation. They reported the Mississippi River bill with a full knowledge of the fact that they had recommended this appropriation in order to continue this work that is now progressing, and that cannot be continued without this appropriation.

Mr. CONGER. That was the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River?

Mr. HARRIS. The same committee reported both bills, and reported the Mississippi River bill with a full knowledge of the fact that they had reported this bill.

Mr. CONGER. That committee stepped a little beyond its proper limits in assuming to report bills making appropriations for objects under the general river and harbor bill. That committee has charge of the appropriations which are made for the Mississippi River in connection with its improvement under the commission. The Committee on Commerce has had and should now——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CONGER. I think it had better wait.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Michigan yield to me a moment for a word that may throw some light upon this matter? I take it from what I hear from the title of the bill and from what the Senator from Tennessee has said, that this is an appropriation to be used under Major Benyaurd, who is in charge of the work on the Mississippi River at Memphis.

Mr. HARRIS. It is.

Mr. HARRISON. I think, then, that it is not included at all in the general estimate which has been made by the Mississippi River commission; for, as I said yesterday, I think the policy of the commission has been, where engineers were on the river in charge of special works of improvement, and had begun and were executing those works, to leave the completion of them in the hands of those officers, simply exercising a supervision to see that they were conformable to the general plan of improvement. That is true of the upper river, and I think it is true of this appropriation at Memphis.

So I think it is not included in the general estimates of the Mississippi River commission which are reported in the Mississippi improvement bill that we have under discussion.

Mr. CONGER. Then it should go to the Committee on Commerce and have its consideration in connection with other appropriations outside of the Mississippi River improvement bill.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator will allow me one moment. I remember this bill perfectly well, and the testimony which was brought before the committee touching it. The rise of water was doing special harm to some improvements that had been made at Memphis Harbor, and it was deemed absolutely necessary that an early appropriation should be made, and that early work should commence on this in order to save improvements already made. I know that the committee was unanimous in the opinion that this appropriation should be made, and my recollection is that it was to be made available at once on the passage of the bill.

Mr. JACKSON. I will state to the Senator from Maine that the report was made unanimously by the Committee on the Mississippi River Improvement on a report of the special engineer in charge of the work.

Mr. FRYE. Yes.

Mr. JACKSON. That report is before me. No formal report was made by the committee; but the report of the engineer was before the committee, and he showed that the appropriation was important to continue this work.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the Senator from Michigan will not object.

Mr. CONGER. This officer is one of the engineers expending money by virtue of appropriations made in the river and harbor bill, not made to be expended by the Mississippi River commission, so that all this while there are two sets of authorities reporting upon bills for the improvement of the Mississippi. With a bill before us for $6,000,000 for that purpose, independent of the river and harbor bill, there comes up this bill, and others are pending, asking for appropriations to continue works now under the charge of the Engineer Department, commenced and heretofore paid for by appropriations made in the river and harbor bill. This is a continuation of a work of that kind. It is not merged into the Mississippi River commission, and the bill should go to the Committee on Commerce. There should be but one committee having charge of the appropriations made for expenditure by the War Department under the Chief of Engineers. This is one of those. This particular one may be a necessary appropriation. I am not speaking about that, but it should go to the Committee on Commerce, that it may have the proper and usual consideration there in connection with all other works in charge of that committee.

For that reason I desire either to move the reference of this bill to the Committee on Commerce, or to object to its passage until the river and harbor bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator will not object. Of course I shall submit to whatever the Senate may rule in respect to the bill; whether cheerfully or not does not matter. The importance of this work as a matter of time is shown by the report of the engineer in charge of it; and I am sure if the Senate will give its attention to that report it will not hesitate for one moment to make the appropriation, and to make it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. If no amendment be proposed it will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. May I take the liberty of inquiring how the bill proceeds when an objection is made?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator objects——

Mr. CONGER. I have said that I object to its consideration until the river and harbor bill comes up.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of the bill, notwithstanding the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee. A majority vote determines it.

Mr. CONGER. Let the majority determine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan objects to the further consideration of the bill, and the Senator from Tennessee moves that notwithstanding the objection the Senate proceed to its consideration. The question is on that motion.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the yeas and nays as a test question. One committee should have charge of this business, and why send it to another?

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee to let the bill go over until to-morrow, at any rate.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to its going over until to-morrow if any Senator desires that postponement, but I am not willing that it should go over on objection, to lose its place on the Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN. If a motion to postpone the Calendar in order to take up a particular case is pressed, except in rare instances, we break up the Anthony rule.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not propose to postpone the Calendar, but I do propose to avail myself of the right I have under the Anthony rule to invoke the will of the majority of the Senate as to whether we shall proceed now to consider the bill. I have no objection to its going over until to-morrow if any Senator desires that, but I am not willing that it should lose its place on the Calendar.

Mr. FRYE. I do not see the necessity of its going over until to-morrow. My recollection of this case is that it was very clearly shown to the committee that improvements had been commenced, that the money had given out, that in order to save from destruction the improvements which had already been commenced it was absolutely necessary to have an early appropriation. I do not see anything wrong about it or any danger of any mistake being made. It was carefully investigated by the committee.

Mr. CONGER. It was carefully investigated by a committee that had not charge of the subject-matter. Now, sir, I desire to say that I do not know but that there is a necessity for an immediate appropriation to preserve some works which are already commenced. The point with me is not whether there is that necessity, but it is whether this appropriation in common with all others shall be reported upon by the committee to which the subject-matter belongs under the rules of the Senate. That is all the point I desire to have determined, and for my own use hereafter. I desire to know whether one committee may report upon a subject which under the rules does not belong to it, and deprive another committee of the consideration which it requires. The only purpose I have is to have that point settled, and when that point is settled by the Senate I can regulate my own action in regard to my measures by asking different committees to report on different subjects.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GROOME, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] on political questions. I withhold my vote on this motion, as I do not know how he would vote.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 32, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—32.

Bayard,	Fair,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Beck,	Farley,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Blair,	Frye,	Kellogg,	Slater,
Butler,	Garland,	McPherson,	Vance,
Call,	George,	Maxey,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Mitchell,	Walker,
Coke,	Harris,	Morgan,	Williams,
Davis of Illinois,	Jackson,	Pendleton,	Windom.

NAYS—15.

Aldrich,	Ferry,	McDill,	Saunders,
Anthony,	Hale,	Morrill,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Platt,	Sherman.
Conger,	Lapham,	Rollins,

ABSENT—29.

Allison,	Gorman,	Johnston,	Plumb,
Brown,	Groome,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,
Camden,	Grover,	Lamar,	Sewell,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harrison,	Logan,	Van Wyck,
Chilcott,	Hill of Colorado,	McMillan,	Voorhees.
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Mahone,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Miller of Cal.,
Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Miller of N. Y.,

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1413) making an appropriation for continuing the improvements of Memphis Harbor, State of Tennessee. It proposes to appropriate $25,000 for the purpose of continuing the improvement of Memphis Harbor, Tennessee, which improvements are now being prosecuted under the direction of the Secretary of War, and the appropriation for which is wholly insufficient to continue the work of improving and protecting the harbor to the end of the current fiscal year.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the report in this case be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no written report.

Mr. JACKSON. There is no written report made in the case by the committee. I have the report of Major Benyaurd, the special engineer in charge of the work, and he shows that the appropriation made in 1878 of $115,000 has been exhausted, that the special appropriation of $15,000 made in 1881 has been exhausted, and that the work is now in danger by reason of the late flood and needs special attention at once. This appropriation is intended to continue the work until the close of the current fiscal year.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Senator give me the date of that report?

Mr. JACKSON. The report bears date January 28, 1882.

Mr. CONGER. That was before the flood, then?

Mr. JACKSON. No, sir.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. No. 1096) for the relief of Harlan and Hollingsworth & Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to have that bill passed over without prejudice if the committee will agree with me, as there are some matters in connection with it on which I am now seeking information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice, if there be no objection.

Mr. McPHERSON. And also the bill following it (S. No. 1103) for the relief of Secor & Co., Perine, Secor & Co., and Zeno Secor, as it appears to be on all fours with the previous bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill will also be passed over without prejudice.

L. MADISON DAY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 73) for the relief of L. Madison Day.

Mr. COCKRELL. We have not time to consider that. It may be considered at any other time, but not now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill No. 1572, upon which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] is entitled to the floor.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. McDILL] has indicated a desire to address the Senate at this hour, and I will yield to him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. According to custom the Senator from Iowa has a right to be heard now. He introduced a bill, and gave notice some days ago that he would ask to be heard upon it at two o'clock to-day.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1993) to amend sections 2582, 2583, 2607, and 2684 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the collection districts of California; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2997) granting right of way to the Fremont, Elk Horn and Missouri Valley Railroad Company across the Niobrara military reservation, in the State of Nebraska, and authorizing the sale of a portion of said reservation.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 361) for a public building at Frankfort, Kentucky.

MINNIE HARMON.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider a vote by which the Senate indefinitely postponed the bill (H. R. No. 3404) granting a pension to Minnie Harmon. I do this with the assent of the Senator who made the report, [Mr. JACKSON,] with a view to have it recommitted with further testimony.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the vote indefinitely postponing the bill will be regarded as reconsidered, and the bill recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

EPIDEMIC DISEASES.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to give notice that I will on Monday next at two o'clock ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1049) amending an act entitled "An act to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States."

CORRECTING ENROLLMENT OF A BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] desires to have immediate consideration for.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That in enrolling House bill No. 3869, "An act for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department," the Clerk of the House be directed to omit the following words where they occur on page 77 of said bill as printed: "To R. S. James, administrator of John S. James, deceased, of Henry County, $270," said provision being a duplication of an appropriation in the same words on page 76 of said bill, and both referring to one claim.

The resolution was concurred in.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. McDILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator have the bill upon which he wishes to speak read?

Mr. McDILL. I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will now have its second reading at length.

The Acting Secretary read the bill (S. No. 1724) to establish a board of railroad commissioners to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes, the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That a board of railroad commissioners is hereby established, to consist of three commissioners, to be appointed by the President, one of whom shall be a civil engineer with practical railroad experience, one acquainted with agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interests, and the other either a specialist in railroad questions or of approved legal attainments. Said commissioners shall receive a salary of $6,000 per year, and hold office for six years from the date of their appointment.

SEC. 2. That said board shall exercise a supervision over that portion of the business of all railroads, canals, or other transportation companies which passes from one State or Territory into or through one or more States or Territories, or to or from any foreign country into or through any State or Territory. Such supervision shall be limited to questions of commerce between the States and Territories, and foreign countries and the States or Territories, and the methods of operation by canals, railroads, and other transportation companies as affecting commerce between the States and Territories, and foreign countries and the States or Territories.

SEC. 3. That said board shall investigate all cases with reference to interstate commerce laid before it by railroad commissioners of the several States, and all complaints which may be forwarded to it of discrimination in the charges made for its services or method of rendering its services as a common carrier between the States and Territories, or foreign countries and the States or Territories, by any canal, railroad, or transportation company; and if such charges are approved by any incorporated board of trade or chamber of commerce, or any State or city government, the investigation, if so desired by the complainants and deemed necessary by the commissioners, shall be made on the spot where the cause of complaint originated. In such investigations the commissioners shall have power to summon witnesses and to direct the production of books, papers, and contracts relating to the subject-matter of complaint.

SEC. 4. That it is hereby made the duty of said board to carefully gather all necessary facts and statistics bearing upon the question of interstate commerce. It shall have power to require annual reports from all persons and companies engaged as carriers in interstate commerce, and to require specific answers to all questions deemed by the commissioners important in prosecuting their inquiries; and any person, corporation, or company engaged as a public carrier of interstate commerce, as herein defined, which shall refuse or neglect to make report or answer questions propounded by the commissioners shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall pay a fine of not exceeding $1,000 for each offense herein described.

SEC. 5. That on or before the 1st day of October in each year the commissioners shall submit in writing to the President of the United States a report of their doings, and shall embody in such report all such facts, statistics, and data as may be by them deemed important as bearing upon the question of the proper regulation of interstate commerce.

SEC. 6. That whenever investigation is made by the commissioners of a complaint, a special report of such investigation and the findings of the board shall be made to the persons complaining or making the charge; and whenever it shall appear that any railroad corporation or organization, or person, engaged as a public carrier of commerce between the States has violated or failed to perform a duty, or that any change is necessary or expedient in the manner in which interstate commerce is conducted in order to advance the public interests, the commissioners shall give public notice thereof to all parties concerned, and shall make report thereof in their next annual report, with such recommendations in relation thereto as they may think proper.

SEC. 7. That every unjust discrimination, either against persons or places, on the part of any railroad, canal, or transportation company engaged in interstate commerce, with reference to the subjects thereof; all extortion and all concession of rates, drawbacks, special rates, and secret arrangements; and all devices of every kind and character whatsoever whereby one shipper is given undue and unjust advantage over another, or whereby one locality is given undue or unjust advantage over another, are hereby declared to be against public policy; and it is specially made the duty of the commissioners to investigate all such cases of which they have or can obtain knowledge and make full report thereof in their annual report.

SEC. 8. That any failure or refusal to give information to the commissioners in relation to matters within their powers and jurisdiction, when requested by them, shall be deemed a misdemeanor; and any person, corporation, or company so failing or refusing upon the request of the commissioners shall, on conviction thereof, be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000 for each offense.

Mr. McDILL. Mr. President, the numerous petitions presented to the Senate from citizens of the United States living in every part of it, asking legislation in regulation of railroads, as well as the constant discussion going on, not only in the public press, but in every place where men assemble with reference thereto, show that the public mind is quite occupied with the existence of a real or imaginary grievance with reference to the transportation question.

Doubtless some will say it is the discussion of demagogues over an imaginary wrong, but the universality of the outcry and the clear statement of cases of wrong and hardship preclude me from such a belief.

There is trouble; and it is our duty to give the subject a careful consideration, and without prejudging the case hear all that is said pro and con, and if we find a wrong, and have power so to do, provide a remedy. Many bills have been presented and referred to the Committee on Commerce having for their object the regulation of railroads, and those who perhaps hesitate before adopting radical measures such as are proposed by some of the bills above mentioned have proposed joint resolutions of inquiry as to the truth of the complaints made, the extent of the powers of Congress in furnishing relief, and the proper choice of remedies; if the power shall have been ascertained. It seems to me no man who wishes to truly represent his constituency can neglect to give the whole question careful consideration.

Railroads have become essential factors in the development of the country. They are and have been public benefactors. Yet they undoubtedly have used powers which are as yet unmeasured; at times in such manner as to inflict serious injuries upon citizens and the body politic. They are exerting an influence not only upon our material interests, but they also are changing and remolding our social and moral institutions. The army of presidents, managers, and their employés is becoming a mighty force, used often as one man for the accomplishment of purposes, an army managed generally by the finest minds and the most forceful executive ability of the age. Whether these mighty forces can rightfully be controlled or not the thoughtful man must be deeply interested in their study.

Railways are the carriers of a very large portion of our products. Markets are attainable only through their help. The rates which their owners charge for carriage may make the whole land a land of busy and well-rewarded industry, or may cause the fields to go uncultivated, close the stores and stop the wheels of the factory. Undoubtedly much can be left to their own earnest desire to make money for uncultivated fields, closed stores and still factories would soon stop the moving of their car-wheels. Yet, while this is true it is equally true that they may, by skillful use of their powers, cause one portion of the country to prosper while another shall perish by enforced idleness, one trader to grow rich while another sees nothing but disaster in his way, and yields at last to the creditor taking all from him by the processes of the law. It is said that railroad companies do at times accomplish these very results.

The late railroad war was said by the warring companies themselves to be about differential rates, and the officials and managers in their presentations of their own differing views all admitted that their charges do have a very direct influence upon the prosperity of New York, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and other cities. As the prosperity of these cities and of every locality in our land depends upon free commerce, and as the railroad companies can by their rates and rules for business operation affect the commerce of the nation, I for one do not doubt the power and duty of Congress to legislate upon the subject, a power, as I think, clearly conferred; entailing a corresponding duty, for the power of Congress is exclusive. The power is lodged alone in our hands. The States are powerless with reference to interstate commerce.

What, then, are some of the evils which should be regulated? Chiefest of these evils is a discrimination against certain localities and in favor of others; building up one community and pulling down another. The fetters are woven around the condemned places so deftly that the bands and chains are locked and riveted before public attention has been attracted.

The following figures, taken from tables found in the fourth annual report of the Board of Railroad Commissioners for the State of Iowa, will show the method and its insidiousness by which such discrimination is accomplished.

Clinton is a city of the State of Iowa, situated on the west bank of the Mississippi River, three hundred and fifty miles from Council Bluffs, which is situated on the eastern bank of the Missouri River. The rate for wheat from Council Bluffs to Clinton, a distance of 350 miles, is 1.42 cents per ton per mile, while the same road will haul the same wheat from Council Bluffs to Chicago, a distance of 489 miles, for 1.23 cents per ton per mile. For a car load of cattle from Council Bluffs to Clinton $40 is charged; from Council Bluffs to Chicago $70. Lumber between Council Bluffs and Clinton pays 1.14 cents per ton per mile; between Council Bluffs and Chicago .89 of a cent per ton per mile. From interior points still stranger differences are found. Boone, an interior town on the line of the same road, is 202 miles from Clinton, 340 miles from Chicago. The wheat rate to Clinton is 2.28 cents per ton per mile; to Chicago 1.52 cents per ton per mile, a difference in favor of the long haul of .76 of a cent per ton per mile. Cattle per car load from Boone to Clinton pay $33; to Chicago $61. Belle Plaine, an interior town on the same road but only 116 miles from Clinton and 254 miles from Chicago, pays 2.93 cents per ton per mile for wheat to Clinton, 1.81 cents per ton per mile to Chicago, a difference in favor of the long haul of 1.12 cents per ton per mile. Louden, 40 miles from Clinton, 178 miles from Chicago, pays for wheat 4.50 cents per ton per mile to Clinton and 2.08 cents per ton per mile to Chicago, a difference in favor of the long haul of 2.12 cents per ton per mile.

Grain, and particularly wheat, is an article of produce which might be tempted into barges or steamers at the mighty Mississippi, and southward going, might, by way of New Orleans and the Gulf, reach a foreign market, and it is greatly drawn eastward as far off as the western border of Iowa by the tempting difference and reduction of .19 of a cent per ton per mile for a ride of 139 miles longer, but each mile of that moving a mile away from the great father of waters and their tempting southern journey. Boone is not so far away as Council Bluffs from the great natural water route to the Gulf and thence out upon the sea, only being 202 miles from the river. So its wheat is gently drawn to Chicago by a difference of .76 of a cent per ton per mile in favor of the longer ride to Chicago, (138 miles farther.) Belle Plaine has only 116 miles to go and then she finds the water waiting to transport her wheat southward. So she is told if her wheat will take the longer ride to Chicago (138 miles) there shall be a difference in favor of the longer ride of 1.12 cents per ton per mile, while little Louden, nestling down almost on the banks of the Mississippi, only 40 miles from Clinton, if she would have the luxury of a water ride, must pay 4.50 cents per ton per mile to get over the 40 miles to the river, while if she will go the 138 miles farther to Chicago she can go all the way for 2.42 cents per ton per mile less than it would cost to reach the river 40 miles away. Such persuasion as this is very winning; indeed, almost irresistible.

I do not bring forward these illustrations for the purpose, at this stage of my remarks, of finding fault with the railroad company for so fixing its rates. I only do it to show that it is in the power of railroad companies to so prepare and arrange their rates as to very materially affect the commerce of the country; that they may and do turn the stream of trade hither and thither at their own will, and that the exercise of such power may well be observed with alarm when it is seen that it may be used to the injury of the people and of places.

Now, it so happens that as yet people have no great temptation in Iowa to ship cattle southward, and hence we find, as the table I here submit will show, that the railroad company in question has not been by any means so persuasive in treatment of the rates on cattle:

Council Bluffs to Chicago, distance 489 miles, rate for cattle per car-load	$70 00
Council Bluffs to Clinton, distance 350 miles, rate for cattle per car-load	40 00
Difference in distance, 139 miles; difference in rate in favor of short haul	30 00
Louden to Chicago, 178 miles, rate per car-load on cattle	38 50
Louden to Clinton, 40 miles, rate per car-load on cattle	16 00
Difference in distance, 138 miles; difference in favor of short haul	22 50

Thus cattle take what is as yet their natural way to market, while grain is stimulated toward Chicago and the Atlantic coast.

Lumber moves westward on this railway, and hence it is desirable for the profit of the stockholder that it shall take the long ride from Chicago to Council Bluffs. Hence it is offered an excursion rate of .89 of a cent per ton per mile from Chicago to Council Bluffs. But if the Clinton lumber dealer gets his lumber from the rafts which float down the Mississippi River it must pay 1.14 cents per ton per mile to reach Council Bluffs. Here long haul is conqueror. Thus lumber is charged 1.14 cents for 350 miles; .89 of a cent for 489 miles; difference, .25 of a cent for 139 miles.

The same state of facts is observed in the rates charged on the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway, leading from Council Bluffs on the western border of Iowa to Chicago, and crossing the Mississippi River on the eastern border of Iowa at Davenport. The distance from Council Bluffs to Chicago is 500 miles; to Davenport 317 miles, Davenport being 183 miles nearer and on the western bank of the Mississippi River. Wheat is hauled through Davenport to Chicago for 1.20 cents per ton per mile, while if it stops at Davenport and the Mississippi River, 183 miles nearer than Chicago, it must pay 1.57 cents per ton per mile, a greater charge of .37 of a cent per ton per mile for the shorter distance. Lumber may be shipped 500 miles from Chicago to Council Bluffs for .80 of a cent per ton per mile, but if shipped from Davenport to Council Bluffs, a less distance by 183 miles, it must pay .27 of a cent per ton per mile more for the shipment. The difference in the cattle rate—$29—is not so striking.

Undoubtedly the same reason exists for the varying rates on this road as on the Chicago and Northwestern, cited heretofore.

The same striking difference will be found on the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad, and all other railroads in Iowa leading to Chicago.

Remarking on this subject the Iowa railroad commissioners, speaking of the changes in rates on the Burlington, Cedar Rapids and Northern Railway, say:

> From Wapello, the Chicago rate is reduced 33 per cent., and Burlington rate is increased 2 cents a hundred. To one versed in the philosophy of the distribution of railroad rates at competing and non-competing points, and particularly to such points as will best secure a long haul, this want of proportionate reduction to Burlington from all stations south of Cedar Falls is no enigma. It is not improbable also that this proportionate distribution of rates on wheat being 8 cents per ton per mile from Wapello to Burlington, 30 miles, and only 1.52 cents per ton per mile to Chicago, (262 miles) is a part of the consideration of the traffic arrangement between this company and the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific and the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy, which transport its through business. All three of these roads, therefore, are either directly or indirectly interested in so adjusting rates on grain and live-stock as will draw them to Chicago rather than the Mississippi River markets.

Now, many good reasons may be given for the strange differences in rates which I have been citing. What I wish to bring out and to emphasize is the almost absolute power of railroad companies by rate charges over the commerce of the country. "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh and whither it goeth." So with this control of railroad companies over commerce. It is hidden and mysterious, yet very powerful. A town, a series of towns, a portion of a State, a whole State feels its force, but scarcely knows how the force is being operated. The very mystery is alarming, and Congress, in my judgment, is derelict in duty if it does not take in hand and regulate the exercise of this power, demanding and requiring that all vicious exercise of it shall cease and all other motions of this force be directed for the individual and general good.

In the cases that I have cited there has been undoubtedly discrimination against places. Those who dwell by the waters of the mighty Mississippi have not been permitted the full enjoyment of those privileges and advantages which, before the days of railroads, were supposed to come to those who chose for their business pursuits a location upon navigable waters. It is perhaps too soon in the discussion of the question to positively maintain that they have been unjustly dealt with, for I think it can be shown that discrimination is not necessarily at all times unjust.

The Iowa commissioners, in speaking of the difference between the through rates and the local rates on the Burlington, Cedar Rapids and Northern road, show that the reduction on through rates from Cedar Rapids to Chicago is 35 per cent., but that the rate to Burlington is increased by one cent per one hundred pounds over the rate of 1871. They also show that the through rate from Solon is reduced 35 per cent. while the local rate is unchanged; that the through charge from West Liberty is reduced 35 per cent. and the local rate is increased two cents per one hundred pounds; that from Wapello the Chicago rate is reduced 33 per cent., and the Burlington rate is increased two cents per one hundred pounds.

In commenting upon this strange state of charges they say what I have already quoted, but it will bear repetition:

> To one versed in the philosophy of the distribution of railroad rates at competing and non-competing points, and particularly to such points as will best secure a long haul, this want of proportionate reduction to Burlington from all stations south of Cedar Falls is no enigma. It is not improbable also that this proportionate distribution of rates on wheat being 8 cents per ton per mile from Wapello to Burlington (30 miles) and only 1.52 cents per ton per mile to Chicago (262 miles) is a part of the consideration in the traffic arrangements between this company and the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy, and the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific, which transport its through business. All three of these roads, therefore, are either directly or indirectly interested in so adjusting rates on grain and live-stock as will draw them to Chicago rather than the Mississippi markets.

I think enough has been shown to establish beyond doubt that transportation companies do, by fixed rates, interfere with the regular stream of interstate commerce, seeking to turn it aside from what might be called its natural route and to secure it for what is known among railroad men as the long haul.

While railroad companies should not be crippled in their attempt to secure business so long as they do not unjustly or unnecessarily interfere with the course of commerce, yet such arbitrary interferences as I have shown lead me at least to the conclusion that if Congress has the power it certainly becomes its duty to undertake to regulate transportation companies, including railroad companies, when they are unwarrantably interfering with the course of commerce. I do not know that it is any longer an open question whether Congress has the power. Certainly it seems to me that that question has been settled; and yet it may be proper to refer to the Constitution itself, which, in article 1, section 8, says:

Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

In construing this article, the Supreme Court has said in one case, (Gibbons vs. Ogden:)

Commerce means transportation.

In another case, (The Passenger cases, 7 Howard, 416:)

Commerce consists in transporting merchandise from the seller to the buyer to gain the freight.

In another case:

Beyond all question the transportation of freights of the subjects of commerce for the purposes of exchange or sale is a constituent of commerce itself.

Again:

That to regulate commerce means to prescribe the rules which shall govern it, and with the power Congress does not stop at the State lines, but it may be exercised within the territorial jurisdiction of the States. (Gibbon vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 194, 195, and 196.)

That this power extends to the acts done on the land as well as on the water. (U. S. vs. Coombs, 12 Peters, 78.)

That this power is as extensive on land as upon water, and embraces all vehicles and persons engaged in carrying it on. (12 Howard, 244.)

I think it may be safely asserted that the power is exclusive and plenary; that the duty arising from the power must be to supervise and, if necessary, to regulate. The mode of regulation requires careful attention. It seems to me it is not difficult to demonstrate the impossibility of laying down any unvarying rule for rates and charges, for the reason that a rate which would be reasonable to one road would be unreasonable as applied to another, the whole question being one of grades, curves, the amount of business done, the amount of competition by water-routes or otherwise; all of which must be considered to justly determine a rate. So that I am quite sure that no body of men can be found wise enough to lay down an unbending and uniform rule which shall govern the different roads of the country engaged in interstate commerce when they are surrounded by so many and so widely varying circumstances.

As bearing directly upon the difficulties which one meets who seeks to arrange a schedule of fixed rates for railroads, I call attention to a table carefully prepared by the railroad commissioners of the State of Iowa, in the year 1878. This table, giving the names of the roads, the weights of their engines in tons, the net freight carried, and the net freight per ton weight of locomotives, shows as follows:

Names of roads.	Weight of engine in tons.	Net freight carried.	Net freight per ton weight of locomotive.
Burlington, Cedar Rapids and Northern	36	180	5.00
Burlington and Southwestern	30	170	5.66
Chicago, Burlington and Quincy	38	180	4.74
Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul	30	140	4.66
Chicago and Northwestern (no report)
Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific	36	219	6.08
Chicago, Clinton, Dubuque and Minnesota	33	570	17.27
Des Moines and Fort Dodge	26	160	6.15
Illinois Central	30	117	3.90
Kansas City, Saint Joseph and Council Bluffs	32	400	12.50
Keokuk and Des Moines	32	220	6.90
Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska	23	240	7.27
Newton and Monroe	22	90	4.20
Saint Louis, Ottumwa and Cedar Rapids	34	160	4.70
Sioux City and Pacific	28	360	12.86
Sioux City and Pembina and Dakota Southern	26	200	7.70
Sabula, Ackley and Dakota	28	158	5.64
Dubuque Southwestern	26	200	7.70
Crooked Creek	16	75	4.70
Des Moines and Minneapolis	16	100	6.25
Iowa Eastern	16	50	3.13

As peculiarly instructive I call attention to the fact that the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad, whose weight of engine at that time in tons was 38, carried 180 tons of net freight, and a net freight per ton weight of locomotive of 4.74 tons; the Chicago, Clinton, Dubuque and Minnesota Railroad, whose weight of engine in tons at that time was 33, carried 570 tons of net freight and net freight per ton weight of locomotive 17.27 tons.

Now, it might be inferred that inasmuch as the latter-named road could carry nearly four times as many tons weight to the ton of locomotive as the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy road could carry, it ought to carry freight for a proportionately less charge, and the superficial thinker would be strengthened in this view when he came to observe the beautiful grades of the Chicago, Clinton, Dubuque and Minnesota as compared with the heavy and laborious grades and frequent curves of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy. Yet it is a matter of fact, fully set forth by the reports of the two companies herein named, that the Chicago, Clinton, Dubuque and Minnesota barely paid expenses, while the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy had so large a business on the Iowa division that it earned 6.3 per cent. upon its capital and debt in that year.

In fact, the most important question in deciding what would be a reasonable rate for carrying, is the question of the amount of business which the road can secure. A road with heavy grades, frequent curves, and most expensive equipment often makes money, while a road with beautiful grades, no curves, and a similar equipment is unable to pay interest upon its debt and leaves its stockholders every year without dividends.

In a late report made in England by Mr. Farrar, secretary of the board of trade, speaking upon this subject, he said:

It was quite impossible to give a general opinion as to whether the charges made by railroad companies were excessive or not. Each case must depend on its own merits. He would be very loth to say that the charges generally were excessive.

With regard to terminals, some confusion had arisen from the use of that term, and he thought it would be well if distinct terms could be applied to both classes of service in respect of which the charge was made, and he suggested that they should be called station terminals and handling terminals. He could give no opinion as to the right of the companies to charge for terminals, but as a matter of equity there could be no doubt that they are entitled to payment both for station terminals and for handling terminals over and above their mileage rates.

Continuing, he says:

Great complaint has been made by the witnesses as to the inequalities of charges from one place to another, but, so far as he could judge, those inequalities were not productive of injury to the trade of the country.

Taking the case of the carrying of foreign corn and meat from Liverpool to London at lower rates than English corn and meat, he was not at all assured if the rates were made equal, the Liverpool trader would be a gainer. The railway companies might raise their rates on the whole instead of lowering them.

Being asked his opinion as to the combination of companies, or what were called conferences, to keep up charges, the witness said:

They were universal in all large dealings and were inevitable.

He, however, added:

Most of the inequalities complained of were to the advantage rather than to the disadvantage of the public. He did not think, therefore, that there was any ground for legislative interference either for the purpose of enforcing equal mileage or any other form of equality of charge. He thought there should be a fixed scale for terminals, or, at any rate, for station terminals, and there should be further facilities for publicity and for information concerning the reasons of the various charges.

In view of the rapid reduction of rates which has been going on continuously since 1868, showing the average rate per ton per mile on the three great roads hereinafter named, the New York Central, the Erie and the Pennsylvania Railroad, to have been in 1868, 2.153 cents per ton per mile, and on the same roads in 1880, .867 of a cent per ton per mile, it may well be doubted whether natural forces are not compelling roads to reduce their rates fully fast enough.

Mr. Edward Atkinson in an article published not long since has declared that the grain and meat for a laborer's subsistence for one year may be transported, at the rates now charged by the railroad companies, from the field of its growth to the home of the laborer upon the eastern coast at a cost of $1.25.

In Nimmo's report on internal commerce, submitted July 1, 1881, I find on page 6 that the total tonnage movement on the following lines, namely, New York Central, Hudson River, Erie, and Pennsylvania Railroads, was in 1868, 11,193,120 tons; that the tonnage on the same roads in the year 1880 was 36,363,714. The 11,000,000 tons cost in the year 1868, 2.153 cents per ton per mile; the 36,000,000 in 1880 cost .867 of a cent per ton per mile. The cost of moving the tonnage in 1868, being only 11,000,000 tons, was $240,652.08 per mile, while the cost of moving the greatly increased tonnage of 1880 was only $316,344.18. The price of 1868 would have cost the commerce of 1880 per mile $781,819.85. In 1880 it did cost $316,344.18, and we thus have the remarkable result of a saving to the country upon the railroad commerce for 1880 and to the products, and eventually to prices, of $465,475.67 per mile.

It seems to me it would be unwise for Congress to go further than to provide:

First, that there shall be no unjust discrimination in rates and charges either against persons or places;

Second, that all extortion shall be prohibited;

Third, that no secret arrangement shall be made either through concessions, special rates, or drawbacks of any kind whatever;

Fourth, that the more effectually to carry out and enforce the above rules a commission should be appointed consisting of three persons, one of whom should be a civil engineer with practical railroad experience; one a shipper largely acquainted with shipping interests, agricultural, manufacturing, and mercantile, and the other either a specialist who has studied the railroad problem or a gentleman of approved legal ability.

It should be the duty of such commission to carefully study the transportation problem, to gather statistics bearing upon such problem, to require annual reports from all railroads and transportation companies engaged in interstate commerce, to require specific answers from such companies to be made to all questions deemed by the commissioners of importance to the inquiry, and to specially consider all cases of hardship with regard to interstate commerce laid before it by State commissioners, and to report the facts to Congress. It should be required to advise the delinquent railroad or transportation companies as to what should be done to remedy the evil complained of, and if they refuse to comply with the just request of the commission their refusal should be reported to Congress for action.

It may be urged by some that the duties devolving upon the various railroad commissioners appointed or chosen in the States obviate the necessity of a national commission; but an examination of the reports of the State railroad commissioners will show that they are daily met with this difficulty, namely: that they are powerless to deal with a case of interstate commerce; and States situated as are the Western States find that their commissioners are unable to deal with a very large proportion of the commerce of the railroads.

In the State of Iowa, after careful examination, the commissioners are satisfied that 85 per cent. of the transportation of the railroad companies of that State is interstate in character. With reference to the whole of this 85 per cent. they are powerless to act. Hence the absolute necessity for a national board of railroad commissioners, and hence in my opinion the wisdom of requiring such a board to act upon all cases reported from the State commissioners.

The policy of appointing a board of railroad commissioners seems to have been very generally adopted by the States. In 1878 eleven of the States had chosen railroad commissioners, namely: Connecticut, California, Illinois, Iowa, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, New Hampshire, Ohio, Rhode Island, Virginia, Vermont, and Wisconsin, and since that time several other States have adopted the system. Charles Francis Adams, jr., when called upon by the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts to express his opinion with regard to the commission system, replied in the following terms:

These duties [meaning the duties of the railroad commission] are of three general descriptions. First, those of a supervisory character as respects the railroads themselves; secondly, those which are both supervisory and judicial as between the railroads and the public; and, third, judicial duties as between the different railroad corporations. Among the duties of the commissioners, by far the most difficult and delicate are those which arise out of its supervisory functions over matters between the railroad corporations and the community. Its jurisdiction in this respect is, I believe, peculiar to itself. It is compelled to receive all complaints against the railroads of the State, no matter how they may reach it, or to what they may relate, or whether coming from communities or individuals, and investigate and find out some remedy for them. In doing this the commissioners have no power except to recommend and report. Their only appeal is to publicity. The board is at once prosecuting officer, judge, and jury; but with no sheriff to enforce its processes. The method of railroad supervision is peculiar to Massachusetts, but I do not hesitate to say that I believe it is the best and most effective method which has ever been devised, the best for the community and the best for the corporations. It needs, I am confident, but to be developed and understood to be universally adopted.

In dealing with railroads, as between railroads and individuals, it is futile to talk about laws declaratory and penal and the usual processes of the courts, which, except in extraordinary cases of remedy through these processes, are too slow and too expensive, while the power and the wealth of the corporations as compared with individuals are too great. It is altogether different in proceedings before this commission. They have no technicalities or forms of procedure. The investigation takes place at once and upon the spot, and the conclusion is reached with no unnecessary delay. The conclusion cannot be enforced in law and carries weight only in proportion to the reasons adduced in its support. But in practical experience the recommendations of the board have almost never been disregarded. It is true they have sometimes been complied with under protest and with the utmost reluctance, but they have almost invariably been complied with. First and last they have covered all sorts of questions, from the putting on of a system of trains to the adoption of some important appliance of safety, matters which could hardly have been reached in any other way. Statements of this will be found accompanying our reports during the ten years they have been issued, but only the more difficult are there given. The many other and similar cases settled by private efforts are nowhere recorded.

I am very confident that this practice of public supervision might be developed so as to work a complete solution of the railroad problem as it presents itself in this country. To do this, however, it must be developed by men who are not only competent, but who enjoy the confidence both of the community and of the corporations. If they have not this they are powerless. If they have it there is nothing they cannot bring about; no abuse they cannot correct.

Again, speaking of the commission, he says:

I regard it as still an experiment. It has not yet, I very heartily agree, reached a point at which it can be spoken of as an assured success. As an experiment, however, it is the only single thing of the kind which holds out any promise of a rational solution of the railroad problem. On this point, which I now feel at perfect liberty to discuss, permit me to say there is hardly room for two opinions. The idea as respects railroads which this board originated of supervisory regulation through publicity and intelligent discussion has just begun to be developed. I feel quite confident that I could produce whatever amount of evidence the committee might desire, that so far as it has gone it is regarded in its sphere the most hopeful indication of the time. That the more prominent railroad specialists so regard it they will themselves say if the committee desire to hear them.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Great Britain, whose railway system is second to none, employs the instrumentality of a board of commissioners in the management and regulation of her railroads. During the past forty years the British Parliament has given much consideration to the question of regulating railways, upward of 3,300 acts having been passed with this view. The net product of all this legislation and the general discussions of the press throughout the realm, together with the large experience of so many years, is the present commission system. These three commissioners possess powers in relation to the working arrangements between railroad companies; they are to hear and determine matters of complaint that may be referred to them of violation of the railway laws, in this respect possessing the jurisdiction of certain courts and judges authorized to pass upon complaints; power to hear and determine certain classes of differences between transportation companies; they are, under prescribed law, to fix and apportion through charges on freight passing over two or more lines of road; power to settle questions of terminal charges; to settle the rates for loading, unloading, delivery, and other kindred services; power to call experts to their aid when in need of technical information, and to enforce the law regarding the publication of rates of transportation.—Report of Iowa Railroad Commissioners, 1878.

A very interesting account of the British railroad commission is to be found in Nimmo's Report on International Commerce of the United States, submitted July 1, 1881. It seems that a committee of Parliament in 1872, in view of the failure of competition to do for railways what it does for ordinary trade, recommended the establishment of a technical tribunal endowed with powers as set forth in the above quotation from the Iowa railroad commissioners' report. The term of that tribunal was limited to five years. Parliament subsequently continued it for one year and again by act continued it until December 31, 1882. It is given both judicial and administrative powers, and the law requires that one of the three members shall be experienced in the law, the other experienced in railroad business, and it is stated that the third member has been appointed with special reference to his personal knowledge in regard to the question of public policy and his reputation as a statesman. Those who are curious to see the work which this commission is to do will find the matter fully set forth in Nimmo's report.

One of the chiefest evils complained of by shippers is discrimination and favoritism against persons and places. One need not pause to prove that unjust discrimination is wrong and hurtful. This discrimination as against places is a fearful and unjust thing to towns, cities, and States suffering from it. It is not to be supposed that railway managers will practice this discrimination without what seems to them a just reason for it. But they are not the proper umpires on such a question. As long as men, by a law of their nature, which properly restrained is a wise law, are governed by selfish views it will never be safe to leave the interests of others to the uncontrolled will of those adversely interested. It would not be difficult to show that the whole Northwest has been bound captive to the interests of Chicago, and that any natural inclination of products to go southwest or southeast to Saint Louis and down the Mississippi is most skillfully, insidiously, and effectually restrained.

I have already shown in a former portion of my remarks the ease with which commerce may be restrained. But I have during the preparation of these remarks clipped from the newspapers of the State of Iowa a decision of the supreme court of that State which shows that in the view of that court, at least, very important interests may be affected by what otherwise would be considered trivial interferences.

An action was brought by one Myers for the recovery of $105 from the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Company for the killing of a cow inside the corporation limits of Council Bluffs. The plaintiff claimed the train was at the time running faster than allowed by ordinance. The railroad company admitted the rapidity of the train, but cited the fact that the corporation of Council Bluffs is extended three miles beyond the city proper, and for that distance out from the thickly settled portion of the place the railroad passes through agricultural lands fenced on both sides. The company claimed that the ordinance was unreasonable, oppressive, vexatious, and therefore void. The supreme court in its review of the case declares that—

Under the ordinance in question in this case it would take three-quarters of an hour after entering the corporate limits of Council Bluffs to pass over three miles of railroad through agricultural lands fenced on both sides and to reach the inhabited portion of the city, and it would take over an hour and a quarter to reach the Union Pacific depot. The ordinance placed not only unreasonable restrictions upon the railways themselves, but unnecessarily impeded the whole traveling public. If all the cities situated along the line of the defendant's road between Council Bluffs and Chicago should enact and enforce a like ordinance, it is apparent that the time between the two cities would be greatly increased. "The ordinance operates as a restraint upon commerce and ought not to be sustained."

Thus, in the view of the railroad companies themselves, of the courts, and of any one who has given the matter any attention whatever, there are continual interferences with commerce, and such interferences and restraints ought in some manner to be reached and dealt with. I think I have shown enough to satisfy all that no obstruction of natural commerce ways can be said to be small or trivial in character, for a very slight obstacle will often turn the stream aside from its natural course and work injustice to both persons and places. Unjust discriminations as against persons are much more common than as to places. Here personal intercourse and the naturally pleasant manners of one as compared with another shipper, at times a pecuniary interest on the part of the manager with the shipper, will lead to the ruin of one man in trade and to the wealth and prospelity of another.

Another of the evils complained of is very violently fluctuating rates. A railroad war, which was once regarded by the pet ple as a blessing to those who have carefully studied the subjec is now considered as a great public evil. While rates are down men are tempted to undue purchases. Those who bought before the war broke out between the contending companies find themselves with goods upon their shelves which they are unable to sell in competition with others for the time more fortunate competitors who purchased while the war was raging. The companies themselves are injured in their profits; stockholders cannot receive dividends, and general ruin comes. It would be the duty of a railroad commission appointed in the manner which I have advocated to study the question of railroad wars, and, if possible, to devise some means of hindering such injurious competition.

Another great evil is found in the consolidation of weaker competing with stronger competing roads. All consolidations are not necessarily injurious. I think the consolidation of continuous lines will be found to the advantage of the people, because it enables the shipper at a great distance to send his commodities loaded in one car to the market of purchase. But when a railroad company owning a continuous line seeks to destroy a company competing with it by buying up its stock or buying up its line, it destroys the only check that may exist against exorbitant charges on its part. The great question of the benefits of "pooling" naturally suggests itself here, and it requires much study and the gathering of many statistics to justly determine the question. There are those who object to any legislation upon the subject whatever. They tell us that we should leave trade and commerce to adjust their difficulties by natural laws without governmental interference. This seems to be a pleasant theory, and will commend itself to the superficial thinker. But, like all theories, it will not bear the test of experience.

The English people found that it would not do. A joint select committee of the House of Lords and the House of Commons appointed in 1872 reported:

> But it may be taken as a general rule that there is now no active competition between different railways in the matter of rates and fares. Wherever different railway companies run between the same places they arrange their prices, and if a new railway should ever be started with the promise of lower rates, it is sure after a short time to arrange with its original rivals a system of equal charges.

And they close their report by expressing the opinion that the only real competition is between railways and water-ways, and recommend that the harbors of the realm should be kept out of the hands of the railway companies, and that every effort should be made to keep up and develop the system of inland water navigation.

France has tried independent corporate management of railroads and found it unsuccessful. In 1842 the government became a partner in the railroads, building the earth-work, the masonry, the stations, and paying one-third the cost of the lands. The companies bore the expense of the iron, rolling stock, maintenance, it being intended that two-fifths of the total cost should be borne by the companies and three-fifths by the state.

This system lasted from 1842 to 1859. In that year the emperor, feeling that the system was not a success, discarded all idea of competition and consolidated all the railroads into six great companies and assigned a territory to each, thus rendering competition impossible, until in 1865 a concession was made which gave rise to slow competition in certain localities. The only competition ever known in France with railroads has been afforded by canals and rivers.

In Prussia the government has aided in building all the railways, and in 1870 owned nine lines, while twenty-four lines were owned and operated by private companies; the length of the two systems being about the same. Prussia sought to destroy competition by a section of her railroad act providing:

> No second railroad running in the same direction as the first one, and touching the same principal points, shall be allowed to be constructed by undertakers other than the undertakers of the first railway within a space of thirty years from the opening of such railway: Provided, That means of communication between these points and in the same direction by other means shall not be interfered with hereby.

Afterward this act was repealed, and the different railroad companies constructed competing lines, but almost as soon as constructed agreements were made as to rates which substantially destroyed competition.

In Belgium the state owned part of the railroads; the other parts were owned by private citizens. The small companies combined and began to compete with the government; and then the private roads by combination became in a measure equal to the rich and powerful state company. In the words of Mr. W. R. Malcolm, in a paper submitted to the parliamentary committee:

> When the government was pressed by the competition of its rivals, its first resort was to seek for traffic as they did. It began to work upon commercial appreciation. It made special contracts and special tariffs in order to get business on its lines, and it ran a severe competition between the most profitable sources of traffic, the result of which was, in some cases at least, an agreement with its adversary—a joint purse arrangement, or what we call a "a pool."

It seems that if we had no history of our own the history of the subject in England, in France, in Prussia, and in Belgium would teach us that we cannot safely leave trade and commerce to adjust their difficulties without governmental interference. The policy of non-interference may be said to have been tried in this country, so far as the United States are concerned, since the organization of railroad companies, and the effect may be seen by a study of the current history of the times. Ruinously low rates have been prevailing in some places, destroying the weaker lines, and in the end removing competition. Before this was consummated, however, the lower rates had invited reckless purchases or by holding false hopes out to traders had ruined in the end the unwary. The railroad companies finally compromise their difference, agree to charge the highest price the quantity moving and the price of freight on the Lakes will permit. (See Routes to Seaboard, page 117.)

One manager says the only question is what charge will the property bear, keeping always in view the future development of the business and the elements of public prosperity involved in such development. As we have seen, France finds that canals and rivers afford the only competition known in that country. Great Britain finds that the only real and effective competition is between railways and water transport, and so it recommends that the harbors be kept out of the hands of the railway companies, and that every effort be made to keep up and develop the system of inland water navigation, saying that if a new railway should ever be started with the promise of lower rates it is sure, after a short time, to arrange with its original rivals a system of equal charges. Surely, if experience is a good teacher, our objectors have not given any reason for a neglect to do something in the way of an attempt to regulate interstate commerce. The reason why competition fails may easily be seen. A railway may not be a monopoly at its termini where it finds other roads competing with it, or at intermediate points where other and rival roads cross it, but at all other intermediate points it is a substantial monopoly, not only by the force of circumstances holding such trade, but by skillfully arranged schedules of charges, as in the case of the Iowa roads with regard to the Mississippi River, thus clearly showing that, if the people and if statesmen do not, the railroad managers do understand that their only real danger is water competition.

Relief by water competition should be generously granted, but when all is done there is need of supervision for the benefit of those who do not dwell on the very banks of some natural or artificial water-way.

Another objection made is that the vested rights of stockholders and bondholders must not be interfered with. I get impatient when I hear that cry. No immense wickedness was ever attempted that did not raise that cry. It will probably be heard at the gates of the New Jerusalem on resurrection morn by those who claim that by virtue of kinship to the original Adam who walked naked, sinless, and shameless in the garden, they have a vested right in the golden streets and pure rivers. I concede vested rights, but all that is proposed can be done without a single interference with any such real right. The trouble usually with those who use that argument is that they seem to suppose they have a monopoly in that kind of right. But, sir, every citizen of the United States has a vested right in a free and unimpeded commerce. It was written out and guaranteed to him and to his children after him when the fathers laid the solid foundation of this Government, and no investor in railroad property need in the least consider such proper legislation as the country demands an interference with his rights.

If the cry of the poor and distressed is not heard and heeded there will come a time when an angry people will appear at the gates of the palaces of these princes in a mood incapable of reason and in a determination which will not tarry to discuss vested rights, for when the torches burn and the banner of wrath and retribution is raised it is then too late to reason.

All considerations lead me to but one conclusion, and that is that, it is our duty to endeavor by proper, wise, and just regulations to bring the people who complain and the companies who transport the produce of the people into harmonious relations.

The problem is a great and unsolved one. I would not favor rash or radical legislation which might lead to the destruction of values or to the injury of any holder of any character of property. But there is such general complaint in all the States, the people are using their right of petition and are asking Congress to investigate the subject; and there can be so little danger to any interest whatever if the subject is committed to the hands of a commission of wise and able men, who shall gather information upon all the great questions involved in the solution of the problem, who shall furnish Congress with the statistics which will enable it to determine many points now disputed, that I am surprised that there should be any hesitation in the adoption of some one of the important measures now pending before the Committee on Commerce.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

MISSISSIPPI AND MISSOURI RIVERS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The Senate resumes the consideration of the regular order, which is the bill S. (No. 1572) for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers, upon which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me one moment?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I gave notice yesterday that to-day, after the morning hour, I would ask the consent of the Senate to take up the House bill on the subject of Chinese immigration, but the time having been allotted to the Senator from Iowa I did not make the motion. As the Senator from Mississippi is now about to address the Senate upon the Mississippi-levee bill, and as that is a measure of great importance and one which I do not desire to antagonize by an effort to press the consideration of the Chinese bill, I wish to say that as soon as the pending bill is disposed of, if it does not take any longer time than is expected, that is, to-day or to-day and to-morrow, I shall move to take up the Chinese bill for consideration and action. I am informed by the promoters of the pending bill, which is the regular order, that it is not expected to occupy any more than this day. If it shall be disposed of to-day, I shall move to-morrow to take up the Chinese bill.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Mississippi will indulge me a moment I desire to say that after he shall have completed his remarks to-day I shall seek to call up the joint resolution (H. R. No. 197) making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for public printing and binding, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882. I do not know that it will take up very much time, but it is important that it should be passed to-day or to-morrow.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, this measure is the most important one to my constituents that will probably engage the attention of Congress at this session. I feel, therefore, that it is my duty, in the absence of my colleague, [Mr. LAMAR,] to say what seems to me proper to influence the deliberation of this body in favor of the relief asked for in the bill and in the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.]

The country which is to be protected, and I may say saved by the building of the levees on the Mississippi River, is of a larger extent than is generally supposed. It extends north and south eight and a half degrees of latitude, and embraces within it the productions of almost every climate in the world. At the mouth of the Mississippi River we have the tropical productions of sugar, oranges, lemons, and bananas; as we proceed up we have the finest cotton-growing region in the world, and as we still farther advance north, it becomes a great producer of the cereals; and finally at its northern limit we find even that ice is cut and transported to market. It extends east and west upon an average of about sixty miles. If I said that there were 36,000 or 38,000 square miles in this territory, without some reflection you would hardly take into consideration the full meaning of the assertion. I will make some comparisons between that territory and States of the Union. It is larger than Maine. It is larger than Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, Connecticut, and Rhode Island all combined. It is larger than Delaware, Maryland, and West Virginia all combined. It is larger than the State of Kentucky; it is larger than the magnificent State represented in part by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HARRISON,] and it is nearly as large as the State of Ohio.

I have said that the soil of this district is the most fertile in the world. What is its condition? Has it been made to develop to this country the immense wealth which lies in its cultivation? Of its 24,000,000 acres of arable land not more than 2,000,000 are now cultivated. It is the estimate of General Abbott, who made a survey of that region, that if the levees were rebuilt over 10,000,000 acres of the best land in the world would be brought into cultivation which are not now cultivated and which cannot be cultivated successfully without the building of these levees. Of that large area, 2,500,000 acres are suitable to the production of sugar. If those 2,500,000 acres were cleared and cultivated, even in the slipshod way in which cultivation has proceeded in that section since the war, over 2,500,000,000 pounds of sugar would be produced in addition to the present production. Seven million five hundred thousand acres of that magnificent country would, according to General Abbott, be added to the cotton production of the country. That, even with the improvident cultivation which has attended that district for the last fifteen years, would produce 7,500,000 bales of cotton. At ten cents per pound that would be $750,000,000 per year.

Still, after taking out the cotton and the sugar production we should have over a million acres lying in Tennessee and Kentucky and Illinois and Missouri suitable for the production of the cereals. When I speak of the number of acres I mean more than are now cultivated. This area is to be added to the productive wealth of the country by the saving of this district from the overflows of the Mississippi River. Is this nothing? Are we to refuse to do what I shall show we can constitutionally do by spending a little money, or shall we decline to do it and devote this magnificent country to be an eternal jungle and forest?

It was asked by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] the other day, as I understood him, if this is such a magnificent country, if it is capable of such immense production, why are not we, the inhabitants of that district, able to make this improvement for ourselves? I answer the Senator that this is not actual but potential wealth. It is that wealth which may be developed by a judicious and liberal aid from the Government.

It is doubted by some Senators on this floor with whom I have conversed in private about this measure whether an appropriation if made would be actually available, whether it would be successful in redeeming this magnificent country from the ravages of the Mississippi floods. I desire to say something upon that point. An examination of the various reports of the Mississippi River commission and of the reports of the engineers appointed by the Government, of Humphreys's and Abbott's reports, will show that levees have been successful to a certain extent; that they have been unsuccessful to a certain other extent, and for reasons which I shall point out.

There is nothing in the Mississippi River, in its characteristics, in its size, in the nature of its bed, which prevents the same successful application of the levee system to it as has been applied to the Nile and to the Rhine. The Nile was successfully leveed by a semi-barbarous race, and it has been thus leveed for hundreds of years. It follows through an alluvial bottom or valley just like the Mississippi does. The Rhine, running through a similar soil, has been successfully leveed, and the levees there are subjected to a test which the levees of the Lower Mississippi are never subjected to; that is, the casting against them of enormous ice-floes, which would have a tendency to break them. Yet the levees on the Rhine have been so successfully built, repaired, and supervised that it has been many a year since there has been a break in them. So have the Adige, the Po, and the Vistula been successfully leveed.

But it is said by those who doubt the feasibility and the success of any system, "You have been at this work for many years, you have spent millions of dollars in making levees upon the Mississippi River, and the result is that to-day you are without a successful levee system and are supplicants at the door of the Federal Treasury for aid in building levees."

That is partially true; but there are causes which I desire to point out to the Senate why the levee system has failed up to this time. Before I go into that matter, as I shall do directly, let me give the Senate a little history connected with the levee system, and connected also with that valley from its first settlement, so that the Senate may more easily understand the causes why there has been so much failure

At the first settlement of the Mississippi Valley the banks of the Mississippi River, from well-known causes connected with sedimentary rivers, were higher than the surrounding country. Some of the engineers say that the declension from the river bed to the lowlands was at the rate of ten feet a mile. Others say that the declension was from ten to fifteen feet a mile. Those who do not understand the hydraulics of the Mississippi River cannot comprehend this fact; but it resulted from a very natural cause. When the overflows came, before the banks were built up, the first slacking of the current occurred upon the banks of the river, and there the principal deposits were made; and in this way from time to time the banks were built up, so that, as is said by some of the engineers, the ordinary overflow on the high banks was less than a foot. There was another thing that tended to raise these banks, and that was the reeds or cane, the brush or undergrowth which grew upon them, which acted as a dam to stop the current of the water and catch the sediment. So in the first settlement of the country the banks were very nearly as high as the highest water mark.

The leveeing was done in the first instance by individuals, and was simply a small embankment to protect a farm, as the settlements were made upon the bank of the river; but to improve the land they would cut away the forest and destroy the cane, which destroyed the adhesiveness of the banks, and the caving which kept continually going on was accelerated, and the banks of the river shifting by the caving of the banks from behind or from between, the high banks were in many places inclosed by low banks; and that has been going on ever since. That answers the objection that the levees raise the flood-tide, and that the result is you must build your levees higher and higher every year. The truth is, the flood-tide has not been raised. It is true the levees have been raised, but they have not been raised on top; they have been raised from the bottom. I explain that in this way: that being built on lower banks, it takes seven, eight, or ten feet of additional leveeing to put the levees on the same plane upon which they started when they were built on the high banks of the river. So there is nothing in that objection.

Having explained that much I propose to make an argument to show that it is within our power, and that it is our duty to aid in the rebuilding of these levees. In the outset, upon this part of the subject, I will admit what my friend from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] denied, that Congress has no constitutional power to make these improvements for the sole purpose of reclaiming or protecting the land from the floods of the Mississippi River. The power to make the levees exists, as I think can be demonstrated, but it results from the power to improve the navigation of the Mississippi River and its tributaries—a power conceded to exist in its amplest extent by the opponents of the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. But note, sir, I say it results from the power to improve the navigation of the river, not merely to improve its channel, as was ingeniously stated by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HARRISON.]

The power to improve the navigation of the river implies also the power to do all that will facilitate navigation on it and render it safer, easier, more convenient. And navigation means, sir, in this connection, not the mere running of vessels on the river, but the safe and easy and convenient reception, transportation, and landing of persons and property in any kind of vessels adapted to the river. To effect this something more is necessary than to have a channel in which these vessels may safely float. There must be not only such a channel, but there must be the means of ascertaining where it is. For this purpose we provide buoys and lights. There must also be conveniences for loading and unloading in harbors. The vessel must not only be safe in motion, but it must have a proper and safe place to anchor and from which to start again. But the powers of the Government and its daily exercise of them—its daily undisputed exercise of them—do not stop here. Provision is made by law of Congress for the inspection of the vessels to determine their strength and safety; regulations are made for their safe navigation; signals are required to be given, and lights held out, and proper and competent pilots provided for. Life-boats and life-preservers are also required and proper regulations made in respect to the transportation of dangerous freight.

All these are provided for under the same power under which we claim that levees can be made and repaired by authority of Congress. They are in the language applied by the Mississippi River commission to levees, as quoted by the Senator from Indiana, "a desirable though not a necessary adjunct" in the improvement of the river: in a "restricted sense, as auxiliary to a plan of channel improvement," these things, like levees, "are not demanded," "but in a larger sense" "they, just as levees do, promote and facilitate commerce, trade, and the postal services." And they do nothing more. They do for commerce between the States exactly what levees on the Mississippi River do, neither more nor less. They depend upon the same power in the Constitution that the building and repairing of levees do. If, therefore, the Government can do the one it can do the other.

But, sir, the levees do have what these do not, a direct and beneficial effect on channel improvement. And this effect is so clear, and can be so unmistakably made out, that if the power of Congress to improve the navigation of the river were restricted, as it clearly is not, to an improvement of the channel, it would extend to the making of the levees. Let us, see, sir, how this matter stands. We have the testimony not only of scientists, the members of the river commission, our own chosen officers, acting under the solemnity of their official oaths, but also that best of all kinds of evidence, experience. The commission, in their report of February 17, 1880, say:

> There is no doubt that the levees exert a direct action in deepening the channel and enarging the bed of the river during those periods of "rise" or "flood."

They exert a direct action, not remote, contingent and consequential, as argued by the Senator from Indiana, but direct, that is, "not crooked, oblique, or circuitous," but "leading immediately to the point or end," of deepening the channel. Can the jetties channel advocated by the Senator from Indiana do more? Then, again, the commission do not express this as a hypothetical opinion, mere speculation, but they say "there is no doubt" of this effect of the levees. The commission again say in the same report, reiterated with the above quotation in their latest report in December, 1881, and on this last occasion they are unanimous, including General Comstock, who dissented in the first report:

> There is reason to believe that during the period when levees were in their most perfect condition, from 1850 to 1858, the channel of the river was better, generally, for purposes of navigation than it has been since that time.

And the commission go on to show how this effect is produced. I quote from the same report, again reiterated unanimously in December last:

> The immediate effect of the levees would be to increase the volume and height and accelerate the velocity of the flood-waters between them, resulting in an erosion and deepening of the river-bed, and ultimately in a corresponding lowering of the flood-slope, in accordance with the general law already quoted—that an increase in the normal volume of discharge in a sedimentary stream, flowing through alluvial deposits, results ultimately in a lowering of the flood-surface. It would seem, therefore, that a closure of the crevasses might be expected to accelerate the removal of those shoals which have been produced by them, and if their closure be accompanied by the requisite contraction of the channel to a mere nearly uniform high-water width, a lowering of the flood-level may be expected to such extent as will ultimately render the maintenance of the levees as an aid to navigation practically needless above Red River, and greatly lessen the necessity of their permanent maintenance for that purpose below Red River, even at a reduced height.

Here it is seen that the immediate effect of the levees would be to increase the volume of water and to deepen the channel, and ultimately to so close in the flood-waters that levees above the mouth of Red River would be useless. And we have also in the extract the unanimous testimony of the commission to the fact that breaks or crevasses in the levees produce shoals or bars in the channel, which are the principal obstructions to the navigation of the Mississippi River.

Captain Eads, who did not sign this report, but made one of his own, is still more emphatic in declaring the utility of levees as a means of improving the channel navigation.

But, sir, this is not all the evidence. I shall next introduce the sworn statement of Captain T. P. Leathers, who has been engaged in the navigation of the Mississippi River for over forty years. He says, in an examination before a committee of Congress:

> I came on the river in 1836. The river was very low that year. The average depth of water on the shoalest bars from the mouth of the Ohio to the mouth of the Arkansas, a distance of about four hundred and fifty miles, was about four feet. From mouth of Arkansas to mouth of Yazoo, about two hundred and twenty-five miles, there was about five feet. From that to the mouth of Red River, about the same distance, the average depth on the shoaled bars was seven feet. Below Red River levees had been built; I do not know how long; but thence to the Gulf there was deep water.
> Then levees began to be built above Red River in the parishes of Concordia, Tensas, Madison, and Carroll, the result of which was that in 1857, a period of twenty-one years, while the river was twenty inches lower in its banks, there was not less than eight and a half feet of water on the shoalest bars in the formerly unleveed district between the Red and Arkansas Rivers, showing an increased depth of four feet scoured out by the current created by concentration of the water.
> I am convinced from my observations that if the levees were rebuilt and kept up on the lowlands, the concentration of volume and consequent accelerated current would soon wash out a channel large and deep enough for any purposes of commercial navigation. I am thoroughly satisfied that in the last ten years the frequent breaks in the levees and crevasses, dispersing the water over the country and diminishing the current, have caused the river to begin to shoal again. It always shoals near these breaks, evidently in consequence of the slackened current and natural deposit of sediment on the bottom which follows.
> I am confident that the only way of deepening the channel and getting reliable navigation is to concentrate the current, and if the great river accommodates itself by scouring out the bottom there will be no necessity for higher barriers at the top, and the levees will become more solid and reliable because relieved in a measure from the great pressure to which they are subjected.

Here, sir, we have reliable evidence of what levees have done for channel improvement—a scouring out of four feet on the bars above and a continuous good channel below Red River. What levees have done they can do again.

The next witness is Captain J. A. Aiken, president of the New Orleans and Red River Transportation Company, who also states before the same committee:

> Red River from Shreveport, Louisiana, to its mouth, distance about five hundred miles, was, previous to the building of levees along its banks, a shoal stream, having a rise and fall of eight to twelve feet, overflowing its banks during every high water and inundating the country for miles on either side. As the country became settled, the planters built levees to protect their lands from the annual overflows.
> At about the year 1860 these levees, from Loggy Bayou to Alexandria, distance two hundred and twenty miles, had become connected and continuous, presenting an unbroken line on each bank. It was soon found that the concentration of the water and increased current caused by the levees was washing out and lowering the bed of the river, and the effect has been so great that along this section of the river the rise and fall is now as much as twenty-five to thirty feet, and the lands have not been inundated for years. There are levees standing to-day four feet high above their base, that the highest floods have not touched for years. Since the war the levees have been extended above Loggy Bayou to Robinson's, distance about twelve miles, and the same deepening or lowering of the rived-bed has been the result.
> From Robinson's to Shreveport, distance about ninety miles, there are outlets on either side; the levees are not continuous and connected as they were below; the lands still overflow, and the river is gradually shoaling; below Alexandria the river is in about the same condition as when first navigated by steamboats; namely, no perfect system of levees, no lowering of its bed; open outlets and annual overflows.

Here we see the important fact that overflows and shoals in the channel, and levees and deepening the channel always go together.

And Messrs. Suter and Harrod, two members of the Mississippi River commission, after quoting the above testimony as to Red River, and other testimony as to other rivers, say:

> The subsequent histories of these streams have amply vindicated the correctness of the foregoing statements.

These gentlemen also report the following remarkable effects of levees on floods in the Mississippi River:

> The flood of 1858 is admitted to have been the greatest authenticated of recent years, generally, below Cairo. Its discharge at Cairo is estimated at 1,478,000 cubic feet per second. It found the levees to the mouth of the Saint Francis in their best condition, the breaks being less than twenty-five miles in length.
> This was the largest flood, containing the greatest discharge per second at Cairo, and yet it found the levees in a good condition between Cairo and Memphis, only twenty-five miles being down.
> The flood of 1874 discharged at Cairo 1,225,000 cubic feet per second, 253,000 feet or 17 per cent. less than 1858. It found in three hundred miles breaks one hundred and forty-three miles long, ranging to twenty-five feet in depth. Yet the crest of this flood, starting at Cairo 2.2 feet below that of 1858, steadily approached and then exceeded that mark at a point between Memphis and the mouth of the Saint Francis River.

Less by two feet in height, less by 17 per cent. in volume at Cairo, and yet with one hundred and forty-three miles of levee down it steadily approached in height and finally exceeded in height the great flood of 1858, which ran between perfected and completed levees nearly.

There is no accounting for this except on the theory that the levees had scoured out the river in 1858, deepening the channel, and thereby lessening the flood-height, and in 1874, the levees being down, the river had shoaled again, raising the flood-tide.

Here is evidence enough to convince the most skeptical that levees do constitute an important part of the means of improving the navigation of the Mississippi River.

I have now shown, both by the testimony of scientific experts—our own sworn officers—charged by law with making truthful and trustworthy reports on the subject, and by the observation of careful and intelligent non-experts, that the levees do have a direct and immediate, not an oblique and contingent effect, in deepening the river and improving its channel. What more is needed to establish both the power to make levees and the expediency of its exercise?

I have brought the erection of levees on the Mississippi River within the rule adopted by the Government in all its other dealings in facilitating commerce and furnishing easy and convenient appliances for it. I have done more. I have shown that the erection of levees does have an immediate and direct effect on the improvement of the channel. Yet, Mr. President, this goes for nothing, because it is said that they are not essential—not imperatively demanded—that the river may be improved without them. But, sir, this argument cannot prevail without destroying well-settled rules of constitutional construction, without reversing the action of this Government not only on the subject of improving navigation but also in its most important functions.

According to this argument the Government has no power to adopt either of any two methods or means of accomplishing the same end, however constitutional that end may be. If there be two, then neither one is essential, as the other may be resorted to. Thus when one is proposed, you destroy it by showing that some other way may also be adopted; and so when the latter is proposed, it is equally defeated by showing that the former is a feasible plan. In this way it can be equally shown that the Government has no power to remove the bars by dredging, because they can be removed by jetties; and so jetties may be shown to be beyond the power of the Government, because the improvement can be made by dredging. For, it is true, if dredging will do the work jetties are not "essential," and if jetties will do it dredging is not "essential." When we say that levees have a direct and immediate effect in removing bars, we are answered, "We cannot adopt the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, because jetties will accomplish the same end; the improvement may be done by jetties alone, without levees." This kind of reasoning will not do. Congress is the constitutional judge of the means. The end is constitutional—admittedly so. In such a case Congress may select any one of several independent measures; or may combine them all, if in its judgment that be proper. I desire not to be misunderstood on this important subject. While asserting the power of Congress to choose the means, I admit that the choice must be fairly made with the view to accomplish the permitted constitutional end.

We cannot, under cover of selecting a proper means, by indirection and subterfuge accomplish an end outside of the Constitution. We must act in good faith—good faith to the Constitution which we are sworn to support; good faith to the people whose Treasury we use.

But, sir, as was admitted by the Senator from Indiana, if the means adopted do result in conferring a good, outside of and beyond the primary constitutional end to attain which power is granted this is no objection to their selection. On the contrary, sir, it is a just and good reason why they should be. The Constitution was formed, not for the mere purpose of exercising the granted powers, but for the purpose of promoting the public good through such exercise. It follows that if the means selected be appropriate to attain the end desired, it accords with the spirit and purpose of the Constitution that the greatest beneficent results should flow from them.

Sir, in all our actions here we are governed by these rules. Why should we discard them on this subject? When we come to levy duties under the power to raise revenue do we not do it in a way to accomplish an ulterior though incidental end—the protection of American manufactures? So, under the power to provide fiscal agents for the Government, do we not provide for banks of issue and deposit for furnishing a currency for the commerce of the country?

We encourage and advance manufactures by a choice out of several means to raise revenues. We facilitate commerce, foreign and domestic, by similar methods. Why can we not treat agriculture in the same beneficent manner? Is that alone, the greatest of all the interests of the country, employing one-half of our people and furnishing eight-tenths of our foreign exports, to be denied the friendly hand of the Government, by refusing it the incidental advantages arising from an exercise of admitted constitutional power? We spend millions to facilitate the transportation of agricultural products, as the primary end of the expenditure, yet it is supposed we must not spend a dollar in a particular way to attain this very end if it shall have the indirect and incidental effect to increase this production. A bushel of wheat, or of corn, or of potatoes, or a bale of cotton when it has been deposited on a navigable stream, when it has passed from the ownership of the farmer who raised it, is the object of our greatest direct solicitude and care, but we shrink from contributing in the least, even in an indirect and incidental way, to facilitate its production. We exhaust our care for it to save it when afloat. We can do nothing for agricultural productions when it is in the barns of the farmer, or when it is in his fields, developing by his care and labor and the beneficent power of nature into the great crops on which is based so much of the wealth and greatness of the country.

It is said levees, according to the Mississippi River commission, only facilitate improvement in navigation and increase and develop commerce on the Mississippi River, and therefore should not be built at the expense of the National Treasury; that because they are not absolutely demanded and are only useful and convenient, we must not interpose to build them; that they only hasten, by imparting increased potency to the scouring of the current, the removal of the bars and shoals in the river.

But, sir, are not all improvements for commercial intercourse of this character? Do any of them accomplish more than to hasten and facilitate transportation and intercourse? The very bars and shoals, which it is conceded by all we ought to remove, only impede and obstruct navigation; they do not absolutely prevent it. We have had for many years, and are likely to have for many more, an immense commerce on the Mississippi River with these bars in existence. During high water they are of no injury to navigation. It is only in the lowest stages of water that they become hurtful, and even then they admit the passage of light-draft vessels, in which the whole commerce of the river might be carried if their number were but sufficiently increased. And if we are to refuse this appropriation on that ground, are we not justified in refusing all appropriations whatever to improve the navigation of the river? Even harbors and the removal of bars which prevent large vessels from reaching our great cities are not demanded; that is, absolutely essential, for smaller vessels might be used. If larger ones are desired they might be anchored outside the harbor and loaded and unloaded by lighterage. And so I might say with reference to every improvement we make and every facility we give to promote the safety and convenience of commerce. None of them are essential in the sense here contended for in respect to levees. Buoys can be dispensed with by employing only skilled pilots acquainted with the channel and by using the sounding-lead. Lights on the banks might be omitted by anchoring the vessel at night. They only hasten navigation; their absence would only make it slower and more unsafe.

The levees are also useful, not to say necessary, as furnishing harbors or places for the reception and discharge of freight and passengers in high water. In not exceeding a score of places between Cairo and the mouth of the Mississippi, a distance of over 1,100 miles, can a boat land for purposes of commerce in high water, and these places are nearly all on the east bank of the river, leaving the west bank practically without any landing-place whatever. There is no remedy for this but levees. There is no place of safety either for passengers or merchandise in case of accident or storm. Without levees the Mississippi River at flood tide is practically a shoreless sea. With the commerce on its current and the adjacent country there is practically no connection. The Senate will remember that when we had under consideration the proposition to relieve the sufferers from the present flood that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] applied for authority to use the smaller boats of the Engineer Department to carry relief to the starving and drowning inhabitants of the valley upon the ground that the ordinary trade boats on the river could not reach them. If there had been levees no such application would have been made. If it is argued that for this purpose we would not be justified in making the large expenditure necessary, I answer that I do not ask it for this purpose alone, but it contributes an additional and very strong reason for the expenditure to the many others which exist.

The commerce, sir, which would be aided and facilitated by the furnishing of proper landing-places is one of the very highest merit, and demands the fostering care of the Government. It is a commerce directly between the wholesale dealer and frequently the producer on the one hand and the consumer on the other. On all the plantations on the river and near it immense quantities of western produce are consumed, together with clothing, dry goods, agricultural implements. With proper landing places these articles are landed directly at the door of the consumer. I have no statistics to show the amount of this commerce, but you will have some idea of it when you learn that in the Yazoo basin alone $130,000,000 of cotton has been produced since the war, every dollar of which has been expended in this commerce. That it would assume gigantic proportions in a few years if the Mississippi Valley was made secure from overflow is certain. In this view levees are rural harbors. We make these improvements without question in cities. Is there any reason why the same measure of jusfice should not be extended to the country when the necessity exists for it?

But, sir, there are other reasons of grave import to impel us to exercise the power to build and repair the levees, as I have shown it to exist.

The Mississippi River commission in their report in December, 1881, say:

> The discussion in Appendix F establishes a strong presumption that the levees of the Mississippi do not now stand as works superimposed on the normal banks to restrain an additional flood volume and elevation, which they themselves have produced, but as artificial barriers to replace that natural height of bank which has been lost from causes connected with the occupation and cultivation not only of the banks of the main stream but also of the basins drained by the tributaries. Their present function is not so much to increase the flood volume abnormally as to maintain that part of it which would otherwise be lost from the degradation of the banks.

In this appendix to the report here referred to it is shown that, while the flood-height of the river has not increased since it was first observed, and that the overflows originally on the banks were less than a foot in height, yet the levees are now necessarily raised higher and higher after every flood. I quote from the appendix, as follows:

> We therefore assume that it is established that the average flood-plane has not raised since the settlement of the country and the building of levees, the enlargement of the channel or bed having kept pace with the increased quantity of water retained therein, and that then the grade of the bank conformed much more closely to that plane than it does to-day—being only a little below, and perhaps, in some places, a little above—probably lower in the bends and higher in the points. The escape of water in average floods was probably confined to the outlets, with, in great floods, a shallow flow over the banks. Now, however, we constantly find long distances of levee of a height from 10 to 15, 18, and even 20 feet, exclusive of the dikes across defined outlets. It is believed that the levees will average, throughout their entire length, from 7 to 8 feet in height. They stand now, in fact, as part of the normal bank of the river.

This extract is especially worthy of note, for it in connection with what follows shows that by the necessary use of the land which the Government sold its liability to destructive overflow continually from year to year, season to season, increases, and will so continue for all time to come, and that the levees, to protect them from devastating floods, if the river be not deepened by being necessarily put on lower and lower banks, must be made higher and higher, till their erection and repair will be beyond the power of any save the National Treasury. It is not a fair answer to this, that as the cultivation of the soil by the owners contributes to the result it is their fault, and they are not entitled to relief. The land was sold for agricultural purposes. It has no other value. Would, sir, you have the farmers to abandon cultivation, to cease production, to leave their homes and fields, to allow the jungle and forest to return? And if so, for what? Why, sir, they must cease cultivation, cease clearing, cease the use of the land forever, in order that it may remain or become fit for a purpose to which, according to the argument I am answering, they dare not put it.

The report continues:

> Among the causes which have produced this change(—i. e., the lowering of the banks) we consider the following as important:
> 1. The clearing of the banks has accelerated the rate of caving, and has removed the conditions favorable to the arrest of sediment, and the elevation of the land thereby. It is certainly observable, both in surveys and in an examination of the river banks, that forests exert considerable influence in retarding the caving. Wooded banks generally stand a little in advance of the shore line of an adjacent clearing. As soon as this projection becomes sufficient to expose them to great stress of current they also cave, but the observed facts are sufficient to justify the opinion that when the line of forest was unbroken and accompanied by canebrakes, trailing boughs and vines, the interlacing of roots and the tenacity of the sod, the rate of caving was considerably slower than at present.

Corroborating this view is the increased number of cut-offs. The trace of these characteristic changes in the river is well-nigh indelible. They lie for centuries, lakes embosomed in the recesses of the swamp, retainining the distinctive marks of their origin, the high alluvial bank, the width, and to a great extent the depth, of the present stream. Of these cut-off lakes about thirty-one can be already recognized below Cairo, probably completing a record extending back many centuries. But of this number not less than twelve, or about two-fifths, have occurred since the beginning of the present century. Each one intensified the activity of the cause by which it was produced, increasing the current and the caving above and below, and directing it against new points of attack, composed of recent deposits of sand, which disappear with appalling rapidity.

Yes, sir, with "appalling rapidity." That is the language of the writers—two of the most intelligent and able members of the commission. This is not speculation or theory, but an appalling truth, demonstrated by the facts as they exist to-day.

Is there nothing in this to induce this body to so use an admitted power in a perfectly constitutional manner, by the selection of appropriate means to attain a clearly constitutional end in such way as to prevent the destruction of property which the Government has sold and for which it has been fully paid, to restore it as to exemption from overflow as near as may be to the condition existing when the sale was made, a belief in a continuance of that condition being an essential element in the sale and purchase, and without which belief no sale could have been made?

Mr. President, there are other causes for the present overflow which will continue to operate forever, and which are even more directly traceable to the action of this Government and the people of the Union, and which therefore, strongly persuade us to give the relief asked for. I continue the reading from the same paper:

2. Other causes geographically remote, and extending throughout the tributary valleys, have contributed.

An immense mass of observations has been collected in this country and in Europe upon the effects of clearing, cultivating, and such other changes as have been rapidly going on in all the States bordering the tributaries of the Mississippi; upon the climate, rainfall, and drainage. Although much remains in doubt and indefinite, yet all testimony is concurrent to the establishment of certain conclusions, which theory would have led us to anticipate. The deforesting of extensive tracts, although it cannot be surely said to have affected the aggregate amount of rainfall, yet certainly has made the climate more irregular.

And this irregularity is the cause of all the trouble, both to navigation and the use of the lands, for a regular rainfall would prevent both high and low water.

The rains are less frequent, but more violent. The summers are longer and the winters shorter. Clearing, and the consequent loss of the layers of leaves, mold, and sod beneath the forests, has increased the surface drainage at the expense of that part of the precipitation arrested, absorbed, and stored in the depths of the earth as a supply for perennial springs which furnish the low-water volume of the streams. The breaking of the sod by plowing exposes the surface to erosion of earthy and vegetable matter, sand, and still larger material swept by the more rapid drainage of the surface into and down the beds of the streams. It is the observation of pilots that the amount of gravel in the river has largely increased in the past thirty years. This must come mainly from the hillsides of the tributaries, and forms bars, which offer more resistance to erosion than the sandy and friable banks of the river.

It is therefore true that the agricultural development of the tributary basins of the Mississippi have contributed to make the floods of that river more violent and rapid to protect the low-water season and to add to the erosion and quantity of sediment moved by floods, and the sand and gravel bars of low water. These views concerning the effect of deforesting and cultivation are entertained by Humphreys and Abbot, and all authorities who have written on the subject. These changes of regimen are intimately and injuriously connected with the obstruction of navigation and the caving of the banks. To them may also be added the wash of steamboat waves, as having a destructive effect upon the banks and levees, particularly at certain stages of the river.

Further than that, as stated in the extract, large quantities of gravel which are not easily removable are found in the river, which were deposited there by the tributaries, and the ability of the tributaries to deposit is caused by the cultivation of the hillsides over which the water flows.

It is thus seen that the progress of the country—this astonishing, not to say marvelous, progress, which has given to us since the settlement of the Lower Mississippi Valley so many great States in the Northwest and which is continually adding to the cultivated lands in that region, all of which is drained by the Mississippi River—I say this progress and cultivation have added and are adding daily to the difficulty of protecting the Lower Mississippi River from these great floods. This progress, which ought to be a source of unmixed joy and pride to every American citizen, yet contains a deadly sting in it to the prosperity and safety of the dwellers in the Lower Mississippi Valley if they be unaided in their efforts to ward off the consequences pointed out in the extract I have read. Every new field cleared, every ditch dug, every furrow made by the plow, for the reasons stated in the extract, adds to the already overmastering violence of these floods and to the diminished volume of low water. Will not the people of this large section of the Union—great, prosperous, advancing—see that the grave calamities to which they are unwilling yet unavoidable contributors, shall be mitigated by an exercise of our undoubted power of the National Government.

But, sir, in the two last lines I have read from the preceding extract is contained, if possible, a more potent argument than all the others to urge this body to the passage of the bill with the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. I will repeat them.

To them—

The foregoing causes of overflow—

may be added the wash of steamboat waves as having a destructive effect on the banks and levees, particularly in certain stages of the river.

Here we have another potent cause of the destruction of the levees and banks arising from the very servitude to which the Government devotes the river. This servitude we propose to increase by an improvement of the navigation. It will increase from this action of Congress and it will continue to increase till there shall be an end to the progress and advancement of the country. Already this inland sea in seasons of good navigation is vexed hourly at every point by the countless steamboats which carry the commerce of the West and South. If the navigation of the river shall be made safe and convenient, as we propose and as the needs of the country demand, there will be a ceaseless beat of these waves on the banks and levees, causing caving in of the one and abrasion and breaking of the other. Is it right and just to the people of the Mississippi Valley to put upon them the expense and duty of rebuilding and repairing what we are hourly destroying? This fact alone, even if the people were able to make the levees, appeals with great force to Congress to lift this burden from them, and this appeal comes with resistless force when it is shown, as it is here, that the improvement we are authorizing may be properly made in a way which will counteract the injury it inflicts, and when it is further shown that the ability of the people of the Mississippi Valley is unequal to the task of counteracting the injury we are inflicting.

Mr. President, there is one other consideration of a similar character in favor of improving the river so as to protect the lands from overflow. It arises from the fact that the present and most effective method of improving the tributaries—the method we adopt—is to remove bar-shoals and other obstructions to the free flow of the water in their channels, whereby the current is hastened in high water to the Mississippi River. This hastening of the waters causes an increased height in the floods of the Mississippi River, rendering higher, stronger, and more costly levees absolutely necessary.

It seems too plain to require argument that if we do anything which causes the floods to rise higher in the Mississippi River, it is our plain duty in improving it to do it in such manner as to mitigate as far as possible the injury which we inflict.

And now, Mr. President, I have stated the reasons which justify, in my judgement, this expenditure.

I wish to say something more to induce the Senate to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, both as to the phraseology employed in directing the expenditure and as to the amount to be given.

I do not believe, sir, that the language of the bill will prevent the Mississippi River commission from building the levees, for I am sure that the levees will materially aid in the improvement of the navigation of the river, and I feel a great confidence that the members of the commission entertain the same view. But, sir, when I remember that the bill as it stands was sustained and construed by the very able and ingenious, yet, as I have shown, erroneous speech of a member of the committee who reported it, the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HARRISON]——

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator allow me to correct him just at that point? I am not a member of the committee.

Mr. GEORGE. I thought the Senator was. The Senator ought to be.

Mr. HARRISON. I am much obliged.

Mr. GEORGE. I fear that a narrow construction will be put on the powers of the commission, and that they may not feel at liberty to exercise their unrestrained judgment in the disbursements of the fund appropriated. It is to remove all doubt, to leave to the commission the exercise of their judgment as to what should be done to repair or build levees in order to aid in the improvement of navigation, that I hope the phraseology may be changed. In so important a matter we ought to make our meaning clear. As to the amount, I think it is important that $15,000,000 should be appropriated. I agree with the Senator from Maine that this amount cannot be economically expended during the fiscal year, I do not expect that it will be expended within that time. But, sir, the designation of that sum is of vast importance to the people of the Mississippi Valley. It gives them the assurance that this Congress is in earnest; that the river will be so improved as to protect them. It will give them hope and confidence in the future; it will remove despondency and in many cases despair. It will inspire them with new energy in the hard task before them, to repair their fortunes, to rebuild their desolated homes.

Mr. President, it has been my fortune to visit a portion of the overflowed district within the last month. I saw for myself that the picture of desolation and destruction had not been overdrawn. For miles I traveled in a small boat over plantations once rich and fertile beyond those in any other region. It was the season when should have met my vision cultivated fields, growing crops of corn and cotton, the busy, contented, and happy laborer, with cheerful toil, working for the remunerative harvests of autumn.

The land was the bottom of a wide and, to all appearances, a boundless expanse of water, which bore on its bosom the sad but sure evidence of its destroying power—floating fences and houses, and the carcasses of drowned and starved domestic animals. The laborers were crowded and huddled in the higher parts of their dwellings, with no means of egress but rafts and small boats, which had been improvised for the purpose. They were gloomy, despondent, disheartened, waiting with resignation for the slow recession of the destroying flood.

I found the planters equally depressed. Many were hopeless of a crop during the present year; many had suffered such losses in stock, buildings, and fences that they were unable to go forward when the land should again appear; many were talking of abandoning the unequal contest with the destroying floods and going to the hills.

Is it too much, sir, to ask that this measure shall be promptly passed? I hope not, since it is commended to our favorable action by every consideration of justice and fair dealing. It has, too, the sanction of the President, who in this respect should be considered as more fairly representing the wishes and views of the great body of the American people than Senators representing either the inundated country or those coming from more fortunate localities.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. I ask now unanimous consent that this bill be informally laid aside in order that I may ask the Senate to take up House joint resolution No. 197, being a joint resolution relating to the public printing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will first recognize the Senator from New Jersey as entitled to the floor on the pending bill.

Mr. McPHERSON. I will give way if the Senator wishes me to do so.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from New Jersey to give way. I do not think this joint resolution will take a great deal of time.

Mr. McPHERSON. It is understood that I have the floor on the pending question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey has the floor.

PRINTING DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION.

Mr. ALLISON. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 197) making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for public printing and binding for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, to report it without amendment. I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered at this time.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know but that a brief explanation of this resolution may be required. It supplies a deficiency of $465,000 for public printing for the current year. It is estimated that if this amount is appropriated all the necessary printing for the current year can be done. I do not know whether any further explanation is required. If not, I ask that the resolution be passed at once.

Mr. BECK. I do not propose to debate it, but I should like to know of the chairman of the committee when he speaks of all the necessary printing, just what he means by that. I think the Senate ought to be advised of the real condition of this matter. The public printing has gone on now till we have spent $2,500,000 this year thus far; and when we had the little urgent deficiency bill here some time ago, and the Senate sought to give $200,000 more than the other House proposed, that economical House of Representatives would not allow it to go in; it had to be stricken out, and now they come with a deficiency bill of $465,000, and still have to lop off a very large amount of public printing in order to make this money carry us through the fiscal year.

I think there ought to be some explanation, unless we are just going to give all that anybody asks and print all that anybody wants. The committee were told this morning that the census reports, which are about the only essential things the people of this country seem to want, will not be given to us for two or three years to come. I believe a million and a half has already been appropriated for them, and they will cost two or three millions. Everybody is writing on every subject connected with the census whatever he likes, and it seems as though we are going to have a series of essays on every subject; and the compendium of the census is likely to appear about 1885, or perhaps about the time we shall be ordering a new census to be taken. We were told to-day that for one book the engravings alone would cost $95,000, and the paper for it was $25,000 more. What book was that?

Mr. ALLISON. That was the Agricultural Report of 1880.

Mr. BECK. Yes, the Agricultural Report.

Mr. ALLISON. The illustrations for the Agricultural Report of 1880, now nearly ready for distribution, cost $95,000.

Mr. BECK. I had a memorandum of what was reported to us. I think it is due to the Senate that the chairman of the committee should just tell the tangle we are in now about this matter and the number of useless things we are printing; and it is the fault of ourselves, for everything that comes to Congress is printed, and the amount of trash that we are ordering would break any Government but this. This Government cannot be broken, of course; it can spend any amount; there is no end to it. But why should the census reports be three years behind, for that is the shortest time anybody estimates that we shall get them; and we cannot get even the compendium till everybody writes all he likes. There are to be thirty volumes in all probability of reports of the census; they are swelling up; men are writing away yet and will continue to write for a year or two.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the Senator from Kentucky hold the chairman of the Committee on Printing responsible for the expenditures of the Printing Office?

Mr. BECK. No; I hold the Senate and the House of Representatives responsible, and I hold myself partly responsible as one member of this body.

Mr. ANTHONY. Congress passes deficient appropriations for printing, and then orders large numbers of volumes to be printed not contemplated when the estimates for the appropriations were made. There is nothing printed at the Government Printing Office unless according to statute or by order of Congress, and not a bill is paid out except upon vouchers. The Public Printer draws two-thirds of the amount of his bond and when he has given vouchers for his subsequent expenditures he draws enough to make two-thirds of his bond in addition.

Mr. BECK. The chairman of the Printing Committee will allow me to interrupt him. There is what they call the Unabridged Message and Documents; I think eleven or twelve or thirteen volumes. Of course they ought to be printed; but they are sent to my home in bags and I cannot get anybody to take them. I do not know what to do with them; nobody wants them. How much their printing costs I do not know.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the Senator know how many he has of those?

Mr. BECK. I do not know.

Mr. ANTHONY. He gets fourteen, I think.

Mr. BECK. Fourteen sets, of eleven volumes each?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think so.

Mr. BECK. I do not think any member of the Senate or House has need for more than one or two; but that work is only a specimen.

Mr. ANTHONY. Those volumes are printed according to statute. I find use for all mine in public libraries.

Mr. BECK. I will send all mine to the Senator for that use.

Mr. ANTHONY. I shall be glad to have them; I can distribute them. The Committee on Printing have several times reported a bill, which has twice passed the Senate but has not met the favor of the other House, to restrict the number of volumes printed. The Committee on Printing have uniformly, year after year, reported against the enormous numbers of the Agricultural Report printed. I think we have not had the support of the Senator from Kentucky in that attempt at reduction. Congress prints 300,000 copies of the Agricultural Report.

Mr. BECK. It is the only book of any account I ever knew to come from the Printing Office—the only book of any value.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it is a valuable book, but I think that if we print 300,000 copies of the Agricultural Report we might very well print a similar number of reports upon mechanics and manufactures and other industrial arts. At all events the Committee on Printing have uniformly reported against this enormous edition and have been as uniformly defeated. As the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has said, the illustrations for the Agricultural Report and the report on the diseases of swine last year cost $96,000—the illustrations alone.

Mr. BECK. This fact must not be overlooked: the total amount appropriated last year for printing was $2,100,000. This year we have got it up to $2,555,000, nearly $500,000 more already, and they have to lop off $200,000 of unfinished work in order to make this money last to the end of the year, and discharge a very large number of persons employed that they say they have no work for.

Mr. ANTHONY. The remedy is not in ordering the work, not in refusing to appropriate for it after it has been ordered. Every blank book, every account book, every blank, every bill, every article of printing needed from Portland to Galveston for all the public offices, for all the custom-houses, for all the post-offices, for all the land offices, for all the internal-revenue offices, is printed in this Printing Office, and as the country is growing the demands are constantly increasing, and it is impossible to get along without the printing.

Besides that, it has been the pleasure of Congress to pass an act requiring the Public Printer to pay a larger sum for eight hours' work at the Public Printing Office than private printers pay for ten hours' work. That makes an enormous addition to the charge for printing; and although it costs more to print here than it does anywhere else in the country, except perhaps at New Orleans and San Francisco, yet the work is done much cheaper now than it was under contract. Blank books are printed now for $27 that cost $59 under the contract system; and the printing here is done, according to the testimony of the Treasury officers, 50 per cent. better.

We have done everything we can on the part of the Committee on Printing to restrict the amount of printing; but in the first place the demands of the Departments increase, and in the second place the orders of Congress increase.

Mr. BECK. Permit me to say a word. I do not expect to vote against this deficiency bill; but when the Senate inserted $200,000 in the last deficiency bill it was stricken out by the House because it appeared very extravagant. Now comes an appeal for $465,000, and then it will require $200,000 more, if all the other printing already ordered is done, and there is a large number of hands to be discharged. The question is, How can we stop this? Something must be done; and how can we get the necessary printing done? Why should the census reports, which everybody wants, especially the compendium of the census, be delayed three or four years?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know that it is to be delayed for three or four years. It has not been prepared yet, and it cannot be printed until the copy is furnished. We have not got the estimate. I sent for the estimate a week ago and I expect to have it here to-morrow; but it will be an approximate estimate because the copy has not been furnished and the Public Printer cannot form an estimate, except approximately, of how much it will require to print it. I do not think the census report will be delayed three years, but if it be it will be for lack of appropriation.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, there is no question of the fact that the demands of this Government in every department of it are constantly increasing. The appropriations for 1878, 1879, and 1880 were constantly increasing appropriations. Last year we appropriated $2,200,000 for this purpose; but the regular appropriation bill last year for the present fiscal year only contained $1,700,000, when it must have been perfectly well known that there would be a deficiency in the public printing. We spent $2,014,000 in the fiscal year 1880-'81, and yet only appropriated $1,700,000 last year for this purpose for the present current fiscal year. An immediate deficiency bill was passed here in February. It came to the Senate with an item of $400,000 for a deficiency for public printing. The Senate Committee on Appropriations inserted an additional item of $200,000 for that purpose, knowing perfectly well that the public printing could not be conducted unless this additional deficiency was appropriated; yet the House of Representatives struck that out and said we could get on during the remainder of the year. Now they send to us a joint resolution for a deficiency of $165,000. That is not enough to print all the volumes and documents and papers that have been ordered by both Houses of Congress. There will still be behind $286,000 in value of public printing which has been already ordered by Congress.

This printing is largely for the Departments of the Government, as has truly been said by the Senator from Rhode Island. The printing for the Departments alone costs a million dollars annually. All the blanks of the internal-revenue offices, all the custom-house blanks, all the Post-Office blanks, everything in the nature of public printing for the various Departments is printed at the Public Printing Office at an annual cost of a million dollars. The current printing of Congress costs $100,000 every three months. In this deficiency appropriation is an item of $100,000 for the ordinary current printing of this session from the 1st of April to the 1st of July, if we shall continue so long in session. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will require $45,000 to carry on the printing of it from this time till the 1st of July. Two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars of this sum is for the different Departments of the Government.

Now, although it is true that we are constantly increasing the amount appropriated for this purpose, yet I think in the main these are necessary appropriations. Take the census printing alluded to by the Senator from Kentucky. Not one dollar of this appropriation can be or has been used for the purpose of printing the census report. The Public Printer said to us to-day that the estimate made for printing the census volumes, $1,500,000, would be required. That must be appropriated either next year or the year following, and if we have these great publications printed at the public expense, as the census report will be a great publication, amounting to from twenty-four to thirty-two volumes, the cost must be paid for in some way. That is perfectly apparent.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to say that I have been informed, on what I regard as very high authority, that the printing of the census reports will cost about $2,700,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I will permit the Senator to say that, but I regret to hear him say it. Of course the cost of that work is not under the control of the Public Printer, and it is not reasonably under the control of Congress. These various volumes will be prepared under the direction of the Superintendent of the Census and they will doubtless all be valuable in the future; and whatever the cost is, of course the appropriation must be made. If the volumes are to be thirty-two, as some say, perhaps the cost will amount to what the Senator from Massachusetts indicates.

But all I desire to say now is, that the sum we appropriate here in the way of a deficiency is absolutely necessary and essential to carry on the ordinary operations of the Government for the remainder of this fiscal year, and not one dollar of this appropriation is for extraordinary or even unnecessary purposes, in my judgment. The Agricultural Report of 1881 has not yet been ordered to be printed. The Public Printer says that the copy of the report for 1881 is not yet in his office, so that in this appropriation there is nothing for the Agricultural Report of 1881. It is true that we ordered 300,000 copies of the Agricultural Report of 1880, at a cost of $240,000, which has been paid for out of these appropriations. So if we order 300,000 copies of the Agricultural Report of 1881 we must make the necessary appropriation for that purpose.

It seems to me that all we have to do now is to appropriate the amount asked for by the House of Representatives, and I trust another deficiency will not appear for this purpose during the present session.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to make one observation in regard to what has been said by the Senator from Iowa. The House of Representatives seem to have thought it a wise economy to refuse to concur with the Senate in making a provision that the members of the two Houses might communicate on public business with their constituents free of charge. It was proposed by the Senate that when a soldier, a pensioner, desired, as he often does, his Senator or Representative to act merely as a claims agent for him—which I suppose we are all very happy to do to the extent of our ability—the expense of that correspondence should not be paid for out of the private pocket of the member of the House or of the Senate. Of the wisdom of that judgment I have nothing to say; but at the same time the House of Representatives and the Senate maintain this costly, wasteful, extravagant system of publishing and distributing public documents, and I believe three or four times the House has refused to give any consideration to bills which have passed the Senate on the recommendation of the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, the chairman of the Committee on Printing, providing for the proper and suitable distribution of these costly documents.

The result is that while this Government publishes these works, which are all of them, or nearly all of them, of the very highest value, doing great credit to the science, to the enterprise, and to the liberality of the American people, yet they are left to be distributed by members of the House or Senators as they come and go, succeeding one another, on a system which has no possible relation to economy or to the public interest. We regard it as a mark of attention or respect to some friend or acquaintance to send him one of these volumes, so that when they come out in sets some of the volumes go to one man's shelf who never reads them, some of the same set go on to another's, and they are almost practically worthless, three-quarters of them, I suppose, for any purpose for which they were originally designed by Congress.

Take this matter of the census report which was alluded to by the Senator from Iowa. I understand there will be from twenty to twenty-eight volumes of that report, possibly thirty, and it is, I suppose, the most complete and perfect census ever taken on earth, certainly by far the most complete one ever taken in this country; and yet, perhaps, the early volumes of this report will go to one man, the late volumes to another, with no regulation by which the public libraries of the country can get them, unless by accident the member of Congress or the Senator chooses to select a particular public library as a depository, and the House of Representatives utterly refused to consider any well-regulated scheme for the distribution of these public documents. They are used, as a rule—not a universal rule—not for the purpose of disseminating knowledge among the people, not for the purpose of building up or aiding in building up public libraries; they are used simply as marks of attention and respect by members of this body or members of the other House to constituents to whom they want to pay a compliment. That is not universally true, but it is largely true.

The publication of the records of the war will reach I understand one hundred volumes, and will cost this country many hundreds of thousands of dollars before it is completed. The Medical and Surgical History of the War has already cost several hundred thousand dollars, and the census report I am informed, on high authority, will probably cost some $2,700,000 in publication.

It seems to me that instead of discussing the petty, pitiful subject of the franking privilege, it is about time to incorporate in one of these printing bills a provision for economy and for proper and useful distribution of these important and costly documents.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, since this subject is up, I want to call attention to another thing which we shall have to meet in a day or two. I have been watching it for some time. House joint resolution No. 34, Order of Business 490, "to provide for the publication of the official report of the trial of the murderer of President Garfield," will come up soon on the Calendar; and God knows how many copies of that report will be ordered to be printed. Then after the "dying confession" there will be another edition revised and corrected, and then will come the Mason trial, of course with fine engravings of "Betty and the baby," and all the other proceedings will be got up and printed for the use of Congress and circulated at a cost of $100,000 or $200,000. This joint resolution on the Calendar I expect to be heard on when it is reached. These are the kind of things we are spending public money upon.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, the question suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is one of importance and of interest. It is not new to the Committee on Printing, on which committee I have the honor to follow the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] There have been various propositions made. One bill was presented by the society of librarians. It proposes to provide a list of libraries worthy of having these volumes, and then that the books shall be sent to them without the intervention of Congressmen. I am sure many of us would like that very well. So far as the State I have the honor in part to represent is concerned, it would suit me because it is very easy to give a list of libraries there worthy of receiving the books. But then this difficulty confronted us: in many sections of the country, especially the newer and more thinly settled ones, there are no libraries of consequence; the people are too poor and scattered to be able to avail themselves of a library, even if one should be built up in the middle of a county fifty miles square containing a few hundred people. So the result of the plan proposed by the librarians, and which had suggested itself to many persons, would be that these books would be very unequally distributed over the country. That is the prime difficulty in that proposition.

I certainly am unable to see how we can provide a public list that would be fair. I do not see how we can avoid having the major part of the distribution at the discretion of Congressmen. I see the difficulties and the abuses in that system. Some of them have been mentioned here. I will venture to point out one of them. In a very short time after books are published at our Printing Office, even the best and most beautiful of them, I can go to second-hand dealers in this town and buy them at half the cost to the Government of getting them out. I can also buy as many copies of the agricultural report for ten cents a copy as I need. That report this year is likely to cost us $240,000 for 300,000 copies, nearly a dollar apiece, eighty cents, to be exact; and I venture to say that in two weeks after we are notified that those volumes are to be issued I can buy them for fifteen cents apiece. This volume is to be worth a little more than some of the others, and perhaps the price will rise above the ten cents. If you will explain that in any way that is creditable to members of Congress, you will do more than I can do. I can go and buy the elegant set of volumes reporting the International Exhibition of 1876, a beautifully printed, valuable set, for about half what it cost the Government to print them. In short I might go through the whole list and say the same thing.

We are unquestionably wasting money, and we are unquestionably failing to reach the proper and legitimate and honorable purpose of publication in a large number of these cases. If anybody can give the Printing Committee light on that subject, I am sure we shall be very glad to get it. I see a hundred ways in which there may be money saved, pinching here and there, but it does not reach the great evil, that is, of lavish publications on the part of Congress.

Look at the work right before you here, [exhibiting a pile of bills.] There are, I understand, something like 10,000 different bills printed for the two Houses; 1,900 copies are printed of each bill introduced, upon excellent paper, rather costly paper, better than you find in any one of your newspapers, and as good as you find in most of your books; you can write upon it without blotting; it is in large type; there is a wide space between the lines, so that you may put in your corrections, and a broad margin. You cannot print 1,900 copies of 10,000 bills without making a pretty large bill of expense.

You go into the Departments, and every subordinate officer of any sort of consequence there feels quite at liberty to make up an annual report, to pad it out, and to print a very handsome pamphlet. There ought to be a little more restriction there, it seems to me. I do not know but that we can legislate to provide that there shall be a censor of printing in each Department, a man directly under the orders of the Cabinet officer, and that nothing shall go to the Printing Office without the assent of some responsible man there. In short there are a hundred channels through which this expense is incurred.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DUTIES ON KNIT GOODS.

Mr. PLATT. I ask permission to make a report at this time. The Committee on the Revision of the Laws, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1605) to correct an error in the Revised Statutes of the United States, have directed me to report it back, asking that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of it and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; and I should like to make a statement in relation to the bill.

The object of this bill is to correct an omission in the Revised Statutes relating to the duty upon knit goods. As the law stood before the revision of the statutes the duty on knit goods was twofold, a specific duty of from twenty to fifty cents a pound according to the value of the goods and an ad valorem duty of 35 per cent. The specific duty was to offset the duty on the raw material, and the ad valorem duty was for the benefit of the manufacturer. In revising the statutes the specific duty was left out, so that only the ad valorem duty is levied. The result is that the manufacturer in many instances has to pay more for the duty on raw material than he is protected by the ad valorem duty.

The committee have examined it and are clearly of opinion that it is the result of a pure error, and they would have reported the bill favorably but, that they thought as it related to the tariff it had better come from the Finance Committee; and I venture to express the hope that it may be speedily acted upon by the Finance Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut, from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, reports back Senate bill No. 1605, and asks that that committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The report was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1993) to amend sections 2582, 2583, 2607, and 2684 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the collection districts of California, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 2997) granting right of way to the Fremont, Elk Horn, and Missouri Valley Railroad Company across the Niobrara military reservation in the State of Nebraska, and authorizing the sale of a portion of said reservation, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

FORT MAGINNIS POST.

The following message from the President of the United States was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a letter from the Secretary of War, of the 18th instant, inclosing plans and estimates for the completion of the post of Fort Maginnis, Montana Territory, and recommending an appropriation for the purpose of $25,000, as called for by the estimates.

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

The following message from the President of the United States was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a note addressed by the minister plenipotentiary of Mexico to the Secretary of State, proposing the conclusion of a convention between the two countries for defining the boundary between the United States and Mexico from the Rio Grande westward to the Pacific Ocean by the erection of durable monuments. I also lay before Congress a letter on the same subject, with its accompaniment, from the Secretary of War, to whom the proposition was referred by the Secretary of State for the expression of his views thereon.

I deem it important that the boundary line between the two countries, as defined by existing treaties and already once surveyed, should be run anew and defined by suitable permanent monuments. By so doing uncertainty will be prevented as to jurisdiction in criminal and municipal affairs, and questions be averted which may at any time in the near future arise with the growth of population on the border.

Moreover, I conceive that the willing and speedy assent of the Government of the United States to the proposal thus to determine the existing stipulated boundary with permanence and precision will be in some sense an assurance to Mexico that the unauthorized suspicion which of late years seems to have gained some credence in that republic that the United States covets and seeks to annex neighboring territory is without foundation. That which the United States seeks, and which the definite settlement of the boundary in the proposed manner will promote, is a confiding and friendly feeling between the two nations leading to advantageous commerce and closer commercial relations.

I have to suggest that, in accepting this proposal, suitable provision be made for an adequate military force on the frontier to protect the surveying parties from hostile Indians. The troops so employed will at the same time protect the settlers on the border and help to prevent marauding on both sides by the nomadic Indians.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before putting the motion the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 1572) for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and nine minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 20, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTION OF A BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to offer the following resolution, to which I have no idea there will be objection, and ask its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution to correct an error in the preparation of a bill to provide for the payment of certain claims.

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That in enrolling the bill H. R. No. 3869, an act for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department, the Clerk of the House be directed to omit the following words where they occur on page 77 of said bill as printed: "to R. S. James, administrator of John S. James, deceased, of Henry County, $270," said provision being a duplication of an appropriation in the same words on page 76 of said bill, and both referring to one claim.

Mr. ATKINS. That appears to have been an oversight in printing the bill, and this provides for its correction.

For safety, I desire to have the following telegrams go into the RECORD:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES, April 19, 1882.

To THIRD AUDITOR, Treasury Department:

On pages 76 and 77 of H. R. No. 3869, private claims, an appropriation for R. S.

James, administrator of John S. James, for $270 occurs twice. Is this as it ought to be?

EDWD. McPHERSON,
Clerk House Representatives United States.

To Hon. E. McPHERSON:

R. S. James, administrator of John S. James, for $270, had one claim allowed for that sum. There appears to have been a duplicate entry of the same claim. Please cause one amount to be expunged from bill H. R. No. 3869.

A. M. GANGEWER,
Acting Third Auditor.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EVENING SESSION FOR DEBATE ON TARIFF-COMMISSION BILL.

Mr. KASSON. I beg to present to the House, and ask consent for the adoption of a proposition. Several gentlemen desire to be heard on the tariff-commission bill, and I ask that there be a session of the House this evening at eight o'clock for debate upon the tariff bill only.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I object.

Mr. KASSON. I understood that gentlemen upon the other side of the House had withdrawn their objections.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I did not object before; but I do now.

FREMONT, ELK HORN AND MISSOURI VALLEY RAILROAD.

Mr. VALENTINE. I desire again to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2997) granting right of way to the Fremont, Elk Horn Valley and Missouri River Railroad Company across the Niobrara military reservation, in the State of Nebraska, and authorizing the sale of a portion of said reservation. This is the bill which was cut off from consideration yesterday by a demand for the regular order, made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 2997, and that it be brought before the House for present consideration. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Fremont, Elk-Horn Valley and Missouri River Railroad Company, a corporation duly organized under the laws of the State of Nebraska, are hereby granted the right of way for their said railroad across and through the Niobrara military reservation, located in said State of Nebraska; said right of way to be one hundred feet in width, not to interfere with any buildings or improvements thereon, and the location thereof to be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to sell to said Fremont, Elk-Horn Valley and Missouri River Railroad Company one-half section of land, at a price of not less than $2.50 per acre, for depot and other railroad purposes, to be selected by said company from the wood and timber reserve of said reservation, said land to be devoid of timber: Provided, That the selection of said land for depot purposes shall first be approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. VALENTINE. There are amendments offered by the committee which I desire to have read. They change the bill somewhat, and also change the name of the corporation.

The Clerk read the proposed amendments, as follows:

In line 3, section 2 of the bill, strike out the words "one-half section" and insert the words "forty acres."

In the first and second sections of the bill, after "Elk-Horn," strike out "Valley;" after "Missouri," strike out "river;" and before "railroad," insert "valley."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting right of way to the Fremont, Elk-Horn and Missouri Valley Railroad Company across the Niobrara military reservation in the State of Nebraska, and authorizing the sale of a portion of said reservation."

Mr. HOLMAN. As this bill simply grants the right of way one hundred feet in width, with authority to purchase forty acres of land from the Government, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. DUNNELL. How many parcels of forty acres are purchased?

Mr. VALENTINE. Only one. Those forty acres are considered sufficient for depot purposes.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VALENTINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CALIFORNIA COLLECTION DISTRICT.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1993) to amend sections 2582, 2583, 2607, and 2684 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the collection districts of California, and that it be brought before the House for present consideration.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be reported.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 2582 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2582. There shall be in the State of California four collection districts, as follows:

"First. The district of San Diego; to comprise all the waters and shores of the county of San Diego; in which San Diego, on the Bay of San Diego, shall be the sole port of entry.

"Second. The district of Wilmington; to comprise all the waters and shores of the counties of Santa Barbara, Ventura, Los Angeles, and San Bernardino; in which Wilmington, on the Bay of Wilmington, shall be the sole port of entry, and Santa Barbara a port of delivery.

"Third. The district of San Francisco; to comprise all the waters and shores of the State north of the counties embraced in the second district and south of the county of Humboldt; in which San Francisco shall be the port of entry, and Vallejo a port of delivery.

"Fourth. The district of Humboldt; to comprise all the waters and shores of the counties of Humboldt and Del Norte; in which Eureka, on the Bay of Humboldt, shall be the sole port of entry, and Crescent City a port of delivery."

That section 2583 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2583. There shall be in the collection districts of California the following officers:

"First. In the district of San Diego, a collector, who shall reside at San Diego.

"Second. In the district of Wilmington, a collector, who shall reside at Wilmington; a deputy collector, who shall reside at Wilmington; and one inspector, to be appointed by the collector, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the port of Santa Barbara.

"Third. In the district of San Francisco, a collector, a naval officer, a surveyor, who shall reside at San Francisco; two appraisers, two assistant appraisers, and a special examiner of drugs, medicines, and chemicals; a deputy collector, who shall reside at Vallejo; an inspector at Monterey, an inspector at Sacramento, an inspector at Benicia, and an inspector at Stockton.

"Fourth. In the district of Humboldt, a collector, who shall reside at Eureka; and one inspector, to be appointed by the collector, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the port of Crescent City."

That section 2607 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2607. At the port of Wilmington, in the district of Wilmington, and at the port of San Diego, in the district of San Diego, and at the port of Eureka, in the district of Humboldt, the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to appoint such inspectors, weighers, gaugers, measurers, and other officers as may be necessary for the collection of the revenue of those ports. Also such inspectors as he may deem necessary to enforce the customs laws along the boundary between the Republic of Mexico and the counties of San Diego and San Bernardino."

That section 2684 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2684. The collector of the district of San Diego shall receive a salary of $2,000 a year; the collector of the district of Wilmington shall receive a salary of $3,000 a year, and the deputy collector of said district shall receive a salary of $1,500 a year; and the collector of the district of Humboldt shall receive a salary of $3,000 a year."

Mr. O'NEILL. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I do not care to object if some explanation is given.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If it is understood that gentlemen who may desire to criticise the bill may be heard, I will make no objection.

Mr. BERRY. I desire to make a statement.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. The right to make objection being reserved.

The SPEAKER. The right to object will be reserved.

Mr. BERRY. This is an amendment of certain sections of the Revised Statutes necessary to make the port of Wilmington a port of entry and the port of Eureka a port of entry. All the bill does is to create two new collection districts. That necessitates the appointment of a collector in each of those districts. The bill also constitutes San Luis Obispo a port of delivery, and also Crescent City a port of delivery. The whole scope of the bill is to appoint two new collectors, one deputy, and two new inspectors, making five officers in all.

Mr. PACHECO. It has the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BERRY. Yes; the bill has the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. I wish to say here the port of Eureka is the second port in the State of California. We have more than a thousand miles of coast and have only two ports of entry. This is a port from which there were more than three hundred cargoes passed out and in last year. Thirty of those cargoes were to foreign ports; yet they had to report at the port of San Francisco and then to sail three hundred miles north and enter the port of Eureka. This is absolutely necessary. The bill has been examined by the Committee on Commerce and unanimously reported; and if gentlemen understood the facts of the case they would see there could be no objection to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand the gentleman to say that this is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BERRY. Yes, sir; it is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. I will state also that a bill constituting Wilmington a port of entry has passed the Senate and is now on the Speaker's table.

Mr. HOLMAN. As I understand, there are now two districts.

Mr. BERRY. Yes, sir; two districts.

Mr. HOLMAN. And this increases the number to four?

Mr. BERRY. It does.

Mr. HOLMAN. What effect has it on the present salaries?

Mr. BERRY. The salaries are the same as before. The new collectors will receive a salary of $3,000 each.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do the present two collectors have $3,000?

Mr. BERRY. One has the same salary; the collector of the district of San Francisco has more.

Mr. HOLMAN. By this bill the deputy collector receives a salary of $1,500. Is that the present salary?

Mr. BERRY. Yes.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. The gentleman from California has stated that this is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

I understand the gentleman has the letter of the Secretary, and I ask that it be read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McCOID. I object.

Some time subsequently Mr. McCOID withdrew his objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again submit the question whether there is objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish to know if the proposition is simply to consider the bill.

The SPEAKER. That is the proposition. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Now I call for the reading of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. DUNNELL. Let the report of the committee also be read.

The Clerk read the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 8, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 3d instant, transmitting a copy of House bill No. 76, entitled "A bill to amend sections 2582, 2583, 2607, and 2684 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the collection districts of California," and requesting the views of this Department "as to the propriety of making the port of entry at Wilmington."

In reply I have to respectfully inform you that this Department sees no objection to the passage of the bill referred to.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. T. FOLGER, Secretary.

Hon. M. C. GEORGE, House of Representatives.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill is not recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury as necessary; he simply says that he does not object to it.

Mr. PACHECO. This bill passed the last House, and has been thoroughly investigated by several committees of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Secretary of the Treasury presents no public reasons for this bill.

Mr. PACHECO. He says there is no objection to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. It increases the number of public offices.

Mr. DUNNELL. Let the report be read.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

Mr. REAGAN. Allow me to say in regard to the bill before the House that both of the new ports are recommended by the Treasury Department, and they have the unanimous concurrence of the Committee on Commerce. The port at Wilmington is the transfer of a port from another place; and the one at Eureka is for the accommodation of a long stretch of coast where there is a great deal of local business. The Committee on Commerce had no doubt but both are required, and they have recommended both. I hope the House will pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The report was read, as follows:

This bill, by amending sections 2582, 2583, 2607, and 2684 of Revised Statutes, provides for four collection districts in the State of California.

The existing law and a bill heretofore reported from this committee provide for three districts—San Diego, Wilmington, and San Francisco. This bill makes Eureka, in Humboldt County, a port of entry, and Crescent City, in Del Norte County, a port of delivery.

The Commerce of Eureka, situated on Humboldt Bay, is second in importance in the State of California.

This bay is the only outlet to an immense body of redwood timber, almost inexhaustible in extent; it is also the point of distribution for a very large district of country rich in agricultural and grazing lands and precious metals.

It is estimated that the export values from this port reached a figure of over $2,000,000 for the year 1881, comprising three hundred and ninety-seven cargoes, thirty of which were to foreign ports.

There is springing up an increased demand from Australia, China, South America, Mexico, and other foreign countries, for the redwood lumber of that region. This port is three hundred miles north of San Francisco, which is the nearest port of entry.

We are satisfied that commerce will be facilitated and the interests of that part of the State advanced by the passage of this bill. The Secretary of the Treasury has been consulted in this matter, and has informed the committee that "he sees no reason why the bill should not become a law." We therefore recommend its passage.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. As I understand it this bill is now before the House for consideration.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. And it will soon be submitted to the vote of the House. I rise for the purpose of saying that I shall not be able to vote for this bill, because it creates several new offices, and I should prefer that a bill of this character should have a more deliberate consideration than it can receive at this time. But as it is apparent that we have inaugurated for the remainder of this session this method of passing bills by unanimous consent, in order that it may not be monopolized by a few persons, I shall insist that hereafter the list of members be called, the first on the roll alphabetically being called for the first bill and the last on the roll for the second bill, and so on alternately, so that each member of the House may have it in his power to call up one bill for consideration.

It is apparent that those members known as the watch-dogs of the Treasury have about yielded their objections to the passage of bills by unanimous consent. If so, it is only right and just that every member on this floor shall have the privilege of calling up for consideration, not for passage simply, but calling up for consideration at least one bill.

The other evening, just before the House adjourned, a gentleman called up a bill involving an appropriation of three hundred or four hundred thousand dollars. The bill was not even read, but was put upon its passage and passed by the House. Now I insist that hereafter each member of the House shall have the privilege of calling up at least one bill for consideration. In regard to this bill, as I have already said, I shall vote against it.

Mr. O'NEILL. I desire to offer an amendment to this bill. Before doing so I will say that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is altogether mistaken. I think that if we shall trust to the generosity of our fellow-members on this floor we will, many of us, get bills through by unanimous consent. But if we resort to the roll some of us never will be reached, no matter how long the session may be. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following:

"And the salary of the appraiser of the port of Philadelphia shall hereafter be $5,000 per annum."

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to that amendment.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PACHECO. I object to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. An objection to the amendment is not sufficient; the bill is under consideration.

Mr. HOLMAN. The amendment is not germane to the bill.

Mr. O'NEILL. I do not see why.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is independent legislation, and changes the present existing law.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to sustain the point of order.

Mr. O'NEILL. Of course the Speaker will not rule my amendment out of order. This is a bill in relation to the collection of customs. It does not matter what locality may be affected by this bill. The customs of the country are for the whole country.

Now, my amendment is to raise the salary of a most meritorious officer in the port of Philadelphia, whose salary is less than that of any appraiser in any port in the country except where there are two appraisers. Whenever I can get the opportunity I propose to offer an amendment to put the salary of that officer at $5,000 a year, as it should be.

Mr. PACHECO. This bill relates only to California.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was inclined at first to think that the amendment was subject to the point made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] that it changes existing law. But it is not an amendment to an appropriation bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. But it is an amendment which we have a right to make the point upon that it shall be first considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. But the bill is under consideration in the House by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the amendment is subject to the point of order that it must go to the Committee of the Whole. Every proposition of the kind must go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be obliged to the gentleman from Indiana if he will call attention to the rule upon which he bases his point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. The rule is imperative that every proposition changing existing law and involving expenditures shall go to the Committee of the Whole. This amendment is an independent proposition.

Mr. PACHECO. This bill specifies and designates what sections of the Revised Statutes shall be amended. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] is hardly germane to this bill.

Mr. O'NEILL. I do not wish to interfere with the bill of the gentleman from California; I would prefer to withdraw my amendment rather than have it endanger his bill. But my amendment is proper and germane to the subject of the bill. I desire, while I have this present opportunity, (for I know how few opportunities occur in this House,) to get legislation which is good. Hence I must adhere to my amendment.

Mr. PACHECO. You will kill the bill.

Mr. CANNON. It occurs to me that the gentleman's amendment is not germane and therefore not in order. If this amendment were admissible, then it would be in order for me to offer an amendment to increase the salary of the assessor at Chicago, or for my friend from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] to offer an amendment decreasing the salary of the collector at the port of Philadelphia.

Mr. ROBESON. That is just what I wish to do. I have always held that the salary should be reduced.

Mr. O'NEILL. The amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey would not be in order upon this bill. I am willing to accept the amendment indicated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] as an amendment to my amendment. These poorly paid appraisers of the ports have my sympathy, and I desire that the appraisers at the port of Chicago should have their salaries raised to what they should be.

Mr. BERRY. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the point of order, not now on the merits of the amendment. The gentleman from Indiana will be heard on the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand the Chair to hold that this bill is now before the House for consideration, just as though it had come up in the regular way under the rules. Now there is offered as an amendment an independent proposition, which changes existing law and involves an appropriation. I submit that the point of order upon this proposition, as changing existing law and involving an appropriation, applies to the amendment just as it would have applied to the original bill, if the bill had come before the House for consideration in the usual way.

Mr. O'NEILL. I do not imagine the gentleman from Indiana intends seriously to press this point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, yes, I do.

Mr. O'NEILL. I can hardly suppose that a member who has had so much experience as the gentleman from Indiana can fall into the mistake of believing that the point of order is applicable, as the Speaker has indicated this is not an appropriation bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. It involves an appropriation.

Mr. O'NEILL. And the gentleman must know that it is amendable in any way, provided the proposed amendment is germane to the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The amendment involves an appropriation of money and increased expenditures.

Mr. ROBESON. I have sent to the Clerk's desk an amendment, which will not meet with objection from the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] It is to decrease the salary of the collector of the port of Philadelphia $2,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. O'NEILL. I raise a point of order on the proposition of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON.] This is not a question of decreasing salaries on this bill, but as to increasing them, and the gentleman cannot come in here proposing to add to the bill an amendment to decrease a salary. [Laughter.]

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I desire to inquire whether a motion to lay the amendment on the table would not carry the bill with it?

Mr. PACHECO. Of course it would.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I would like an answer from the Chair.

The SPEAKER. That motion cannot yet be made, because a point of order is pending against the amendment, and it is not yet determined that the amendment is before the House as a proper amendment to the bill. The Chair has indicated that in its view the amendment was not subject to the point that it changed existing law, because that rule applies only to general appropriation bills. But the point is made that this amendment is not germane to the bill; and the further point is raised that the amendment includes a proposition to increase a salary, which would result in requiring a further appropriation of money. Under paragraph 3, of Rule XXIII, this becomes an important question. The Clerk will read that paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

All motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people; all proceedings touching appropriations of money, or bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriation to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, or releasing any liability to the United States for money or property, shall be first considered in a Committee of the Whole, and a point of order under this rule shall be good at any time before the consideration of a bill has commenced.

The SPEAKER. The question of doubt with the Chair is whether this point of order can be made as against a mere amendment, not a bill. But the Chair is inclined to hold that the amendment is not germane to the bill, and therefore rules it out of order.

Mr. O'NEILL. I am very sorry the Speaker has come to that conclusion; but perhaps I am not altogether displeased, as the gentleman from California [Mr. PACHECO] fears that the effect of the amendment would be to defeat his bill in the House. On the contrary, I think my proposition would have strengthened his bill very much, and would have hastened its enactment into a law.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit that the salaries proposed to be paid under this bill are far above the average. I therefore move to amend so as to reduce the salaries of the three collectors, other than the collector at San Francisco, to $2,500 each.

Mr. PACHECO. I shall certainly object to that. The bill proposes to give what has usually been received there.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will please send up his amendment in writing, or indicate it so that the clerks can put it in proper form.

Mr. HOLMAN. My motion is that in the three districts other than the San Francisco district the salary shall be $2,500, instead of $3,000.

Mr. ROBESON. Do I understand the Chair rules my amendment to decrease the salary of the collector of the port of Philadelphia out of order as not germane?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not consider the point of order was made against that amendment.

Mr. O'NEILL. Yes; there is a point of order pending against that amendment made by myself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to hold it is not germane to this bill.

Mr. O'NEILL. It would not be germane to this bill and I have raised the point of order against it. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 65, strike out "3" and insert "2;" so it will read:
"The collector of the district of San Diego shall receive a salary of $2,000 a year."
Line 67, strike out "3" and insert "2;" so it will read:
"The collector of the district of Wilmington shall receive a salary of $2,000."
Line 70, strike out "3" and insert "2;" so it will read:
"The collector of the district of Humboldt shall receive a salary of $2,000 a year."

Mr. HOLMAN. I stated the reduction should be from $3,000 to $2,500 a year.

Mr. BERRY. The Clerk has not read the amendment correctly. Instead of reducing from $3,000 to $2,000 a year, the gentleman from Indiana moves only a reduction from $3,000 to $2,500 a year.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, that is my amendment, that the salary shall be $2,500 instead of $3,000.

Mr. HOLMAN's amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BERRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAROLINE MOTT.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration and action the bill (S. No. 354) for the relief of Mrs. Caroline Mott, administratrix of the estate of Danford Mott.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be paid to Mrs. Caroline Mott, administratrix of the estate of Danford Mott, late of Alburgh, in the State of Vermont, deceased, the sum of $2,707.92 out of any money appropriated for the payment of judgments rendered against the United States; the same being the amount found due and allowed to said Danford Mott in his lifetime by the Court of Claims for expenses incurred in defending a suit brought against him for acts done as an officer of the United States.

Mr. HUBBELL. Has that bill been considered by any committee of this House?

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the right to object until we can know something more about this case.

Mr. GROUT. If the House will listen to a brief statement I am sure there will be no objection. The bill provides for the payment of a judgment rendered by the Court of Claims in 1860 for expenses and costs incident to a suit at law growing out of the seizure of a vessel upon Lake Champlain by a revenue officer for alleged breach of the neutrality laws of 1838.

Mr. HOLMAN. If this is a judgment of the Court of Claims, there is no necessity for making an appropriation for it.

Mr. GROUT. The reason why an appropriation is necessary is this: at that time an appropriation was necessary to pay the judgment of the Court of Claims in every case. When the court was reconstructed in 1863 that became unnecessary, and a certified judgment of the Court of Claims is an appropriation. This is identical with House bill No. 1740, which was examined by the Committee on Claims and reported favorably. It now stands upon the Private Calendar. The sum expressed in the bill is the exact amount for which judgment was rendered in 1860, without the addition of interest, although the House committee in reporting the bill say if there is a case in which interest should be added it is this case.

Mr. HOLMAN. The judgment was by a divided court.

Mr. SPRINGER. I shall object until I have further explanation of this bill.

Mr. GROUT. It may be as said by the gentleman from Indiana, but it is nevertheless a judgment of the Court of Claims, and should be paid.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes; Judge Blackford delivered the dissenting opinion, and the bill never came back from the Committee on Claims. That is my recollection.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, one of the judges of the Court of Claims dissented from the opinion of the rest, but the majority of the court rightfully made the decision the same as other courts determine cases. The decision is right, and the House of Representatives at various times, and at various times the Senate, have passed a bill to pay this claim, but thus far not concurrently. It has been favorably reported as much as half a dozen times, and never adversely so far as I can learn. There is no earthly reason why the demand (which was reduced by the Court of Claims to about one-half its original amount in the judgment rendered there twenty years ago) should not be paid. The man to whom it was awarded has died during its prosecution before Congress, and I think it is a disgrace to the country that a judgment like this, in a poor man's favor, was not paid long ago.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes; I object until I can know more about it.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

PUBLIC BUILDING, FRANKFORT, KENTUCKY.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think I ever asked a personal indulgence of this or any other House of Congress of which I was a member. I now ask unanimous consent to call from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 361 for consideration, and will ask the House to give me one minute to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. No. 361) for a public building at Frankfort, Kentucky.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will state, Mr. Speaker, if the House will permit me, that this bill is a verbatim copy of a bill unanimously reported to this House favorably by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House, and it stands now first upon the Calendar among the public bills. It has been passed by the Senate, a verbatim copy of the House bill. My State, Mr. Speaker, was admitted into the Union in 1792, and from that time until the present it has furnished to the Federal Government, without charge for rent, its Federal court-houses, its Federal clerks' offices, and is so doing to-day. The Federal Government does not own an office or the title to a single foot of ground in the capital of Kentucky. This bill appropriates $100,000 for the purchase of the site, and for the construction of a public building for Government purposes in that city, and it limits the total cost to that amount, which covers the purchase of the site as well as the erection of the building, which appropriation cannot be increased under this system. That being the capital of the State from 1792 until the present time, and having furnished, as I have stated, without rent or charge these offices for clerks of the courts, I think it is only fair and just that this appropriation should be granted for the purpose specified, and in addition to that it will save the Government the rent now being paid for post-offices and internal-revenue collectors' offices, which to-day are being paid for, and which would bring this appropriation within the line of economy. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!" "No objection!"]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill be read subject to objection.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase or otherwise procure a site, which shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than fifty feet, including streets and alleys, and cause to be erected thereon, at the city of Frankfort, in the State of Kentucky, a substantial and commodious public building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use of the Federal courts, the post-office, and internal-revenue and other Government offices located there; the plans and estimates for said building having first been prepared, examined, and approved as required by section 3734 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; said plans to be based upon calculations and specifications that will insure the purchase of the site and completion of the building at a cost not to exceed the sum of $100,000; which said sum is hereby appropriated for the purpose herein named out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That no money to be appropriated for said building shall be used until a valid title to the site selected shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Kentucky shall have ceded to the United States jurisdiction over the same for all purposes during the time the Government shall be or remain the owner thereof, except to enforce the criminal laws of the State, and for the service of civil process therein.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WHITE. There is no objection; on the contrary, the bill ought to pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. Inasmuch as this is the last of this class of bills to be passed by unanimous consent, and with that understanding, that it is the last of its class to be passed by unanimous consent, I shall withdraw the objection.

The bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read by its title a first and second time, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLACKBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RAY. I move to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 1034, to provide for the erection of a public building in the capital of my State, New Hampshire, and ask that the same be put upon its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the regular order.

Mr. RAY. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana as objecting.

Mr. RAY. After having had a bill passed on that side by unanimous consent, I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must insist upon the regular order.

CORRECTION OF THE TITLE OF A BILL.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw the call for a moment so that we may concur in an amendment of the Senate to the title of an important House bill. The text of the bill is not changed.

Mr. HOLMAN. That seems to be a matter of public concern and I shall not object to it.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask that the Senate amendment to the title of the bill (H. R. No. 5221) to amend section 3066 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be concurred in.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let the amended title be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act to amend section 3066 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to the authority to issue warrants.

Mr. KELLEY. I move concurrence in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. URNER. I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts. I am directed by the committee to report the following substitute for the resolution referred to them to appoint a clerk to the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the resolution of April 4, 1882, that the Committee on Woman Suffrage be authorized to employ a clerk during the sessions of Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, respectfully report that they have considered the same and are of opinion that the clerks of committees already in the employment of the House are sufficient in number to perform all the clerical services required by the House, and that an increase of the number is unnecessary. The committee report the following as a substitute for said resolution, and recommend its adoption:

Resolved, That the clerk to the Committee on the Library, in addition to the duties heretofore assigned him, shall also act as clerk to the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. URNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THOMAS B. SHANNON.

Mr. PAGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5890) for the relief of Thomas B. Shannon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

TRANSPORTATION OF DUTIABLE GOODS.

Mr. PAGE, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5891) to amend section 5 of an act entitled "An act to amend the Statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. GORDON.

Mr. HOUSE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5892) for the relief of William H. Gordon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. VALENTINE. I desire to call up a privileged matter. I ask that the bill (H. R. No. 4466) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and that the Senate amendments be printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

BILLS FROM SELECT COMMITTEE ON PAYMENT OF PENSIONS, ETC.

Mr. JOYCE. I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration a resolution which I think will not be objected to by any one when the House hears it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the public bills reported from the Committee on Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay be made the special order for May 11, after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, not to antagonize general appropriation or revenue bills or existing special orders.

Mr. REAGAN. That only refers to public bills, I understand?

Mr. JOYCE. That is all. I have inserted the word "public."

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. JOYCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CALKINS. I rise to a question of the highest privilege. I call up the contested-election case of Lynch vs. Chalmers, from the sixth Mississippi district.

Mr. CARLISLE. I desire to raise the question of consideration upon that case. I wish to state to the House that the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ATHERTON,] who was a member of the sub-committee to whom this case was referred by the Committee on Elections, and who made the report on behalf of the minority of that committee, is absent and sick; and I do not believe there is a gentleman on this side of the House prepared to go on with the discussion of that case to-day. I think, as a matter of justice and fairness to the gentleman from Ohio and to the interests which have been committed to his hands, this case ought not to be taken up until he can have at least a reasonable opportunity to be present and to be heard. Moreover, I think this House, under the arrangement spoken of yesterday morning, ought to go on during the remainder of this week at least with the discussion of the tariff-commission bill. I therefore raise the question of consideration.

Mr. MOULTON. I desire to state to the House very briefly that the Committee on Elections is divided into three sub-committees, and to those sub-committees certain cases were assigned. To the sub-committee of which Judge ATHERTON is a member, being the only Democrat on that sub-committee, the Lynch and Chalmers case was referred. He has had the exclusive control and management of that case, is familiar with all its parts, has examined the evidence and the authorities and made the report, and is very desirous to be present at the discussion of the case. None of the other members of the minority have had the opportunity or time to examine fully this case. We have been constantly engaged in other cases before our respective sub-committees, and it would be great injustice to the contestee and I think to all of us to insist upon taking up that case in the absence of Judge ATHERTON. He will be here on Monday, as I am informed; and after that so far as I know no objection will be raised to the taking up and considering any case that comes up in its order. This, it seems to me, in justice to the committee, in justice to the contestee, and especially in justice to Judge ATHERTON, ought to be conceded by our friends on the other side of the House.

Mr. CALKINS. I will say first, in answer to my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] that no man on either side of the House I am sure will impute to me any desire to be unfair in the consideration of this case or any other. And I will say at once, in reply to the suggestion of my friend from Kentucky, that there is a good reason why the case should not be pressed to a vote in the absence of Judge ATHERTON. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MOULTON,] has also stated a fact in furtherance of what my friend from Kentucky has said, which seems to furnish a good reason for the suggestion that Judge ATHERTON was the only man on the sub-committee who heard the case all the way through and made the report.

Now, I have a proposition to make in furtherance of the suggestion of my friend and colleague on the committee, that Judge ATHERTON will be here on next Monday. I will read a telegram which I have just received from him. I had asked him if he could be here this week. He answers:

Inpossible this week; will come by Monday, or die.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Read the one which came just before that.

Mr. CALKINS. I will.

My physician forbids me to travel.

I got that on yesterday. Now I make this proposition, inasmuch as there are several gentlemen upon this side of the House, and I think on the other, although I am not prepared to speak for them, who desire to make speeches on this case: let the case be called up now, and I will say to my friends on the other side I will not ask a vote until the last of next week.

Mr. HOUSE. That would not be fair, for Mr. ATHERTON would not be present to hear the argument.

Mr. CALKINS. I understand that Mr. ATHERTON will be here on Monday to take charge of his side of the case.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Does the gentleman think it would be fair to have this case argued in the absence of the only man on our side who has examined the case and prepared the report on his side of it, and who has charge of the case?

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman asks me if I think it would be fair?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I do.

Mr. CALKINS. I think this, that the speeches which will be made here to-day and to-morrow—for I do not propose to take Saturday away from the Committee on Ways and Means; the speeches made here to-day and to-morrow will appear in the RECORD, so that every person can become familiar with the line of argument pursued. Therefore it will not be unfair. That is what I actually and honestly think.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Members on the gentleman's side of the House may be in the habit of reading all the speeches in the RECORD; members on our side are not. [Laughter.] We want the case argued under the control of the man who prepared the report. Now if your side of the House cannot see the impropriety of pressing the case to this extent, I suppose if you have the power you will press it.

Mr. CALKINS. I only want to say that this side of the House, so far as I am speaking for it, has shown no disposition to press any case unfairly. They propose simply to present the case to the House.

Mr. MOULTON. It does seem to me that in a spirit of fairness this little extension of time should be allowed. To take up this case now and discuss it in the absence of Mr. ATHERTON, it seems to me would be doing injustice to all parties. Besides, my friends on the other side should be satisfied with the glory which they achieved on yesterday and be willing to rest for a day or two.

I hope my friend from Indiana will not press this case. I do not think the public business will be at all retarded by conceding our reasonable request. For my part I will not be in favor of throwing any obstacles in the way of the consideration of this case when Mr. ATHERTON is here.

Mr. CALKINS. In reply to my friend from Illinois, [Mr. MOULTON,] I will state that if I correctly understand the agreement which was made, and if I am wrong my friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] and my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] will correct me—if I understand the agreement, it is that three days of next week will be given for the general debate on the tariff-commission bill. Those three days, I suppose, will be taken in the early part of the week. Now I do not intend, nor does the Committee on Elections, nor does this side of the House intend, to undertake to crowd out that discussion, because it is a fair understanding arrived at between the parties.

Mr. ANDERSON. An understanding on the part of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. CALKINS. Never mind about that now.

Mr. ANDERSON. But that is a point to be considered.

Mr. CALKINS. I am only stating what I understand the arrangement to be. Now, for the purpose of allowing the discussion on this case to run for two days, and arriving at a vote upon it the latter part of next week, if our friends on the other side think that will give sufficient time for discussion—for I want all these cases discussed fairly—I thought it fair to say that this discussion might run to-day and to-morrow, and then go over until next week.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. We think it would be manifestly unfair to have the case taken up to-day at all.

Mr. CARLISLE. I do not feel disposed to allow the statement made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS,] with reference to the time when the discussion on the tariff-commission bill shall close, to pass without a word of explanation.

I understand the gentleman to say now that it is understood that three days only of next week are to be devoted to the discussion of that bill. I stated yesterday morning distinctly what my understanding was of the partial arrangement made in the Committee on Ways and Means. It was that we should procure from the House all the time possible this week for the discussion of that measure, and then the general debate might be closed at the end of three days' further discussion next week. Of course, if we are to be deprived, as we have been up to this time, of any opportunity to discuss the tariff-commission bill during the present week, we do not understand that there is any agreement which compels the discussion to be closed at the end of three days next week.

I desire to say further, in support of what has been said by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HAMMOND,] that the report in the case which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] is now seeking to call up was received by the members of this House only last Saturday or last Sunday. Now, the record in the case is quite a voluminous one and involves several very difficult and important legal questions which ought to receive the serious consideration of this House.

As to the questions of fact I do not, for my part, propose to undertake to investigate the record in order to come to any conclusion upon them, except so far as to ascertain what questions of law are presented by the testimony. For my own part, (and I believe it is the case with almost, if not quite, every gentleman on this side of the House,) I have had so many other matters to consider and investigate that I have not even read entirely the report of the majority of the committee. I repeat, therefore, my statement, made at the beginning of this discussion, that so far as I know and believe there is not a gentleman on this side of the House who is now prepared to enter upon a discussion of the many important legal questions which appear to be involved in this contested-election case.

Mr. CALKINS. I will yield to my friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to answer the first part of the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE.] So far as the latter part of his remarks is concerned, I am prepared to say that without going beyond the bounds of propriety, in the pressure of public business and in the legitimate control of the public business which must be in the majority side of the House, they have kindly given away to the Committee on Elections that we might, so far as we could to-day and to-morrow, go on with this case.

Now, that committee has certain business before it which it is in honor bound both to the country and to the House to present in good faith. I told gentlemen on the other side that we would take up these cases upon the reports of the committee in the order they were reported; and I have striven, as I think they will bear me out in saying, to call the cases up in their order. If gentlemen on the other side think that this case ought not now to be called up, because of the absence of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ATHERTON,] then I will ask to call up the next case reported and commence its consideration now. I refer to the South Carolina case of Mackey vs. O'Connor.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. In that case the report is not yet printed.

Mr. CALKINS. I have the report on my desk.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. The minority report is still in the Printing Office. I presume the gentleman will not controvert the statement that the minority report is not yet printed.

Mr. CALKINS. If the gentleman has investigated and found the fact to be as he states, of course I do not controvert his statement.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I make the statement on information only. Is not the gentleman's information the same?

Mr. CALKINS. I have no information on the subject. I have the majority report here. The minority report is not with it.

Mr. MOULTON. I prepared the minority report. The proof came to me and was corrected. I gave it to the clerk of the Committee on Elections to send to the printer yesterday morning.

Mr. CALKINS. I will then yield at present to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to bring up the tariff-commission bill. To-morrow morning I will again make an effort to proceed with these election cases, as I think we ought to do. I withdraw the demand for the consideration of the Lynch case, and notify the House that to-morrow morning I will ask to have taken up for consideration the next election case.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say only one word. I am very desirous that there shall be no misapprehension or supposed misapprehension on either side as to our understanding with reference to the debate on the tariff-commission bill. I see myself no essential difference between the understanding expressed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] and my own, except perhaps that he supposed other business would interfere to a less extent this week than I supposed it would. Looking at my memorandum made at the time, I find the understanding was that we were to get what time we could for the discussion of the bill this week, not meaning any forcible antagonism to other public measures, but with due regard to the pressure to which I alluded, and that, whether there should be more or less time for debate this week, there were to be three days of general debate next week; that more would not be asked for general debate. I was also to get such evening sessions as I could this week for the discussion of the subject. The gentleman will bear me witness that I have made efforts in this direction, and objection has not come from that part of the House, which might reasonably be expected to follow our suggestion.

I am very glad that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] has given way to-day that we may proceed with the tariff debate. Before making the motion to go into Committee of the Whole I will ask once more that a recess be taken either at half past four or at five o'clock to-day, the evening session to be devoted to debate only on the tariff-commission bill. I hope there will be no objection to this proposition.

Mr. CARLISLE. I desire to say that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has stated correctly and in terms, I believe, the understanding arrived at by the Committee on Ways and Means; but I submit to the gentleman whether the terms of the agreement did not necessarily imply that we should endeavor to procure as much time as possible this week for the discussion of the tariff-commission bill. The gentleman belongs to the majority side, which can, of course, control the business of the House. The day before yesterday, which those on this side who had made that arrangement thought a proper occasion to get time for this tariff discussion, the gentleman from Iowa, I am sorry to say, did not assist us in that direction, and therefore we did not get all the time we might have obtained this week for the discussion of the subject.

Mr. KASSON. I must say to the gentleman from Kentucky that I did not consider the understanding as involving the obligation to antagonize all other public business which it was understood was liable to come before the House; but I was so careful not to subject myself to any misconstruction that on the occasion to which the gentleman has just referred I declined to vote with my side of the House, allowing the gentleman from Kentucky to get all the assistance he might on either side in antagonism to the proposition then made. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. This discussion has been going on by unanimous consent.

Mr. KASSON. I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess at five o'clock to-day until eight o'clock, the evening session to be devoted to debate on the tariff-commission bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object, unless the evening session is to be for general business.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. KASSON. Then I move simply that the House take a recess at five o'clock to-day until eight o'clock.

Mr. KELLEY. With the understanding that at the evening session we shall go into Committee of the Whole to continue the discussion on the tariff-commission bill, so that to-day and this evening may be given to the subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the House take a recess at five o'clock to-day until eight o'clock, the evening session to be devoted exclusively to the discussion of the tariff-commission bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to that.

Mr. KASSON. My motion is that the House take a recess at five o'clock till eight o'clock this evening.

Mr. SPRINGER. General business to be in order at the evening session as during the day.

The SPEAKER. The order for a recess, if made now, must be by unanimous consent, or the gentleman can reserve his motion until the time the recess is to be taken.

Mr. KASSON. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, which is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. KELLEY. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. KENNA. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not insist on his objection to the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to dispense with the morning hour.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 84, noes 43.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. WHITE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE. On Monday, the 11th of April, a resolution was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and under Rule XXIV that committee is compelled to report within a week. It has not yet reported; and I should like to know whether there is any way to compel that committee to report?

The SPEAKER. The matter is not for the Chair.

Mr. KASSON. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

LEWIS JOHNSON & CO.

Mr. ERRETT, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 4790, a bill (H. R. No. 5893) for the relief of Lewis Johnson & Co.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. FULKERSON also, from the same committee, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 1164) for the relief of Mary C. J. Budlong.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I ask that the bill just reported from the Committee on Pensions be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The bill, with the adverse recommendation, was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JAMES CALER.

Mr. RAY, from the Committee on Claims, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 2845) for the relief of James Caler; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ERNEST F. UNLAND.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee on Claims, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3243) for the relief of Ernest F. Unland; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS PENDING IN TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CHAPMAN, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, as a substitute for House bill No. 3362, a bill (H. R. No. 5899) to authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to consider and pass upon certain claims now pending before them; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN TORREY AND OTHERS.

Mr. GEDDES, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 2535) for the relief of John Torrey, Edward W. Weston, and Charles T. Weston.

Mr. JADWIN. I desire to submit the views of the minority of the committee in that case.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire the case to go on the Private Calendar?

Mr. JADWIN. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The report of the majority and the views of the minority will be printed, and, at the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JADWIN,] the case will go on the Private Calendar.

SETTLERS IN WIND RIVER VALLEY.

Mr. HOOKER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. PENSION LAWS.

Mr. CURTIN, from the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 3920) to amend section 4766, title 57, of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAWK, from the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 1247) to amend pension law; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAWK also, from the same committee, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 1739) to amend section 4702, title 57, of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to pensions; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAWK also, from the same committee, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 3490) granting pensions for injuries received and disabilities incurred in the life-saving, railway mail, and internal-revenue services of the United States; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES SIGNAL SERVICE.

Mr. BAYNE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to House resolution of January 24, 1882, a detailed statement of all items of expenditures of the annual appropriations for the United States Signal Service from the year 1875 to the year 1881, inclusive, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

Mr. STEELE. Those papers were brought here to the House in response to a resolution submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BELTZHOOVER.] The Committee on Expenditures in the War Department did not ask for them.

The SPEAKER. It is solely a matter for the House to determine.

The motion of Mr. BAYNE was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HATCH. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri calls for the regular order, which, as the Chair understands, is the unfinished business coming over from the legislative day of Tuesday.

Mr. KASSON. I want to inquire if that unfinished business is about being concluded, or if debate is to go on?

Mr. HATCH. I think there will be no debate.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I say to the gentlemen there will be debate.

Mr. KASSON. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the tariff-commission bill.

Mr. HATCH. I do not yield the floor for that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the question of consideration could be raised against proceeding with unfinished business at this time.

Mr. KASSON. If the unfinished business is insisted upon, in view of the statement which has been made that it will lead to debate, I must raise the question of consideration, in accordance with the understanding I have had with gentlemen on both sides of the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] insist upon calling up the unfinished business at this time? It will not lose its privilege if it is not called up.

Mr. HATCH. I do not wish to press the unfinished business upon the House, though I think it will take but a few moments to dispose of it. I am certain that the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BURROWS,] after a bare statement of the facts, will not want to make a lengthy discussion upon the subject. I myself do not want to discuss it.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I think it will take some time to dispose of the matter.

Mr. KASSON. I understand that it will not lose its place.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already informed the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] that it will not lose its place as unfinished business if not called up now.

Mr. KASSON. Then, if the gentleman does not insist upon it, I will renew my motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ANDERSON. I desire to make a statement in regard to a special order which was made for the 27th day of March.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks such a statement can be made only by unanimous consent at this time, as the pending motion is undoubtedly in order.

Mr. ANDERSON. As I understand, it would be entirely in order to call up now the special order; that is the reason I desire to make a statement.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the object being to proceed with the consideration of the tariff-commission bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, in the chair.

TARIFF COMMISSION.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of further considering the bill (H. R. No. 2315) to provide for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff and internal-revenue laws, upon which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. TURNER.]

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the masses of the people of this country have felt the unjust oppression of this protective tariff system for many years. They have asked for relief by bills introduced by their Representatives. Some of those bills I had the honor to offer. All of them have been referred, under the rules of this House, to the Committee on Ways and Means, and there they have slept unreported either favorably or unfavorably. All relief has been refused, even a modification in the smallest particular. The clamor for relief has increased until the rumbling of the storm has alarmed even the strongest advocates of this unjust system of taxation, and they have felt the necessity of doing something to appease the wrath of an incensed people who have been robbed of countless millions through a long series of years. They have finally concluded that something must be done, or they would be hurled out of power by the oppressed people. And, sir, what have they offered us? Have they offered to reduce the present tariff or give us the opportunity to do it? No, sir! They have given us the bill under consideration, which is as follows:

A bill to provide for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff and internal-revenue laws.

Be it enacted, &c., That a commission is hereby created to be called the "tariff commission," to consist of nine members.

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint nine commissioners from civil life, one of whom, the first named, shall be the president of the commission. The commissioners shall receive as compensation for their services each at the rate of $10 per day when engaged in active duty, and actual traveling and other necessary expenses. The commission shall have power to employ a stenographer and a messenger; and the foregoing compensation and expenses to be audited and paid by the Secretary of the Treasury out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of said commission to take into consideration and to thoroughly investigate all the various questions relating to the agricultural, commercial, mercantile, manufacturing, mining, and industrial interests of the United States, so far as the same may be necessary to the establishment of a judicious tariff, or a revision of the existing tariff, upon a scale of justice to all interests; and for the purpose of fully examining the matters which may come before it, said commission, in the prosecution of its inquiries, is empowered to visit such different portions and sections of the country as it may deem advisable.

SEC. 4. That the commission shall make to Congress final report of the results of its investigation, and the testimony taken in the course of the same, not later than the first Monday of December, 1882; and it shall cause the testimony taken to be printed from time to time and distributed to members of Congress by the Public Printer, and shall also cause to be printed for the use of Congress 2,000 copies of its final report, together with the testimony.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to provide for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff."

Who are these commissioners to be? What will be their views? From what professions and occupations are they to be selected? Are they to be lawyers or merchants or agriculturists, or are they to be manufacturers? What interests are to be represented on this commission, and in what proportion? Are the consumers who are not interested in manufactories, who constitute the vast majority of our population and who have to pay the enhanced price of everything by reason of this tariff, to be represented, or is it to be composed of manufacturers, and is it to be left to them to say how many millions they will take annually out of the pockets of the people of this country? These are grave and important questions. By the provisions of this bill is there any guarantee given upon these questions? What guarantee is given by this bill that any relief will be given adequate to the demands of a tax-ridden people? None whatever.

Mr. Chairman, in regard to who ought to compose at least a majority of those commissioners, if any are appointed, I will read the opinion expressed in the memorial adopted by a convention of delegates of Pennsylvania, and presented to Congress in 1820, when this tariff system was in its infancy, showing who ought to be the judges of the tariff rates:

If it be asked who are the rightful judges in regard to the expediency and justice of the proposed tariff, it is surely fair to answer that the payers, who constitute a very large majority of the whole nation, are certainly more competent to decide than the expectant receivers, when the only inquiry is, how much of the money of the former shall be paid to the latter, and to what extent it shall be taken, not only without their consent but in opposition both to their entreaties and remonstrances.

Mr. Chairman, why should we delegate the power to a commission to do what it is our imperative duty to do? Are we incompetent? If so we ought to resign and let the people send members here who are competent and who are willing. Not a single good reason has been given why the regular committees of this House, or a select committee of this House and Senate, cannot at once proceed to revise and modify this tariff. Why, then, should we pass this bill when its object is simply delay, as I have said before? Why, sir, after consuming months and it may be years the committee will, I suppose, favor us with some sort of report, what it will be God only knows. And then we will be just where we are to-day, and have the whole revision to make after the loss of time. This is so plain that every fair-minded man must see it, and the honest people who are the sufferers will see it. In the mean time the manufacturers will continue to draw the tribute from the people to add to their enormous wealth. And therefore I said in my first speech that this bill was simply in the nature of an affidavit for the continuance of a bad cause.

My able friend from Ohio, [Mr. McKINLEY,] in referring to this remark, charged that the Democratic party was responsible for the delay in the modification of the tariff. No man knows better than he does why there has been no modification of this iniquitous tariff. I explained it fully in my first speech and shall not repeat it. He knows that whenever an effort has been made to modify this tariff, or to reduce it, that it has been prevented by a solid vote of the Republicans and a few Democrats who voted with them—enough to defeat any reform measure. He knows when I offered an amendment to the rules to put it in the power of a member of this House to force a vote on a bill giving relief or modifying the tariff, that he and his whole party voted against the amendment with a few Democrats and defeated it.

Therefore it is unjust on his part to charge, as he did, that the Democratic party was responsible for a want of revision or modification of the tariff. He knows that a large majority of the Democratic party of this House stand upon the Democratic platform of a revenue tariff, and opposed to a protective tariff; and I hope that some of the Republican members will regard the wants of the people and vote with us for reform, at least in the tariff.

Mr. Chairman, we have had a long debate upon the protective tariff, and, sir, the argument made against this protective system stands to-day unanswered. We have had from the advocates of protection only a rehash of the delusive statements that have been repeated time and again in this House, that this system was to protect "American labor from the pauper labor of Europe and to give us a home market." Have any of their able advocates pretended to show us that the system is just to the masses of the people, to the consumers, who constitute a large majority of the people? Have they shown us any authority in the Constitution for this system? Have they shown us either in the letter or spirit of the Constitution that Congress has the right to tax the masses of the people of this country to benefit manufacturers? That one part of the people should be taxed to benefit another? No, sir. With all their ingenuity they have failed, utterly failed, to establish any of these propositions. They have simply met us with denials without proof, and bold and contradictory assertions, such as we had a specimen of in the speech of a member who stated that he was a manufacturer and knew all about the system.

In one breath they say they must have tariff duties high and in some cases prohibitory, to protect American industry from the competition of the pauper labor of Europe, and in the next they tell us that the tariff cheapens articles manufactured here. Gentlemen have said, among other things, that trace-chains were cheaper here than in England, and the other articles daily used by the farmer referred to by me. If this be true, why do the protective-tariff men object to abolishing the tariff duties? How does it cheapen articles here to impose a high tariff upon them? The argument or rather statement is absurd. The tariff duty enhances the price of every article upon which it is imposed. This fact is well established, as I will show by authority from the States now clamoring for a continuance of this system. The advocates of this bill have left the system, after many speeches, just as it is—nothing but a fraud upon the people; legalized public robbery of the masses for the benefit of the few.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this may seem harsh language; but, sir, I am not the only one who has used it. It has been used by some of the highest courts in the States, and by the Supreme Court in regard to special taxes—imposed upon one class to benefit another, in violation of the Constitution—and I propose to show how conclusive and able are the arguments coming from those States which now clamor for protection, and which have grown rich under this iniquitous system.

Mr. Chairman, I desire now simply to show, in addition to what has been said, that the opposition to this so-called "protective system" has not been confined to the South and West, but, sir, it comes from conventions, boards of trade, and from the best and greatest men in the very States that are now clamoring for a continuance of this unjust system. I hope the Representatives of these States before they vote on this bill will give their attention, and may profit by the views and arguments of the great men and patriots who have represented their States before them, when justice, patriotism, and a veneration for the Constitution of our fathers controlled an avaricious desire for profits not warranted by the Constitution or justice. The Representatives from Massachusetts voted then solid against this unjust system. I hope they may do it again.

Mr. Chairman, I am aware that the advocates for protection will be driven to say these are old arguments. But, sir, this is no answer. The Constitution is the same in this respect that it was then; the eternal principles of justice are the same now that they were then, and the reasons are more forcible to-day than they were then, for they were protesting against a low tariff on but few articles, while now we have a tariff of an average of about 45 per cent., and on about 2,000 articles.

In November, 1820, Mr. Kinsley presented to the Sixteenth Congress a memorial from Belfast, in the State of Maine, protesting against any further protection to the manufacturing interest of the country. In the same year, in the month of December, Mr. Whitman presented to Congress a memorial from a convention of delegates from the agricultural and commercial sections of the State of Maine, assembled at Portland, asking that no such tariff be adopted as was proposed at the former Congress, (which was a low tariff on a few articles,) in which, after presenting an elaborate argument against a protective tariff, they use this language, (see Annals of Sixteenth Congress, page 1495:)

Your memorialists have not been led to these remarks by anything like hostility to the manufacturing interests. They are, on the contrary, decidedly in favor of all reasonable encouragement to promote, uphold, and cherish everything of that kind.

But your memorialists had never dreamed it would ever be considered necessary or proper that all other interests should be made to yield as secondary and tributary to that alone. They are sure this was not the original design of the framers of the Constitution. In that instrument we find nothing about manufactures.

They, however, have pressed into their service an elaborate essay of the celebrated Alexander Hamilton on this subject. They have adopted his principles, but disregard their application. He insisted on the encouragement of manufactures so far as might be consistent with a due regard to commerce and the collection of revenue. The duties now are nearly treble what they were when he wrote, and, on an average, higher by 100 per cent. than he, in the height of his zeal for manufactures, ever recommended.

In the case of iron, the duty on which was not half what it now is, he recommended a diminution, under an idea that it was almost a raw material, necessary in every kind of mechanism; and the same with regard to molasses, which we could ourselves distill. At the time he wrote it was necessary to urge with great vehemence upon the attention of Congress this subject of encouraging manufactures in order to have it attended to, so far as might be compatible with the other great interests of the community. But he could not have foreseen this abuse and perversion of his reasoning. He never could have imagined that the time would come when it would be deemed good policy to make the people pay from 30 to 100 per cent. more for goods to the manufacturer than they might otherwise be bought for of the importing merchant.

Your memorialists believe the duties now imposed on foreign manufactures to be fully adequate to any reasonable demand on the part of the American manufacturer. All the cotton and woolen manufactories which have been providently established and well managed are perfectly satisfied with the present rate of duties. From these we hear no complaint; and they are considerably numerous in the Northern and Eastern States. All such as were established without judgment, without capital, and without the aid of any skill whatever, have, of course, mouldered into ruin. Such it cannot comport with the wisdom or policy of Government to attempt to revive and uphold.

Your memorialists believe that the excitement in favor of manufacturers has had its origin rather in the improvidence and rash enterprise of some of our fellow-citizens than in any well-grounded cause of complaint. It may be that between 1812 and 1815 a state of things existed which induced individuals, in great numbers even, to plunge inconsiderately into extravagant and wild schemes in relation to manufactures. But it does not follow that the Government is, at all hazards, bound to uphold, protect, and save them from ruin.

They close that memorial with the following forcible language:

The situation of this country is in no wise similar to that of Great Britain. We have no surplus population that cannot be retained but by such means. We have vacant territory without limit and almost without price inviting cultivation. There they must manufacture or emigrate. And notwithstanding the utmost of their exertions to find employment for their laboring poor, every seventh individual is a pauper and dependent on charity. In this country, as yet, it is not even every hundredth individual that is a subject of charity, and many centuries may elapse before the proportion will be greater, if this manufacturing mania can be kept within bounds.

The effect of an extraordinary action is to produce reaction. If the manufacturers should now succeed, the consequence will be a deficit in the revenue. A direct tax must ensue, irritation will be produced, and by the time the manufacturers shall have got their great establishments in operation a new tariff will be enacted with a view to revenue solely. When the tariff was settled in 1816 the manufacturers were duly represented. The then Secretary of the Treasury was from the city of Philadelphia, and partook, it is believed, of all the feelings of the people upon this subject. At any rate, he recommended the tariff at that time with an express view to manufactures, and his recommendations, so far as they affected manufactures, in every instance, it is understood, except in relation to iron, were implicitly adopted. At that time the manufacturers, excepting those of iron, were perfectly satisfied, and in 1818, at the instance of the manufacturers, the duty on iron was increased from nine to fifteen dollars per ton. They at the same time requested that the duty of 25 per cent. on cotton and woolen goods, which had been limited to five years, might be made perpetual. In this, also, they were gratified. Your memorialists expected to have heard no more from the manufacturers about further protecting duties. But the stride they are now contemplating is, to your memorialists, truly astonishing. Nothing now will satisfy them short of $25 per ton upon iron, an article necessary in every piece of mechanism; 35 per cent. upon printed books, by way, it may be presumed, of discouraging science; 10 cents per gallon on molasses, to protect the distillers of whisky; 33½ per cent. upon cotton and woolen goods, and so upon other manufactured articles in proportion, and to crown all, cash payment, without credit, for duties!

* * * * * * *

Your memorialists have thus, with the characteristic frankness of fellow-citizens, intimated some of their views and feelings on this all-important subject. Their destinies are in the power of the national Government, on whose wisdom and justice they trust they can rely. It is for Congress to determine whether the great interests of the nation, on which depend its power, its glory, and its resources, shall be sacrificed to the cupidity of a handful of improvident and speculating manufacturers.

Signed by order and in behalf of the convention.

ARTHUR McLELLAN, Chairman.
HENRY CLARKE, Secretary.

PORTLAND, October 19, 1820.

Mr. REED. Allow me to say to the gentleman from Kentucky that we have learned a great deal since then, and have more sense.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I will say to my friend from Maine [Mr. REED] that the principles of justice are eternal; that those principles which were right then are right now. The Constitution is to-day identically the same upon that question that it was then. I hope that he will profit by the views of those patriotic men who have gone before him. [Applause.]

Mr. REED. Oh, they are altogether too dead.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. In the same year another able memorial of a convention of delegates from Pennsylvania, assembled in Philadelphia, was presented to Congress, containing a full review of the protective-tariff system, and showing its injurious effects, part of which I will read, and regret that I cannot read the whole of it, which is as follows:

Once admit that Congress may use the power of taxing imports ad libitum for any other purpose than that of revenue, and you give them, in reality, the power to say to the citizens of these United States—you must devote yourselves to agriculture, commerce, or manufactures, not as you may happen to be inclined, but according to our sovereign will and pleasure. Let it never be forgotten that the question now about to be determined is not so much what may be beneficial to manufacturers, as whether Government has a right to benefit them to the manifest injury both of the agricultural and commercial classes; whether the constitutional provision against taxing exports can be rendered in a great measure nugatory by diminishing at pleasure the value of our exportable commodities through the instrumentality of a tax upon imports; and, finally, whether the direction and employment of individual capital are matters to be regulated and controlled by individual choice or by the will of the national Legislature.

If it be asked who are the rightful judges in regard to the expediency and justice of the proposed tariff, it is surely fair to answer that the payers, who constitute a very large majority of the whole nation, are certainly more competent to decide than the expectant receivers, when the only inquiry is, how much of the money of the former shall be paid to the latter, and to what extent it shall be taken, not only without their consent, but in opposition both to their entreaties and remonstrances. This is the plain, unvarnished state of the case; and let sophists and casuists disguise it as they may, still, whenever it is contemplated, unadorned by the embellishments of geographical parties, and divested of the exaggerations of exclusive interests, it will be seen as a case where, on the one hand, a certain portion only of manufacturers (for very many of them are opposed to it) are importuning the Government to compel all the commercial and agricultural classes to buy their manufactures at enhanced prices or to go without; while, on the other hand, the sons of commerce and agriculture, almost to a man, are begging that they may not be exposed to any such exaction.

I wish that my time would permit me to read this whole memorial, for it presents unanswerable arguments. I wish that it could be read by every man on this continent.

I will now invite the attention of the committee to a unanimous report made by the Committee on Agriculture to the Sixteenth Congress, 1820. The committee was composed of Mr. Forest, of Pennsylvania; Mr. Claggett, of New Hampshire; Mr. Meech, of Vermont; Mr. Richmond, of New York; Mr. Ringold, of Maryland; Mr. Garnett, of Virginia; and Mr. Earle, of South Carolina. That able committee, after an examination of the protective-tariff system, made an elaborate report against the system, from which I will read the following extracts, page 1673, Annals of Congress, same book:

To propose to increase the wealth of the nation by increasing its taxes is enough to revolt the understandings of ordinary men; yet it seems that a mode of doing this has been discovered, and that the whole mystery lies in calling that which was before called tax—tariff. In the opinion of the committee it is the worst kind of tax, carried to the extent that is proposed; and it would be much better to raise a sum of money by direct taxes at once and distribute it in bounties among the manufacturers. We should then escape at least some of the oppressive effects of the system.

And again the committee says:

If the view that has been taken of the manufacturing system be correct, it must not only diminish the amount of national wealth, but must distribute it very unequally. This is by far the worst effect of the two. It taxes one class for the support of another, and, what is worse, taxes the poor for the sake of the rich. It thus produces that inequality which is the bane of republics; for it is, in fact, the influence of the few, or, in other words, aristocracy.

Now, though no just government will interfere by sumptuary laws to restrain the acquisition of wealth and thereby prevent inequality, so neither will any just government, by fostering particular interests at the expense of others, promote inequality. This is the opposite and the worst extreme of sumptuary laws. Nor is the inequality which is produced by the interference of the law by any means as harmless as that which results from different dispositions and different capacities in human beings. While the one may act as a salutary stimulus to industry and its worst qualities are continually neutralized by the alienation and division of property, the other, by creating distrust in the government, produces despair and depresses industry; and the dread of retributive justice, which always accompanies wealth unjustly acquired, so far from giving rise to division of property, inevitably leads to concentration and primogeniture, to legal safeguards, corporations, charters, monopolies, and privileged orders.

The fear that the law which has given may also take away produces the necessity of usurping the law-making power. An alliance between the privileged classes is the inevitable consequence; hence a new accumulation of powers, new pretexts, and new means of oppressing the people. The Government must be rewarded for its protection by an increase of power, patronage, salaries, taxes, and a diminution of responsibility. The various departments of the government will no longer move in their appointed spheres, but usurp each other's authority. The State sovereignties will be merged in the General Government, and the legislative authority in the Executive. Such is the natural consequence of creating separate interests by law; such is the effect of that inequality which is produced by the interference of the law with individual wealth; such the process by which free governments are metamorphosed into aristocracies.

This is true, and we have already realized part of the picture, and I hope we may pause, before we realize the remainder.

Again the committee says, (page 1679, same book:)

It is believed that no candid mind can fail to perceive that the effect of the manufacturing and its kindred systems will be to transfer a great portion of the wealth of the agriculturists to the other classes. If wealth is thus transferred so are the means of education, of knowledge, and consequently of power. This is a subject which demands the serious attention of every agriculturist in the Union.

* * * * * * *

The great influence which the manufacturers, scattered as they will be over the whole face of the country, must acquire, will leave the agriculturists little hope that if they once assent to their system it will ever be revoked. Among the means by which their influence in the Government must be increased, the facility which they must derive from our popular modes of election, of directing the suffrages of the persons they employ, is not the least worthy of consideration.

Passing over those constitutional objections which admit of being urged with great force, that Congress cannot lay taxes but for the purpose of revenue, and that this system is equally incompatible with that part of the Constitution which prescribes uniformity of imposts, and with that which forbids taxes on exportation, they will appeal only to that sacred spirit of justice which we all equally venerate and the authority of which we equally acknowledge; and they ask, in the name of that justice, whether it is possible to believe that the Congress of the United States can, without violating every principle on which our republican system is founded, tax one class of the community for the support of another; whether they can debar a man the use of the faculties he has derived from nature; compel him to abandon an occupation to which he has devoted his life and which he understands and to pursue another which he does not understand; whether it can take away the fruits of one man's industry, earned by the sweat of his brow, and bestow them on another who has not earned them? No legislature, much less a limited one, has any such right.

Those who become parties to government cannot be supposed to agree to any other exactions than such as are necessary to defray its just expenses, and to preserve public order and morals. Even, therefore, if it could be made to appear that the effect of the system would be to augment the whole wealth of the nation, this object could not justify a Legislature in taxing particular classes, without their consent, for the benefit of the whole. The object of government is to secure men in the exercise of their faculties, not to restrain or direct them; to secure them in the full and free enjoyment and control of their property, and not to distribute and regulate it by its own arbitrary will. It never could have entered into the contemplation of the States when they agreed to the Constitution that the General Government had a right by its legislation to change their mutual relations toward each other; to enrich one and impoverish another; to strengthen one and weaken another; and to impair, and perhaps ultimately destroy, the wealth, freedom, and happiness of them all.

The committee concludes its report by the following prophetic words, written in 1820 by those patriotic men representing in part the very country now clamoring for "protection of American industry," (so called:)

The people of these States, like the three great occupations that employ them, are united by the strongest ties of reciprocal interest. They feel a just pride in the inheritance bequeathed to them by their ancestors—their common freedom and glory; and they equally appreciate the blessings which they derive from that union, which is the result of their mutual exertions, and which it is mutually their interest to preserve. But these blessings must be seriously impaired without the cultivation of good-will, and the undeviating exercise of justice toward each other. It is by this means only that the temple of our Union can be cemented and consolidated, and that we can preserve it from the fate which the dissoluble fabrics of other governments have shared.

The committee believe that nothing can have a greater tendency to diminish our confidence in the Government of the Union, and to impair our affection for it, than all those measures which distribute its advantages partially and unequally. They believe that such will pre-eminently be the effect of the manufacturing system as proposed by the tariff bill that has been reported, and they fear that this is only the commencement of the system; not that they attribute any unfriendly designs or impure motives to its friends, but that the same reasoning which has begun the policy will dictate its continuance, and that the unsuccessful issue of every effort will be an argument, not for abandoning it, but for making a new attempt.

Sir, we have seen a verification of this, at this session of Congress, and are witnessing it to-day. Although over half a century has elapsed, although the tariff duties have been doubled and imposed on about 2,000 articles, although the manufactories have grown from infancy to manhood, yet they are trying to prevent a reduction of the tariff duties in every way.

I will now invite the attention of the committee to the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the City of New York against a protective tariff. It was presented to Congress February 9, 1824. I will read a few extracts from it:

The ship-builder, the carpenter, the blacksmith, the ropemaker, the dyer, the hatter, the shoemaker, the saddler, the machinist, with every other class of mechanics, and all the laboring classes of the community are identified with the merchant and the farmer. Their interests cannot be promoted by an enormous duty on hemp, iron, and wool, or by laws which discourage commerce and navigation. They are the great consumers of the country, and it cannot be supposed that a statute which adds to the price of every article of their clothing, of every agricultural implement, every tool used in their various trades, should be acceptable to them, especially if intended to give still further benefits to a class of citizens which has already received its full share of the protection and patronage of Government.

Again in the same memorial they say:

Your memorialists have always believed that the true and legitimate object of taxation is revenue, and that the power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, and imposts," which is given to Congress by the Constitution of the United States, was not granted with the intention, nor will it bear the construction, that it may be so exercised as to cherish and elevate one class at the expense of all the other classes of our citizens. The Constitution imposes on Congress the great duty of "promoting the general welfare." To lay taxes which will operate as prohibitions and restrictions on trade, which will promote exclusive interests at the national expense, which imposes heavy burdens on the many, and gives to the few the benefits of a monopoly, cannot be consistent with that sacred duty.

* * * * * * *

Another feature of the bill before your honorable body is equally partial and impolitic. The Constitution of the United States was instituted, not only to "form a more perfect union," but to "establish justice," and "promote the general welfare." Hence, the burdens on the people should be as equally distributed as possible, and laws which impose taxes having a sectional bearing ought to be carefully avoided. It is well known that, in a number of the States of our Federal Union, there are few or no manufactories, and that the inhabitants of those States are almost exclusively agriculturists. Is it just, is it politic; will it contribute to promote those feelings of common interest, and mutual kindness, on which this Union was founded, and which are its strongest cement, to lay onerous duties on the consumption of the inhabitants of those States in order to establish great workshops in other parts of our country?

* * * * * * *

These sentiments, while they are sincerely entertained, are at the same time perfectly consistent with the opinion that the manufacturer has no more right to the favor and protection of his government than the farmer, the mechanic, the navigator, or the merchant.

* * * * * * *

WILLIAM BAYARD, President.

NEW YORK, January 30, 1824.

This memorial was presented to the Eighteenth Congress, and was a protest against a tariff not half as onerous and unjust as gentlemen are now trying to continue by this bill—by postponing the revision of the tariff.

Mr. WHITE. Does not my colleague suppose that plows are cheaper in his district under the revenue tariff for the last fifty years than they would be had there not been such a tariff?

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I do not think so.

Mr. WHITE. I hope your constituents will read your speech and decide that question for themselves.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I hope so too, and that your constituents may read it also.

I will read an extract from the memorial of the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce, in 1824, that was presented to the Eighteenth Congress. It says:

But, above all, will the influence of the new tariff be prejudicial to the interest of the agricultural States. This interest is one with which your memorialists may be thought to have no intimate concern, since their personal relations are exclusively with commerce; but the wealth, the harmony, the deviations of this great Republic are interesting to all its citizens; and they who wish, as your memorialists do, that it may be perpetual, must wish to see it administered upon principles of impartial justice to all, by which alone its perpetuity can be secured. What will be the effect of a prohibition of foreign merchandise as extensive as that now to be effected but an immediate reduction in value of the labor and capital of the cultivator to the whole extent of the increased price that he must give for the American manufacture? The evil to him is without compensation; the value of his crops he loses precisely to the extent in which the manufacturer gains; he has no means of warding off or breaking the blow. His capital is inconvertible—it is fixed forever in the one employment of agriculture. He cannot participate in the golden harvest of manufactures, if it is to be a golden harvest. His habits, his situation, his working hands, are all unfit for the loom and the spindle. He has heretofore sold for as much as he could and bought for as little as he could and at such markets as he pleased, in the enjoyment of that liberty which was the great end of the Constitution. He is hereafter to buy in one market only, at such prices as a market without foreign competition will charge; and he may sell as he can, when foreign nations shall act upon the principle of taking no more from us than we do from them.

* * * * * * *

They cannot believe that commerce and agriculture are to sink into insignificance, and that manufactures, like Aaron's rod, are to swallow them both up.

I will now read an extract from the remonstrance of the Chamber of Commerce of New Haven, adopted February, 1824, and presented to the Eighteenth Congress:

The tiring and ironing of carts, wagons, plows, and harrows of the Northern farmer, his chains, his hoes, shovels, spades, scythes, &c., are made mostly of foreign iron. He cannot move in winter and no considerable distance in summer unless his horses and oxen are shod with iron and corked with steel. The quantity of foreign iron used in the single item of shoeing horses and oxen in this section of the country is not inconsiderable. Is it not, then, unequal and unjust that the Northern farmer should pay such an enormous tax on iron, which is to him an article of first necessity?

Much of the foreign iron imported into the United States is used in the construction of machinery and in the manufacture of nails. Bar-iron is emphatically a raw material to almost every other manufacturer except the maker of bar-iron. Iron and steel are the chief materials used in all manufactures of hardware and in fabricating the implements used in all mechanical employments. These metals are principally used and are incomparably more expensive than all other materials which are made use of in erecting the machinery employed in manufacturing cotton and woolen goods. In short, almost all tools and a great proportion of all machinery are made of these metals. Encourage other manufactures by affording to every part of the country the greatest facility in obtaining bar-iron and you will create a demand for bar-iron, but discourage other manufactures by making bar-iron scarce and dear and you will, in a great degree, destroy the demand for bar-iron itself.

A very considerable portion of the foreign iron brought into this country is used in ship-building. If such duties are imposed on iron and hemp as will cause these articles to cost nearly twice as much in this country as they cost in other countries, how is the American merchant to compete with the merchants of other countries in building and navigating ships, the former discriminating duty on foreign tonnage being almost entirely abolished?

In answer to all this, the wealthy proprietors of the iron mines in the interior of Pennsylvania will reply and say, indeed they have already said: "Let the New England people come to us for iron to shoe their horses, build their ships, and carry on their manufactures. We own ore enough to make a sufficiency of iron to supply all America, and it is a shame that it should lie dormant. We want an income from it. We will sell them as much ore for $15 or $20 as will make a ton of iron, provided they will come and dig it out of the earth and refine it. Let the eastern people come here and make their iron, or employ somebody to do it. We have a fine productive soil, also, and can supply them with provisions while they are thus employed. In this way a market will be created at home for our surplus produce, and we shall then be rich and independent. Then money will not be sent out of the country to purchase foreign iron and encourage foreign manufactures." This the proprietor of the iron mines in the interior of Pennsylvania calls "a plain practical view of things as they should be." In reply to which your memorialists respectfully ask permission to present a concise view of things as they are.

In the first place, money, to any considerable amount, is not sent out of the country to purchase iron. Ships employed in the Russian trade take from the United States to different ports in Europe fish, rice, and the cheaper kinds of ardent spirits, such as New England rums, whisky, &c., and bring back cargoes of hemp and iron. Thus the labor of the fisherman results in the production of the substantial articles of bar iron; and, in this way, a given quantum of labor produces to the country a much larger quantity of iron than could be produced by the same quantum of labor applied directly to working the ores of our own country. Suppose the fisherman to be equally as skillful and expert in making bar iron as he is in taking fish; even in that case he could catch as many fish in one day as would pay a Russian or a Swede for as much iron as he could himself make in three days. Under these circumstances, can it be a wise regulation which shall compel the fisherman to relinquish his occupation and go to making iron in Pennsylvania, in order that he may drink up the surplus whisky which is made there, instead of exchanging whisky and fish for iron and hemp, especially when it is considered that the exchange will produce to the country at least three times the quantity of iron that could be produced by the labor of the fisherman, aided by the strength of the whisky?

Mr. WHITE. Does my colleague mean to say that there is a class of people in Kentucky who have not got beyond 1824? We are legislating for to-day and not for so long a time ago as that.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. If my colleague cannot understand that the Constitution is the same to-day that it was then, and that what was right then is right to-day, then I cannot take time to convince him now. Let us see what they said in Boston in 1824, and I hope my colleague will listen to it and profit by it.

Mr. Chairman, I come now to a memorable document; exceeded by none in sound logic. A remonstrance, adopted at a meeting in Boston, composed of merchants and agriculturists, on the 17th of August, 1824—which was presented to the Eighteenth Congress, from which I will read a few extracts. (Annals Congress, pages 3086 and 3087, Eighteenth Congress, first session:)

The price of manufactures involves the cost of the raw material, the sum paid the owner of the capital employed in working it, and the wages of the workmen. It is when the last are greatest in proportion to the whole price that industry is best paid and most encouraged.

Machines for multiplying the effects of labor may indeed produce a great profit, but it accrues to the owners of them, not to those employed in managing them. Should any one construct a machine so perfect that it would enable a single hand by merely turning a crank to supply the country with broadcloth, the possessor of this curious piece of mechanism would certainly make a fortune; but the laborer who put it in motion would receive not a cent more than the regular wages for turning a crank. The occupations in which money is laid out for complicated machinery, for lands, buildings, and fixtures, to accumulate the raw material, or the means of converting it to use, or keep on hand a great quantity of the articles manufactured, so as to dispose of them most beneficially in the market, may afford a profitable investment for capital, but have no exclusive nor peculiar tendency to increase the price or the amount of labor. The factory at Waltham tends to raise wages no more than every other establishment, however small its capital, which employs the same number of hands; and it is difficult to conceive a case in which industry or its reward can be increased by turning any number of men from one pursuit to another. The machines and implements for the aid of labor, which can be profitably employed with a very small capital, such as the tools of the mechanic, are most useful to the poor; those which require a large capital, to the rich. The former tend to diffuse wealth, the latter to concentrate it. Which is the most consonant to our institutions and character!

BOSTON RESOLUTIONS DRAWN BY DANIEL WEBSTER.

I will now read the resolutions adopted by that celebrated meeting and presented to Congress, and I invite the attention especially of the members from Massachusetts, and the whole committee. They were drawn and the memorial written by that great man Daniel Webster, and presented by him to Congress.

Resolved, That we have regarded with pleasure the establishment and success of manufactures among us, and consider their growth when natural and spontaneous, and not the effect of a system of bounties and protection, as an evidence of general wealth and prosperity.

Resolved, That, relying on the ingenuity, enterprise, and skill of our fellow-citizens, we believe that all manufactures adapted to our character and circumstances will be introduced and extended as soon and as far as will promote the public interest without any further protection than they now receive.

Resolved, That no objection ought ever to be made to any amount of taxes equally apportioned and imposed for the purpose of raising revenue necessary for the support of Government, but that taxes imposed on the people for the sole benefit of any one class of men are equally inconsistent with the principles of our Constitution and with sound policy.

Resolved, That the supposition that, until the proposed tariff or some similar measure be adopted, we are and shall be dependent on foreigners for the means of subsistence and defense is, in our opinion, altogether fallacious and fanciful and derogatory to the character of the nation.

Resolved, That high bounties on such domestic manufactures as are principally benefited by that tariff favor great capitalists rather than personal industry or the owners of small capitals, and therefore that we do not perceive its tendency to promote national industry.

Resolved, That we are equally incapable of discovering its beneficial effects on agriculture, since the obvious consequence of its adoption would be that the farmer must give more than he now does for all he buys and receive less for all he sells.

Resolved, That the imposition of duties, which are enormous, and deemed by a large portion of the people to be unequal and unjust, is dangerous, as it encourages the practice of smuggling.

Resolved, That in our opinion the proposed tariff and the principles on which it is avowedly founded would, if adopted, have a tendency, however different may be the motives of those who recommend them, to diminish the industry, impede the prosperity, and corrupt the morals of the people.

Mr. Chairman, I am aware that gentlemen on the other side will say that Mr. Webster changed his opinions afterward; but let us look at the facts. In 1820 the convention met and adopted these resolutions drawn by Daniel Webster, and they were presented to Congress. After a lapse of four years, in 1824, they held another convention, and after mature deliberation the convention, one of whom was Daniel Webster, readopted the same memorial and resolutions, and Mr. Webster presented them in 1824. The constitutional provisions and the eternal principles of justice upon which these resolutions were based had not changed from 1820 to 1824, and, sir, candor must force every fair-minded man to admit that they have not changed yet. They were true then—framed by the greatest constitutional lawyer that this country ever produced, and reaffirmed by him four years afterward in one of the ablest speeches he ever made in the United States Senate, in which he used this language in regard to what was the true American policy. I commend this especially to my Republican friends on this floor who talked so much about the "American policy." Mr. Webster said:

Sir, that is the truest American policy which shall most usefully employ American capital and American labor, and best sustain the whole population. With me it is a fundamental axiom, it is interwoven with all my opinions, that the great interests of the country are united and inseparable; that agriculture, commerce, and manufactures will prosper together or languish together; and that all legislation is dangerous which proposes to benefit one of these without looking to consequences which may fall on the other.

And in regard to protecting "American industry" this is what Mr. Webster said, from which it will be seen that he did not regard manufactures as the only "American industry."

Mr. Webster said:

Gentlemen tell us that they are in favor of domestic industry; so am I. They would give it protection; so would I. But then all domestic industry is not confined to manufactures. The employments of agriculture, commerce, and navigation are all branches of the same domestic industry; they all furnish employment for American capital and American labor.

These resolutions and his speech stand to-day recorded in the archives of this Government as monumental evidence of the justice and patriotism of the great mind who drew them—as a beacon-light to guide future generations, and are as true and as forcible as the day they were drawn. And I deny that Mr. Webster ever did change his opinions in regard to these resolutions, for in a debate in the United States Senate as late as 1846, with Mr. McDuffie, Mr. Webster said:

Take it in the broadest sense, and I agree to every word of the resolutions of Faneuil Hall of 1821.

And the resolutions of Faneuil Hall are the ones I have read.

Mr. WHITE. Does not the gentleman think that it comes with a bad grace for a Kentuckian to speak to Massachusetts men about not following the doctrines of Daniel Webster when the gentleman himself, claiming to be a representative Kentuckian, is misrepresenting the sentiment of the majority of the people of his State?

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I think the majority in that State entertain entirely different views from those which my colleague seems to entertain. The large Democratic majority in Kentucky proves it. That, however, is unimportant so far as this argument is concerned.

Mr. Chairman, frequent reference has been made to Mr. Jefferson, General Jackson, and other Democrats, but no Democratic President ever advocated such a tariff as we have to-day, or recognized the principles contended for by the protectionists; and Mr. Clay, of my State, to whom frequent reference has been made in this debate, never advocated such a monstrosity as this tariff, forced upon us in the excitement of a civil war under a false pretense of filling the Treasury. Mr. Clay only advocated a tariff of 20 per cent., to be kept up for a few years to foster manufactories in their infancy. They have grown up to manhood, and, as I said before, the broad ocean across which most of the raw material has to be transported and then brought back to this country gives all the protection these manufacturers ought to have.

Mr. WHITE. Was not that in 1815, and did not Mr. Clay in 1832 and 1842 make speeches expressing diametrically opposite views?

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I do not desire to be interrupted, as my time is limited. My colleague has had ample time to express his views, and I did not interfere with him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposed these interruptions to be acceptable to the gentleman. If they are not he is entitled to proceed without interruption.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I have read these extracts from the protests of Eastern States and refrained from reading any from the Southern States, although they were equally conclusive in the argument against a protective tariff, because I wanted to show that these very States that are now trying to rivet this system, unjust as it is, on the consumers of this great country, and which is especially unjust and oppressive upon the West and South, were at one time, when they were impartial judges, opposed to this system and that these representatives and memorialists used arguments that were unanswerable, against this system, that, too, when the tariff was only 20 per cent. and on fewer articles, and the present tariff 40 per cent. or over. But now, sir, because their interests have changed they attempt to ridicule these very arguments and deny the facts upon which they are based, because they cannot refute them or successfully answer them. These arguments are as true to-day as they were in 1820 and 1824 and apply with more force, as I have said before. We have lived to see the predictions of those pure patriots who opposed this unjust system and who foresaw its ruinous consequences when once fastened on the country, verified after half a century of protection, after receiving countless millions from the farmers and laborers of this country and other consumers, after growing in power and wealth; yet they are not willing to let go their hold, but are determined to oppress the great majority of the people with a tariff system far more unjust and onerous upon the people than the tariffs that they denounced and protested against in 1820 and 1824.

They want by this bill to retard the modification of this tariff, and, sir, they never will let go their hold until the enraged masses of the people rise in their might and send members here who will regard their rights and trample under foot these monopolies that are impoverishing the honest toiling masses of the country. I hope, Mr. Chairman, to see the day, and I do not believe it is far distant, when even-handed justice will be meted out to the farmers, operatives, and other consumers of this country, who ask no exclusive privileges but demand even-handed justice.

Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the committee, I return my thanks for the patience with which you have listened and the attention you have given me.

I append, with the consent of the committee, a table of the tariff duties upon some of the articles upon which a duty is imposed.

	Per cent.
Jewelry	25
Musical instruments	30
Champagne, in pints	47½
Champagne, in quarts, $6 per dozen	50
Still wines, in bottles	32½

Now, let me place against the above what I deem articles of necessity, and see what duty they paid:

Duties paid in 1880, calculated in ad valorem, taken from official returns.

Articles of necessity:	Per cent.
Cleaned rice	95½
Epsom salts	78½
Chicory	103½
Spool thread	76½
Window-glass, common	from 58½ to 73
Band and hoop iron	75
Boiler plates	69
Horseshoe nails	93
Locomotive tires	79½
Steel rails	99
Castor-oil	148
Croton-oil	126
Paris white	240
Balmoral alpaca	91
Blankets, valued at 36½ cents per pound	89½
Woolen hosiery, valued at 60 cents per pound	100½
Bunting, valued at 23 cents per pound	121

The following still further illustrates the point:

Blankets—duty on the cheapest, 90 per cent.; on the dearest, 75 per cent.

Hats—woolen—duty on the cheapest, 84 to 92 per cent.; on the dearest, 63 per cent.

Hosiery—duty on the cheapest, 96 per cent.; on the dearest, 55 per cent.

Dress goods—duty on the cheapest, 70 per cent.; on the dearest, 67 per cent.

Bleached cotton—duty on the cheapest, 47 per cent.; on the dearest, 35 per cent.

Flannel—duty on the cheapest, 89 per cent.; on the dearest, 61 per cent.

The following table presents proof of the prohibitory nature of our tariff, giving the duty collected on the articles named. Many more could be added:

In 1881 the tariff duties produced—
On cut nails and spikes	$127 00
On cut tacks	15 00
On horseshoe nails	20 00
On lead ore	89 00
On screws	4,890 00
On steel wire	1,761 00
On crude oil	1 50
On petroleum	3,403 00
On flannels	1,129 00
On yarn	3,000 00

The following table shows the articles that paid an ad valorem duty of over 80 per cent. and not exceeding 97 per cent., (spirits, wines, tobacco, and perfumery not included:)

	Per cent.
Cleaned rice	95½
Green copperas	83½
Meerschaum pipes	85½
Wood and porcelain pipes	87½
Silver leaf	95½
Horseshoe nails	93½
Squares, not marked	90½
Steel rails	90
Druggets	88
Balmorals	91½
Blankets not over 40 cents per pound	88½
Blankets valued over 60 cents per pound	92
Flannel not over 40 cents per pound	89
Flannel valued over 40 cents, not exceeding 60 cents per pound	91½
Flannel over 60 cents, not over 80 cents per pound	91½
Worsted hosiery valued at 40 cents and not exceeding 60 cents per pound	94
Worsted hosiery valued at 60 cents and not over 80 cents	92
All other woolen goods valued at 40 cents per pound	94
All other woolen goods valued at 40 cents and not over 60 cents per pound	92
All other woolen goods valued over 60 cents and not over 80 cents per pound	89
Woolen hats valued 60 cents and not over 80 cents per pound	88½
Woolen yarns valued not exceeding 40 cents per pound	89½
Woolen yarns valued 40 cents and not over 60 cents per pound	92
Woolen yarns valued 60 cents and not over 80 cents per pound	88

[During the delivery of the remarks of Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky, the following occurred:

The CHAIRMAN. The ten minutes yielded the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I would like to finish my remarks. I will state to the committee that my friend from Maine kindly yielded me ten minutes of his time, although I was on the list and had one hour. I would like to proceed until I have concluded my remarks.

Mr. KASSON. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. Not exceeding my hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say that the present hour is under the control of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. DINGLEY,] who can yield further time to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TURNER] if he desires to do so.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. That was the understanding with my friend when I took the floor.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to reserve the remainder of my hour for myself. I am entirely willing that the gentleman from Kentucky shall proceed. As long as he is upon the list and entitled to an hour, I think perhaps it would be an advantage to allow him to conclude his remarks at this time.

Mr. WHITE. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not consider it necessary to ask unanimous consent for that purpose. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] does not claim his hour now, and the gentleman from Kentucky can proceed with his hour, including the ten minutes yielded him by the gentleman from Maine; and after that the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maine for the fifty minutes remaining of his hour.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will that have the effect of extending the time for general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. It will not.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky, resumed and concluded his remarks.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, when the House was last in committee on the tariff-commission bill, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] charged that protection had driven American shipping from the ocean. To recall this indictment of the protective tariff of 1861, I will ask the Clerk to read that portion of the remarks of the gentleman which refer to the decline of the American foreign carrying trade.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, to our shipping we have given the most ample protection that the loudest clamorer for special privileges could wish. We have forbidden the purchase and registration of ships by Americans from any but American builders. The boast was made that we were going to build up our commerce and carry American products in American bottoms; but after twenty years of this exclusive policy, look at our condition! Our ship-building has run down till it amounts to nothing, and our flag is almost a stranger on the ocean. The protective-tariff policy of the United States was abandoned in 1846, and a tariff for revenue adopted. This policy was maintained till the breaking out of the late war, and under it our shipping interests flourished as they never did before, never have since, and never will again under our present suicidal policy. Then American sails whitened every sea, and the American flag brightened every bay where commerce floated. Beginning in 1846 with a tonnage of 2,562,085 it increased till 1861, when it amounted to 5,539,813 tons, which was the highest figure it ever attained.

From then till now it has gone down, down all the time, although every protective prop that legislation could devise has been brought to its support. This, too, notwithstanding the fact that our wealth, exports, and imports are many times greater than they were then. In 1885 we built in American ship-yards 381 sea-going vessels; in 1856, 396. Under this long protection how does this industry flourish to-day? In 1878, 81 ships were built by us, and in 1879, 37—less than one-tenth of the number built in 1855, when we needed not half so many as now. In 1860, with free ships, 75 per cent. of our exports and imports was carried in American bottoms. In 1881, with protected ships, American vessels only carried 16 per cent. Each year we now pay $120,000,000 to owners of foreign ships for carrying our exports, imports, and passengers. And who gets this immense business? England, with her free ships and free trade, gets eighty-four millions of it, more than twice as much as all the other nations of the world. And why all of this? It is because legislation has interfered with commercial freedom. A statute is on our law books which requires the American desiring to purchase a vessel to go to one of the four or five ship-builders of the United States and pay one-fourth more for it than it would cost in England. In consequence of this, when obtained, the cost is so great that he cannot compete with the Englishman who has purchased more cheaply. One says, let us subsidize our ship lines and enable them to compete. Mr. Chairman, this will not give relief. Let Congress declare commercial freedom by repealing those hampering statutes, and the shackles will fall from our commerce as did Peter's chains at the angel's touch.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am at a loss to understand what the gentleman from Tennessee meant when he said that under the tariff of 1846 we had "free ships" and "commercial freedom," while under the tariff of 1861 American shipping engaged in the foreign carrying trade has had "every protective prop which legislation could devise." If he referred to that provision of our navigation laws which restrict the right of American registry to vessels built in this country, I desire to remind him that in this respect there has been no change in our legislation since the foundation of the Government. Free ships—i. e., the liberty to purchase ships in a foreign market and to put them under the American flag, for which the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] pleaded the other day—were never known in this country.

But this is the only protection which our commercial marine engaged in the foreign carrying trade has had under the tariff of 1861, and precisely the same that it had under the tariff of 1846. What, then, did the gentleman from Tennessee mean when he said that under the tariff of 1861 this great interest has had "every protective prop which legislation could devise?"

Our coastwise carrying trade is efficiently protected by legislation which restricts participation in it to vessels carrying the American flag. Under this protection the tonnage of American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade has increased from 1,797,825 tons in 1850 to 2,646,011 tons in 1881, notwithstanding the unexampled development of our railroad system has inevitably diverted to the land a very large share of the traffic which formerly was served by water. Under the same protection ship-building, so far as it relates to vessels intended for the coast, lake, and river trade, was never more prosperous than it is to-day.

It is only when we turn to our unprotected and unencouraged foreign carrying trade, and the ship-building interests dependent upon it, that we find decline and discouragement in consequence of European competition. While other industries, efficiently protected against such competition by our legislation, are prospering as never before, this one alone is languishing. The partial protection which restricts the right of American registry to vessels carrying the Stars and Stripes, is almost nullified by the practical workings of that system of maritime reciprocity, free trade on the ocean, to which we unwisely committed ourselves long ago. Under this system of free trade in ocean transportation the American ship-builder and the American ship-owner, with higher cost of labor, compete for the foreign carrying trade with the ship-builders and ship-owners of other countries.

If this "commercial freedom," this "free trade," on the ocean which the gentleman from Tennessee invokes on the land, has disastrously resulted to the American merchant marine engaged in the foreign carrying trade, it has only demonstrated what the same system would do for all our domestic industries. It is claimed, however, that if it had not been for our protective tariff we could have built the vessels required for the foreign carrying trade as cheaply as England, as we did up to 1855, and thus would have been able to maintain and even strengthen our position on the ocean.

Before showing the fallacy of this assumption, I desire to call attention to the concession to protection which it involves. Ninety per cent. of the cost of a vessel is in the labor employed in preparing and putting together the timber and ore, and only 10 per cent. is in the raw materials. Obviously nothing could materially reduce the cost of building an American vessel, except a reduction of the wages of the labor required to transmute the raw materials into the form of an ocean monarch. If vessels could be built more cheaply under the revenue tariff which gentlemen seek, it must be because that system would reduce the wages of labor in this country. I am not prepared, and I believe the American people are not prepared, for any policy which will reduce the wages of the American laborer to the European standard.

Gentlemen who argue that the protective tariff of 1861 has made it impossible for us to build ships in competition with England, as we did up to a few years before the breaking out of the rebellion, entirely ignore the fact that the retrograde in ship-building for the foreign carrying trade began soon after 1855, while the tariff of 1846 was in force, and was due to the great change from wood to iron, and sail to steam, through which ocean tonnage was passing. In 1855 there were built in the United States 381 ships and barks of the class employed in foreign tonnage. In 1857 the number declined to 251; in 1858 to 122; in 1859 to 89; and in 1860 to 110. The decline from 1855 to 1859 was more rapid even than since the war, as 96 ships were built in 1866, and in 1878 the number was 81, with a smaller number since. If the world's commerce were carried on in wooden sailing ships to-day, as it was before the war, we could successfully compete now with England in building vessels, as we did in 1855.

The retrograde movement in American ocean tonnage was not due to tariffs, but was contemporaneous with the great change in ocean transportation wrought by the invention and application of the propeller and the compound engine and the use of iron steamships. Gentlemen ignore also the fact that just as this great change began to attract attention in this country we were prevented from taking early measures to adapt ourselves to the new situation by the war of the rebellion bursting upon us and engrossing all our energies.

They conveniently forget, too, that, in addition to the inevitable drawbacks of war, by the aid of England the Anglo-confederate cruisers directly and indirectly swept one-third of our ships from the ocean, and that when peace returned the difficulties which environed us as legacies of the civil war interfered with measures of relief.

Taking advantage of this opportunity, England redoubled her efforts to seize upon the carrying trade of the world, and by means of government encouragement and aid—to which I shall presently refer—she is rapidly accomplishing her object.

Had it not been for this great change in the foreign carrying trad wrought by steam, iron, and English Government aid, re-enforced by the Anglo-confederate cruisers, the United States would have speedily surmounted the drawbacks of civil war, would have gone on increasing her ocean tonnage, and would have to-day had command of the ocean commerce.

The free-ship advocates tell us that, however well we might have stood if it had not been for the great change wrought in the ocean carrying trade while our hands were tied, yet that we must now accept the situation as we find it and either give up any hope of regaining our position as ocean carriers, or at once permit American merchants to buy ships abroad and give them an American register. This proposition, which has been persistently urged by our free-trade friends, and which has stood in the way of the adoption of a broader, wiser, and more statesmanlike remedy for the decline of our ocean shipping, one which would preserve and encourage our ship-building interests as the essential basis of successful commerce, deliberately proposes that the American people give up all idea of building their own ships, at least for ocean commerce.

To be sure, it holds out to the American people the hope that they may continue to build the vessels necessary for the coasting, river, and lake trade. But after we grant to one class of merchants the right to purchase and give an American register to foreign-built ships, it will not be long before merchants engaged in the coasting, lake, and river trade will demand the same privilege. It is doubtful, indeed, whether, as a question of law, a foreign-built ship purchased by an American and given an American register can be excluded from participation in the coastwise as well as the deep-sea commerce of the nation. In my judgment, whenever our free-trade friends carry their point in the direction suggested the death-knell of the American ship-building industry is sounded.

"Well," say some of our free-trade doctrinaires, "what of it? If our capital can be more profitably employed in other directions, it is not better that other nations should build our ships?"

Mr. Chairman, when I am asked "What of it?" in the event that our ship-building interests are ruined, I reply that the injurious results will be so far-reaching that I shrink from contemplating them.

There will be not simply the destruction of one of the most beneficent of our great industries—an industry employing, or that, properly encouraged, would employ hundreds of thousands of skilled workmen, who will be crowded into other industries, where they are not needed. Our free ship friends will also find that by the destruction of our ship-yards they will have made it impossible to retain the control of the commerce which they seek, and at the same time will have struck a serious blow at our commercial if not political independence.

I only repeat the teachings of history when I say that no people ever became a great commercial nation that did not build their own ships. The Egyptians, the Phœnicians, the Greeks, the Italians, the Carthagenians, the Spaniards, and the Dutch held in turn the empire of the sea; but each only so long as they could build their own vessels. When our carrying trade was thrown open to the world by the civil war, England, France, and Germany wanted it; but the former secured it simply because she could and did build her own ships. Experience has shown that the nation which does not build her ships will not long have the ability to buy them after the door is opened. The nation which confesses its inability to devise any policy by which it may build its own ships, and deliberately sends its people into the market to buy of her neighbors, surrenders her independence, and in war places herself at the mercy of those nations which control the ocean.

The free-ship theory has been so persistently pushed in and out of Congress for the last fifteen years that it has not only stood in the way of the adoption of some truly American policy that recognizes the vital importance of preserving and developing our ship-building interests as the essential basis of commercial prosperity but has also antagonized modifications of navigation laws, framed years ago for an altogether different condition of things, in directions that are necessary to make it possible to successfully run American ships in competition with foreign vessels after they are built. The free-ship remedy entirely overlooks the fact that the American carrying trade suffers less from the alleged excessive first cost of American vessels than it does from the larger expense of running them after they are launched. I have already stated that a first-class oak sailing vessel can be built as cheaply on the coast of Maine as anywhere in the world.

During the last year one hundred and eleven of the finest wooden sailing vessels ever launched, with a tonnage of 58,992 tons, were built on the Maine coast; fifty-five of them in the collection district of Bath, in the district which I represent. Eighteen of these were ships and barks for the foreign carrying trade. If these ships could be run as cheaply after they are built as the ships of other nations, our ship-builders would have their orders doubled and quadrupled within a few years. For, in spite of the furore for iron ships, I am confident that first-class oak sailing vessels are to retain their preeminence where freight is bulky and special despatch is not essential. The large number of iron sailing vessels that have foundered and become a total loss the past year has already caused a reaction, and there is again an inquiry for the first-class oak ships which are built on the Maine coast. Even last year two-fifths of the exports and imports of this country were carried in sailing ships.

But I recognize the fact that whoever commands the ocean carrying trade must depend more upon iron steamships than sailing vessels. According to a statement of Mr. John Roach, the eminent ship-builder, iron steamships can to-day be built in this country at a cost of not more than 15 per cent. in excess of what they can be built for on the Clyde, and that excess all goes to labor. If American iron steamships and sailing vessels could be run as cheaply as foreign vessels, the 15 per cent. extra first cost of the former, which is less than 1 per cent. per annum would not stand in the way of their employment in the foreign carrying trade. What American who had bought foreign-built iron vessels would put them under the American flag, when by so doing he would make the taxes and running expenses much larger than they would be if he kept them under the English flag? The free-ship programme, therefore, would destroy our ship-building interest, and at the same time would not increase the number of steamships carrying the American flag.

Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Tennessee point out a single one of the "protective props which," according to him, "legislation has devised" to aid the American ship-owner in competing for ocean transportation with British vessels? Not a single one has been devised on our part, while England has built up the most elaborate system of protection and encouragement to enable her ship-owners to successfully compete with the world.

Mr. McMILLIN. If my friend will permit me——

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not wish to have the interruption taken out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that whatever interruption is made will come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then I must ask the gentleman to take his own time to reply.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will say that every bit of the iron that goes into the ship is protected.

Mr. DINGLEY. What I am talking about is the running of American ships after they are built. The gentleman has said that even in that connection we have given protection; and I ask him to state in what respect.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the gentleman will permit me to do what he calls on me to do, I will answer him. An American citizen, if I understand the shipping laws, has to buy ships that are built in the United States, or else he cannot have them registered as American vessels.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am speaking about the running of the ships after they are built. Please confine yourself to that.

Mr. McMILLIN. I go back further and show that everything entering into the construction of an American vessel is protected.

Mr. DINGLEY. But I am speaking of the running of the ships after they are built.

Mr. McMILLIN. The expense of doing the carrying trade is made up of various items, one of which is the original cost of the vessel. If you have to pay 25 per cent. more originally for an American-built vessel than you would have to pay for one of English construction, that is a burden on your shipping all the time.

Mr. DINGLEY. But remember, the cost of wooden sailing vessels such as we used before the war is to-day no more, proportionately, than it was then. We can compete with the world in building the same class of vessels now that we built before the war.

Mr. McMILLIN. But even the sails on your sailing-vessels are protected by a high tariff duty. The gentleman will not deny that.

Mr. DINGLEY. While England has built up a most elaborate system of protection and encouragement for her own shipping, we have not only avoided the protection and encouragement of American shipping under the influence of free-trade teachings but we have also neglected to modify our navigation laws so as to remove burdens on the running of vessels which England has removed from her shipping. Let me enumerate some of these burdens which practically discriminate against the American marine engaged in the foreign carrying trade.

Under an old law, enacted at a time when the sailors of our merchant marine were all Americans and recourse to the law infrequent, an American ship which discharges any seaman in a foreign port is required to pay him three months' extra wages—a burden imposed on the ships of no other nation. The sailor may have been aboard but fifteen days; his discharge may have been for misconduct or at his own request; he may be at the port where he lives, or within a few hours' ride; no matter; if his wages are $40 per month the ship must pay $120. And the ship does not pay the money to the sailor but to the United States consul at the port, who, after deducting a liberal fee, pays the balance to the sailor. Indeed, it appears from the official reports that last year over $30,000 of the three months' extra wages exacted from American shipping went into the Federal Treasury. This law has been shamefully abused by men who have incited sailors to leave the ship in order to get hold of the lion's share of the three months' extra wages.

Is this law one of the "protective props which," according to the gentleman from Tennessee, legislation has devised for the encouragement of American shipping?

2. Under the English consular regulations, all services by consuls to English shipping in foreign ports are rendered without charge, the English Government paying her consuls for this service from her own treasury. Under our laws consuls are practically paid by fees exacted of American ships and American merchants. Indeed, it has been made a subject of congratulation that the American consular service, costing $873,229 last year, was not only self-supporting, i. e., supported by such fees, but actually paid a profit of $25,243 into the Treasury.

In the same period England appropriated over $1,000,000 from her treasury to support her consular service, a service which is maintained in every part of the world almost exclusively to aid British shipping and extend British commerce.

And yet the gentleman from Tennessee asserts that we have given to our shipping "the most ample protection that the loudest clamorer for special privileges could wish," while England has left hers to stand alone!

3. Under our system of measurement of vessels the American ship pays one-third more tonnage and other dues than the competing British ship. British measurement includes only that part of the ship's space to be actually occupied by cargo. American measurement includes not only this but also the room occupied by the ship's engines, boilers, and machinery, and the quarters of the crew. Thus a British ship has a registered tonnage one-third less than an American ship of equal freight capacity, and therefore pays one-third less tonnage, light and harbor dues, wharfage, and other charges. As a ship's tonnage means, or should mean, its capacity for freight, is it not time that our laws relating to measurement should be modified so as to not discriminate against American shipping?

Is this another of the "protective props" to which the gentleman from Tennessee referred?

4. The requirements of existing laws as to life-saving apparatus and other fittings of vessels are greater than the requirements of English laws. Either our own requirements should be reduced to the level of English vessels, or else all foreign vessels entering the ports of the United States should be required to come up to our standard in these particulars.

5. We impose compulsory pilotage, or a half pilotage, penalty on American vessels approaching our harbors, notwithstanding their captains or mates are usually perfectly competent to guide our vessels into port.

6. Our laws require that all American vessels shall transport and provide for wrecked sailors for the uniform price of $10 each, regardless of distance or cost, at Government expense. Frequently it costs American vessels several times this amount for rations alone.

Are these some of the "protective props" to which reference was made?

7. Every seaman of an American vessel is required by our laws to pay a hospital tax of forty cents per month, while no such charge is imposed upon the seamen of English vessels. The English Government makes appropriations from its own treasury to support hospitals. As the imposition of the hospital tax on sailors inevitably results in increasing the wages of seamen of American vessels to the extent of this duty, it places American shipping at a disadvantage in competing with English competitors.

Is this another of the "protective props?"

8. There is not a single official service done or official paper issued to an American vessel in either the foreign or coastwise trade in which the fee is not larger than that charged an English ship under British laws.

We even discriminate against American shipping engaged in the foreign trade, which are nearly all sailing vessels, by giving to steamships, mainly foreign, special privileges in discharging cargo, in order to save time and expense, while our laws withhold the same privileges from American sailing vessels competing with English steamships.

We have also discriminated against American sailing vessels by imposing the tonnage tax annually instead of on each entry, thus making the tax on American sailing vessels four times as large as on English steamships in proportion to business done.

Is this "the most ample protection" described by the gentleman from Tennessee?

The application of the principle of protection to our shipping interests would give a rebate of tonnage tax to American shipping instead of a practical discrimination against it.

9. The English ship engaged in the foreign carrying trade takes her own supplies out of bond duty free. The American ship, though compelled to compete with the British ship on the ocean, is required to buy imported supplies without relief from duties.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is where your tariff begins to work the other way.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is where the law should be changed so as to conform to the protective idea. The present law is in accordance with the free-trade idea. Change it to accord with the protective system and then American shipping would be protected.

10. There is no limit to the liability of the American ship-owner for damages. By the laws of England the liability of each part owner is limited to the value of his individual interest in the vessel, and the total liability of all the owners is limited to the value of the vessel at the time of an accident. If we are to compete with England on the ocean we must hasten to modify our laws as England did some time ago, so as to impose no unnecessary burdens on the American ship-owner.

11. American vessels engaged in the foreign carrying trade are unjustly discriminated against in the compensation awarded them for transporting the mails. Our domestic mails are carried by coast and river steamers, railroad and other carriers at rates of compensation fixed by contract, satisfactory to the carrier and always profitable. On the other hand our foreign mails are carried by our ships under compulsion of law, at inadequate rates arbitrarily fixed by Government, and which never exceed the postage on the matter carried. The pay for the former in 1880 averaged 57½ cents per mile; that of the latter only 2½ cents per mile.

While England—yes, free-trade England—is encouraging her foreign steamship lines by generous appropriations for carrying the mails—so generous that they are practically subsidies—we are refusing to pay ours enough to defray the actual cost. Is this one of the "protective props" referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee?

12. But it is in the important item of taxation under State authority that American shipping engaged in the foreign carrying trade is most seriously weighted in competing with English vessels. The English system of taxing income and not invested capital makes taxation bear lightly on shipping, and acts as a bounty to English commerce. An English steamship worth $500,000 and earning 7 per cent., or $35,000 annually, pays an income tax of 1 per cent., or only $350. The same steamship, owned by an American residing in an American city, would be taxed 2 per cent. on its value, or $10,000. Excess of American over English tax on such a steamship, $6,500, and that, too, when taxation per capita is greater in England than in this country. It is gratifying to note that one or two States have already taken hold of this matter of taxation and afforded relief. When that shall universally be done we may congratulate ourselves that we have at least given one "protective prop" to our shipping interests.

The points to which I have called attention are all directions in which we are neglecting to extend the protection and encouragement which free-trade England is extending to her shipping interests. Gentlemen who imagine that England is leaving her merchant marine to struggle for commercial supremacy unaided and unprotected make a great mistake; greater even than that which they make when they assume that we have devised "protective props" to our shipping interests. The Government of England, and more recently those of France and Germany, have taken hold of the shipping question as vital to their national prosperity, and have extended to their marine engaged in the foreign carrying trade most liberal aid.

Among other measures of encouragement to iron-ship building, at a time when we were handicapped by a civil war, England gave the construction of three-fourths of the war-vessels and marine engines required for her navy to private ship-yards at profitable rates. From 1874 to 1879 England paid over $50,000,000 to these ship-yards for the construction and repair of her naval vessels.

Finding that it was necessary to locate her iron-ship yards near her coal fields and iron mines, the English Government paid by a remittance of tonnage dues the $10,000,000 required to dredge and widen the Clyde, so that this inconsiderable stream might become the site of the great ship-yards of the world.

And, most important of all, England gave her foreign steamship lines contracts for carrying the mails at fabulous rates, equivalent to an annual subsidy of between $4,000,000 and $6,000,000.

Beyond this direct encouragement and protection, England has established a board of trade whose president is a member of the cabinet, charged with the special duty of devising ways and means to aid her merchant marine and commerce. Under the advice of the board of trade Parliament has so modified the English navigation laws as to form a complete system of protection and encouragement, the farthest possible from the "let-alone" policy advocated by our free-trade doctrinaires.

On the other hand the navigation laws of the United States remain substantially as they existed before England entered upon such comprehensive measures to extend her foreign commerce and increase her foreign carrying trade. Instead of encouraging we continue the imposition of old burdens which have become discriminating in the changed condition of ocean commerce. While we have created special departments or bureaus to take in charge most other national interests, our commercial marine, especially that engaged in the foreign carrying trade, is left to take care of itself in competition with the merchant marine of England, encouraged, protected, and made the special care of the British Government.

Under such circumstances it is a surprise that our unprotected and neglected marine engaged in foreign commerce has maintained its position as well as it has.

Obviously, the only measures of relief that can overcome the difficulties encountered by American shipping are not free ships and an abandonment of our ship-yards. That would be suicide. But a resolute maintenance of our ship-building interests as the basis of commercial prosperity; and then the same measures of relief and encouragement in the running of American vessels that England extends to her foreign shipping.

The efforts of England to control the ocean carrying trade ought to arouse the American Congress and people to the importance of our shipping interests. This is a question which affects the interior as much as the seaboard, the West as much as the East, the South as much as the North. It is not a local but a national question. It involves the inquiry as to whether we will save to our own people the ship-building industry, which employs tens of thousands of workmen and distributes millions of dollars; whether we shall retain a due share of the $100,000,000 which we annually pay for ocean transportation, with all the avenues of employment which it would open; whether we shall open up wider markets for American products in China, Japan, South America, and the Orient. It covers more than the material interests of the nation, great as these are. It involves questions affecting our commercial independence, our standing and influence as a nation, and even our national security. No nation ever maintained its national importance after it ceased to be a great commercial nation.

To-day our commerce is largely dependent on foreign ships—so dependent that a war in Europe would be more disastrous to us than to the belligerents themselves.

The eyes of the country are turned to the defenseless condition of our coasts in consequence of the weakness of our Navy, for it is an accepted military axiom that whatever nations command the ocean will command the coasts of countries adjacent. But a powerful navy is the offspring of a great merchant marine. Look over the nations of the world and it will be found that navies rise and fall with their merchant marine. Great navies, it has been well said, are never built in navy-yards. The United States have eight navy-yards and almost no navy. England has only three navy-yards and the strongest navy in the world. Only 19 per cent. of her vessels and marine engines were built in navy-yards, and 81 per cent. in private ship-yards. The fleet of English merchant iron steamships, subject to government orders in case of war, in return for the aid they receive, is in itself an effective naval force. The development of our merchant marine is the cheapest, most effective, and most beneficent policy of national defense.

Mr. Chairman, important as are many other questions before this Congress I hold that not one of them is of greater importance and of more far-reaching consequences than this. We are already a Republic of more than fifty millions, and increasing in population and wealth at a rate never before known in the history of any other nation. In 1890 our population will reach sixty-five millions, and in 1910 it will reach one hundred millions, provided we are true to ourselves and our destiny. But unless all history is misleading we cannot hope to retain our present advantages or to extend our prestige as a nation, unless by an efficient system of protection and encouragement we hold and strengthen our position on the sea as we have on the land. As has been well said, the throne of empire rests no less on the rocking waves than on the solid land.

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks, when Mr. DINGLEY's time had expired,

Mr. RUSSELL said: I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I hope that will be agreed to.

There being no objection, Mr. DINGLEY resumed and concluded his remarks.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, this bill does not come to us as the deliberate, the free, and the conscientious judgment of the committee having the subject in charge, but comes before us as an edict of King Caucus.

It should more properly be in the care of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] as the chairman of the Republican caucus, than of a member of the Committee on Ways and Means. Those who vote in favor of it will aid in enacting into forms of law the mandate of a secret conclave which has no legal existence—it is extra-constitutional; but, sir, it is a body more potent in legislation when Congress is under the control of the Republican party than the will of the people and all other legitimate influences combined.

THE TYRANNY OF CAUCUS RULE.

It is a most tyrannical and irreverent body. Its members are forced to surrender their independence and their convictions; yea, they are compelled to sever their allegiance to their constituents. Other political parties have had caucuses, but they were mainly intended to harmonize differences of opinion regarding policy on political questions. This caucus under which we are now operating has arrogated to itself the power of dictation upon questions of conscience, of finance, and of taxation. It permits no freedom of action on the part of any of its members, no matter how young or old they may be, no matter how wise or unwise they are, no matter what their experience and service has been. It binds the Speaker as well as the humblest member. Its power invades the committee-room, deposes the chairman, and usurps all the powers and privileges of the committee. We had a most startling exhibition of the despotism of this invisible power the other day, and a humiliating confession of its potency on this floor. The oldest member of this House in consecutive length of service, a venerable and venerated gentleman, the ablest exponent and advocate of the doctrines of his party to be found in this Hall, the chairman of the most important committee, next in rank to the Speaker himself, yet stronger than the Speaker, because he holds the position of leader of his party in this Chamber—this distinguished statesman, eminent political economist and party leader, differed upon a question of political economy with a majority of the politicians who formed that caucus; differed with them in regard to a subject of which he mainly has charge as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. Straightway did they proceed to discipline him, and strip him of his freedom as a Representative, and force him to represent his people, not according to the dictates of his convictions, not as he believed their interests demanded, but according to the will and designs of the caucus. Of course I do not undertake to state the proceedings of the caucus, for they occurred under lock and key, behind guarded doors, and by gas-light, and no member of the conclave dare make known its action; but enough of its secrets have leaked out on this floor to warrant the remarks I am making.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman will permit me to say that the tariff-commission bill was not under discussion in the caucus to which he refers, and is not an outcome of that caucus, but is a Democratic measure proposed by a Democratic Senator to a Democratic Senate, and sent by that Senate to this Chamber. It never was alluded to in that caucus, so far as I know; and when I come to speak on it I shall speak of it as it is—a Democratic measure.

Mr. CARLISLE. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] will do that Democratic Senator the justice to say that this bill is neither identically the same nor the same in substance as the one passed by the Senate. The gentleman himself voted in committee to strike out one of the features of the Senate bill.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit me a moment——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield for this colloquy?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. The tariff-commission bill presented to this House by two gentlemen in the early weeks of this session was the printed Senate bill taken from the files. Both copies came to the Committee on Ways and Means. One was considered; and from it, on my motion, was stricken one clause found in one line of the Democratic Senate bill for a tariff commission.

Mr. CARLISLE. That was the clause in regard to the revision of the internal-revenue laws.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir; in relation to internal taxes. As for the action of the Republican caucus on the tax bill, I will say to my friend from Illinois that, like him, I agree with my party when I cannot rule it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. So then it is admitted that it is not a Senate bill or a Democratic measure. But I would not do injustice to any man, least of all my venerable friend from Pennsylvania, for notwithstanding he is in my opinion wrong, yet I have no doubt he is conscientious, and I respect him for his zeal, energy, and learning. Therefore, sir, I will let him speak for himself. I will read an extract from the remarks made by that gentleman, made upon this floor, justifying the position that I have taken, that this bill is not the result of a free, deliberate, conscientious action of a committee of this House, but is the fiat of a tyrannical, despotical, political caucus.

On the 10th of this month the gentleman from Pennsylvania used this language:

> I desire to say, sir, with emphasis, that from the time I acquiesced in the conclusion of the Republican caucus I have not for an instant contemplated proposing any amendment to the committee's bill in the way of reducing taxes on spirits, tobacco, or malt liquors. I ask that it be noticed that I use the word "acquiesced." The bill of the sub-Committee on Ways and Means, which was about to be reported, commanded my approval; its provisions were in harmony with opinions I have frequently expressed during the last fourteen years on this floor upon the lecture-stand, and in political campaigns. I believe the conclusion of the committee to have been more judicious and wholesome than that arrived at by the caucus. But, sir, I am here as a Republican; I hold the position of chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means because I was regarded as a representative of the prevalent sentiment of the Republican party on the questions to be submitted to that committee. When I found that the party believed that at least for the time my views were not judicious, I did not abandon my convictions but acquiesced in the conclusion of an almost unanimous majority of the caucus.
> This action may bring reproach upon me for inconsistency, for want of courage, for failure to enforce my own convictions. Be it so. I shall not complain.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

These remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which are applauded upon that side, are an indication to my mind at least that they are prepared to sink their allegience to their constituents, to forget their duty to their country, and yield obedience to the command of a secret conclave known as a Republican party caucus. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I shall not comment further on these remarks lest I be accused of unkindness and disagreeable personality.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does not the gentleman from Illinois know that the tariff-commission bill before the House was reported by the Ways and Means Committee before that caucus was held?

Mr. TOWNSHEND of Illinois. I have not the time now to engage in debate as to the priority of this mandate of the Republican caucus and the action of the Committee on Ways and Means on this bill.

I have simply attempted to show that the leader of the Republican party upon this floor, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman to some extent having the bill in charge, declared before this House and the country that he threw his convictions to the winds, that he abandoned a more wholesome measure and accepted in lieu thereof the behest of the secret caucus of the Republican party, and this he does not deny in his colloquy with me to-day. I have only done my duty in this connection when I call the attention of the House and country to the fact that this bill is the product of a political caucus. But before passing from it let me inquire how many Republicans are here who will assert their freedom, manhood, and courage by serving the best interest of their constituents and disobey the edict of that caucus; and also let me inquire how many Democrats on this floor intend to yield their assent to the command of that caucus? The final vote on this bill will answer my inquiries.

OPPRESSIVE TAXATION.

Mr. Chairman, the tariff which has been in force for nearly twenty years is the most oppressive system of taxation which has ever been legalized in any civilized country. By it the people are oppressively taxed, not for the support of the Government, but to enrich a privileged class. Its effect is to create an aristocracy of the few and a serfdom of the many. It was born of the late war, a war which emancipated the blacks from bondage to southern masters, but which has enslaved white and black to avaricious northern masters whose oppression is felt in every household. It grinds and robs the people. Its chief aim and principle is that the industry of one class shall receive bounty from every other. It is violative of the Constitution, which confers no power on Congress to levy taxes for any other purpose than to procure revenue for the Government. The suffering victims of this monstrous system of fraud and injustice have for years appealed to their Representatives in Congress for relief, but their appeals have fallen upon stony hearts and unheeding ears. Shrewd politicians have availed themselves of the most cunning tricks to avert an alignment of political parties upon a square issue over this question. While one of the parties has always boldly proclaimed itself in opposition to this iniquitous system, the other has, until of late, cowardly dodged the issue and has by vague and equivocal language avoided a direct and open expression of its position, and by raising false issues and pandering to prejudice and passion misled and confused the people; while the tariff robber has pillaged them, and from the spoils wrung from the toiling masses the monopolists have furnished a campaign fund to maintain the dominance of the Republican party in the Government.

The protectionists dare not even yet meet the issue openly and squarely either in the Halls of Congress or before the people. They have resorted to every device and trick their cunning could devise to prevent agitation or action. Of course as long as the Republican party has a majority in Congress or controls the Executive Departments they know full well that their scheme of plunder and extortion will not be interfered with. But in the last Congress a majority appeared in these Halls which favored relief of the people from onerous exactions, and high hopes were entertained that the time was at hand when Congress at least would be mindful of the interest of the masses and endeavor to break the grasp of the tariff monopolists upon the earnings of labor and the welfare of the people; but all who were here then will remember how sadly their hopes were blasted. It was discovered that a majority of the committee usually having charge of such legislation were unexpectedly and strangely enough favorable to the designs of protectionists. They established a blockade around that committee which vigilantly guarded against the emanation therefrom of any measure favorable to the masses, but which demanded that all bills bearing on the revenue should be consigned to it. Those entering there seeking tariff reform, however, knew, as did those who entered Dante's Inferno, that they should abandon hope.

The Republican party, under the leadership of the advocates of monopoly, then resorted to filibustering and other revolutionary methods, not only to prevent any relief through the agency of other committees, but to prevent even a hearing of the grievances of the people. That party then proclaimed "death to tariff legislation or death to all legislation."

THE TARIFF COMMISSION A SNARE AND DELUSION.

Now, since the Republican party has again come into power in Congress the protectionists are not content with possession of the Committee on Ways and Means, but demand that the representatives of the people shall abdicate the power reposed in them and refuse to perform the most solemn and important duty imposed upon them by the Constitution and their constituents, and surrender the sovereign power of taxation and their rights as Representatives into the control of a commission, to be created not by the people, but by the President, a junto unfriendly to the people's interest; for I take it such will be the character of the commission, as the men who control the majority on this floor and the present administration have already demonstrated that no friend of tariff reform, no friend of the people shall be on that commission, but that it shall be composed exclusively of protectionists.

Mr. Chairman, there is not a member of this House who fully comprehends the purpose of this commission that does not know that this bill will result as a means for delay and to postpone the tariff issue until after the next election, when it will be too late for action in this Congress, and also at the expense of the people secure official essays in form of the doctrine of protection. The people demand a revision of the tariff by their representatives in Congress, but you send them to a star chamber of protectionists; they ask for bread, and you give them a stone; they demand plain and unequivocal change in the tariff laws; you set before them this delusion and snare.

We inherited from our English ancestry the principle that the representatives of the people shall be vested with the sole power of levying taxes and raising revenue, and this principle, which cost so much of the blood and treasure of our liberty-loving grand sires, was ingrafted in our original and fundamental law. It was to maintain that principle that our forefathers rose in rebellion and threw off their allegiance to the mother country. How degenerate are their sons of this day who basely and abjectly surrender that principle at the dictation of sordid and overgrown monopolies!

But putting aside all question in regard to intention, where will we be in regard to tariff legislation when the report of the commission is presented? We will be just where we are now; then, as I have said, it will be too late to revise the tariff during this Congress. The effect of this bill will, therefore, be to postpone tariff revision for two years longer. But our friends on the other side say that this commission will furnish us with information and views which will enlighten our minds and enable us to more intelligently do the work of revision. Sir, are not the same sources of information open to the Committee on Ways and Means as to such a commission? The members of this House have access to the census reports and all means of information open to a commission. Can it be said that members of Congress are incapable of discharging duties which they have assumed and for the performance of which they were elected? He who votes for this bill because he is unwilling or believes he is incapable of intelligently performing his duty in this respect owes it to himself and those he represents that he should resign his seat. When he was elected by his people as their representative it was not intended that a commission should be appointed at an expense of $200 per day to perform his duties.

This dodge to take the issue of tariff reform out of the next election will fail of its purpose. The people will discover the hollowness of this makeshift and they will put your party on trial in the next election for its unfaithfulness and dereliction of duty in this regard.

THE COST OF PROTECTION.

Let us for a while consider the nature and effect of our revenue laws. During the past nineteen years the Federal Government has collected from the people of this country the following amounts from customs duties and internal-revenue taxes, which are in addition to all the other taxes annually collected:

From customs receipts on imports	$3,012,750,929
From internal revenue	2,942,083,859
Total customs and internal-revenue receipts	5,954,834,788

In addition to this vast sum for the support of the Government the people have paid about five times as much into the private purse of the protected industries on manufactures by reason of a protective tariff, being $15,063,754,645, making the grand total of the amount paid by the people for the support of the Federal Government and the protected manufacturers during the past nineteen years the astonishing sum of $21,018,589,433, a sum about ten times as large as the public debt of the United States, nearly four times as large as the public debt of Great Britain, and within four billions as much as the public debt of all the nations of the world.

If this vast sum was now in the hands of the people and distributed equally among the 50,000,000 in this country, each man, woman, and child would have $420. Let us reflect for a moment as to where all this money has gone. Only about one-fourth has found its way into the national Treasury, while the remainder has found a lodgment in the pockets of the protected classes. This is the direct result or cost of nineteen years of protection. These figures are obtained by adding together the customs and internal-revenue receipts for the total taxes, and by multiplying the customs receipts by five for the profits of the protected classes, that being the proportion of revenue to the profits produced by the protective tariff; it being a well-established fact that the domestic manufacturer usually adds the rate of tariff duties to the price of his products.

WHO PAYS THE TARIFF DUTIES.

The Federal Government collected during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, from customs duties and internal-revenue taxes $333,424,061.53; of this sum $198,159,676.02 was collected from duties on imported articles which enter into consumption by the people. This sum was collected from every being who buys food and clothing or any of the necessaries and comforts of life. We have no statistics which will show how much of these taxes were paid by each individual. When a person pays his school, municipal, county, or State taxes a receipt is given to him which shows exactly how much he pays for those local purposes.

But such is not the case with regard to the taxes we pay for the support of the Federal Government, because they are collected from the importing merchants at the custom-houses in the ports of entry and to the agents of the Internal Revenue Department. The consumer may never have seen a Federal tax gatherer, yet he never escapes the payment of taxes every year, yes, every month and every day, to the Federal Government. He pays it to the dealer from whom he buys his goods, wares, merchandise, fuel, food, drink, or anything that he has or uses, except the direct gifts of nature. Therefore, one cannot ascertain the amount of taxes he pays annually to the Federal Government, unless he has kept an inventory of everything he purchases for the use of himself or family during the year. If he has done this, and deducts the first cost of the articles and the profit of the merchants or others through whose hands the article has passed before reaching his own, he will be able to ascertain how much taxes he has paid to the Federal Government in addition to all his other taxes.

RATES OF TARIFF.

The rates of duty under our present tariff run from a nominal amount all the way up to 780 per cent. There are two thousand articles on the tariff list upon which duties are charged; 197 of them bear a duty above 40 per cent., and the average duty on all is nearly 45 per cent. I will enumerate a few of them in order that it may be seen that the tax extends to necessary articles of every-day consumption. I shall discard the fractions for convenience of statement:

On rice, from about 86 to 88 per cent.; certain chemicals, 47 to 221; thread and thread-yarn, 54 to 76; porcelain, 45 to 50; window-glass, 60 to 79; articles manufactured out of iron, 41 to 68; cutlery, 50; steel rails and other steel articles, 43 to 105; oils, from 58 to 306; paints, from 45 to 229; salt, 65; silk manufactures, 60; soap, 47 to 51; starch, 48 to 115; sugar, 53 to 71; sugar-candy and confectionery, 127; vinegar, 85; carpets, 45 to 104; dress goods, &c., 66 to 70; blankets, 69 to 104; flannels, 65 to 95; woolen hosiery, 55 to 98; manufactures of other woolen goods, 56 to 118.

Although I give but few articles on the tariff list, yet an examination will show that it embraces nearly every article that enters into the daily use and consumption of the people.

TAXATION CAN BE REDUCED AND THE COST OF LIVING CHEAPENED.

The Treasury report shows that the net revenues were $360,782,292.57, and the net expenditures $260,712,887.59. The excess of receipts over payments was $100,069,404.98, of which $51,401,801.05 was expended in the redemption of the public debt. The balance in the Treasury increased $48,667,603.93, from $203,791,321.88 at the beginning, to $252,458,925.81 at the end of the fiscal year. The debt ran amount expended on account of interest and premium on the public down from $98,552,895.53 in the fiscal year 1880 to $83,569,989.96, a reduction of $14,982,905.57.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the excess of receipts is over one hundred millions more than is required to meet all the expenses and fixed charges of the Government, while the interest on the public debt is rapidly diminishing and with a balance lying idle in the Treasury of over two hundred and forty millions, why in the name of common sense and common justice is it that the tariff on the necessaries of life are not reduced in order to lighten the onerous burdens now resting upon the people, and thereby cheapen the cost of living when it can be so easily done without detriment to the Treasury? Why is it that the Republican majority which controls this House and every branch of the Government does not reduce taxation on the articles which provide the poor against hunger and cold, the sick with medicine, the farmer with everything he uses except that which he digs out of the soil, the tools of the mechanic and all the household goods and wares of the masses? You have a bill now pending to reduce the tax on banks, bankers, and capitalists which you will pass notwithstanding our opposition. Now, why in the name of mercy do you not, with such an overflowing Treasury, reduce taxation on the necessaries of the masses as well as the wealthy capitalists? We are not left without our answer. It comes to us in plain and unequivocal language. The majority on this floor answer us that they are not willing to allow a reduction on the necessaries and comforts of life, because they desire to protect and foster the manufacturing interest of the country.

POSITION OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY IN FAVOR OF PROTECTION FOR THE SAKE OF PROTECTION.

As already stated by me, the position of the Republican party on the tariff has, until recently, been hypocritical and evasive, but its leaders now openly favor protection or so laying the Federal taxes that they may result in the protection or subsidizing of certain domestic industries or manufactories as the main object, and the raising of revenue as minor and incidental. But to avoid controversy we will quote the language of some leading Republicans on this floor and in the Senate.

In his speech the other day the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] said:

Tariff for protection on the one hand, or free trade, or "tariff for revenue only" on the other hand, is the issue to-day. But the question whether the revision of the tariff shall result in a tariff for "revenue only," according to the Democratic doctrine, or that when revised the tariff shall remain as it now is, a protective tariff, is unmistakably an issue, as the recent debates in this House clearly show. The Republican party as represented in this House propose to revise the tariff. They propose to do it well; and more, their purpose is, that when it shall have been revised it will be left in effect and in name a protective tariff, free from unjust crudities if possible, but with every industry in the land unharmed.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] said in debate here—

Then I said that if there was to be any incident about it I would put it in the other form; that I am for a tariff for protection with incidental revenue.

A Republican Senator said the other day:

If there was no public debt, no interest to pay, no pension list, no army and no navy to support, I still should oppose free trade and its twin sister, tariff for revenue only, and favor protective duties.

Now let me quote an utterance from the protective tariff or convention of monopolists which was held in New York several months before the gentleman I mention had proclaimed this doctrine in Congress. This is what a delegate in the convention, a Mr. Ward, said:

I am glad to see this union of interests for the cause of American protection, and I am glad to see here so many able and influential advocates of protection who want to make this policy a success and to put it on a permanent basis. Let us come together and reason together. We may have differences on details; as wise men let us reason together and adjust them. Let us confer together. Let us yield something if necessary to the details of the grand and vital principle of protection to American industry, not for the sake of revenue but for the sake of protection.

There should be no surrender. Stand by that at all times and forever, and with a strong pull, a long pull, and a pull all together you will make the voice of a convention like this so potent that the law-makers of the land will be bound to heed it and to give attention to its recommendations.

Thus it will be seen that the leaders of the Republican law-makers do heed the monopolists. Will the American Congress likewise prostrate itself in the worship of Mammon?

The declarations to which I have invited your attention indicate the real position which the Republican party now or soon will occupy.

POSITION OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

The fact that we have a large public debt upon us and an immense pension-roll which must be promptly met in good faith, renders absolute free trade impracticable. For these reasons there is no Democrat on this floor who now advocates absolute free trade. Neither are there any here who advocate direct taxation, because, under the Constitution, direct taxation is required to be apportioned among the States in proportion to population, and the poor man would pay as much as the millionaire. In view of all these circumstances no one is found here who is not in favor of a tariff for revenue. And I maintain that we have no moral right or constitutional power to levy a tax or tariff for any other purpose. "A tariff for revenue only," as stated in the Democratic national platform, is the only tariff you can lay without departing from the Constitution and perpetrating a species of robbery under the forms of law.

INCIDENTAL PROTECTION.

The position of the Democratic party, as I understand it, is that the power of taxation cannot be rightly exercised except for public purposes; and that the object of all taxation should be revenue, but if the customs duties can be so adjusted as to aid and encourage our domestic industries without increasing the burdens of the people beyond what would otherwise be necessary, then to that extent protection is admissible; and that such a policy would afford all the protection that any legitimate industry will require. The position of the party since its foundation has been opposition to monopolies and opposition to special privileges and subsidies to any favored classes. When you impose a tax or duty above the revenue point it falls within this anti-Democratic class.

The policy of protection has indeed been favored by the Republican party since its organization, but, as I have intimated, its leaders have never been so bold and open in its advocacy as within the past few years. They formerly concealed their real purpose behind the mask of friendship for American labor, to raise revenue, and other hypocritical pretenses, but now, obeying the behest of the late conventions of protectionists at Chicago and New York, the more advanced leaders announce that they are for protection for the sake of protection, and that the protection of labor and the raising of revenue are but incidents to the main and primary object. For this reason we have heard the declaration made during this debate that if no tariff was required for revenue at all, still a tariff for protection pure and simple would be advocated.

PROTECTION NO BENEFIT TO LABOR.

By the false pretension that protection is a great benefit to labor the protectionists have popularized their scheme among the operatives in the manufacturing districts. I am satisfied that if the question is carefully examined and the difference in the cost of living and the hours of labor are taken into consideration, it will be found that there is very little, if any, difference in the purchasing power of the wages of protected laborers in the United States and England. The cost of everything, except food, entering into the consumption of operatives is from 50 to 75 per cent. less in England than in the United States, and the hours of labor are longer here than in England. The laborers in our manufactories as well as all others are compelled to pay the protective-tariff taxes. A man may receive higher wages as an iron-puddler in the State of Pennsylvania than in England, a hand in a Massachusetts cotton factory may receive a larger rate of wages than one employed in the Lancashire mills of England, but the American laborers have to pay more for what they and their families consume and they work more hours per day than do the laborers in free-trade England.

In proof of these assertions I beg leave to introduce the evidence of a very high authority for those on the other side of this House. It is that of Hon. James G. Blaine, late Secretary of State. In his letter introductory to the reports of consuls in Europe on the cotton-goods trade of the world, dated the 25th of June, 1881, he says:

In commenting on the strikes then imminent in Manchester, Consul Shaw, in the report transmitting the foregoing table, says:

"The plea that the factory operatives are now receiving higher wages in proportion to the time they work than American operatives is urgently made by manufacturers here, and this, together with increasing financial distress among mill-owners, is gradually allaying the discontent among operatives."

The Secretary further said:

The hours of labor in the Lancashire mills are 56, in the Massachusetts mills 60 per week. The hours of labor in the mills in the other New England States, where the wages are generally less than in Massachusetts, are usually 66 to 69 per week.

Undoubtedly the inequalities in the wages of English and American operatives are more than equalized by the greater efficiency of the latter and their longer hours of labor. If this should prove to be a fact in practice, as it seems to be proven from official statistics, it would be a very important element in the establishment of our ability to compete with England for our share of the cotton-goods trade of the world.

In the two prime factors which may be said to form the basis of the cotton manufacturing industry, namely, raw material and labor, we hold the advantage over England in the first and stand upon an equality with her in the second.

Having the raw material at our doors, it follows that we should be able to convert it into manufactures, all things else being equal, with more economy and facility than can be done by England, which imports our cotton and then manufactures it in her mills. The expense of handling, transportation, and commission must be an important item in this regard as compared with our turning in the fiber from the cotton-fields to our mills and shipping it in the advanced form of manufactured goods. Add to this the secondary fact that it costs us no more to handle and manufacture the same than it costs in England, and we stand on an undoubted equality thus far in the race of competition.

It must not be forgotten that the per cent. of cost of labor in the cotton industry is greater in proportion to material and capital used than in any other of the manufacturing industries. Sir, this tariff does not protect labor. It trammels and oppresses the toiling masses of this country, but it does in an enormous degree enrich and protect the manufacturing nabobs.

PROTECTION IS PAUPERIZING LABOR.

In proof of the fact that the cost of living is so great that the wages received by laborers in protected industries barely afford means of subsistence and lower their condition to that of the European laborers, I will read an extract from an editorial which appeared in a late number of the American, a Republican and protective-tariff organ:

The occurrence of strikes in various parts of the country, and in connection with several great industries, is a marked feature of the existing situation. As a rule these have begun with a demand for higher wages caused by the increased cost of living consequent upon the failure of the crops last summer.

The daily papers contain dispatches from the manufacturing regions which show that laborers are striking for higher wages because your so-called protective tariff is pauperizing them while it is enriching the lordly manufacturers.

It is not the purpose of the revenue reformers to degrade the American mechanic by reducing his wages or depriving him of employment. Our object is to reduce his expenses of living by cheapening the cost of the necessaries and comforts of life.

PROFITS OF LABOR AND CAPITAL.

Let us consider for a moment the percentage of value of the manufactured products above the cost of materials received by the brain and muscle of labor and that received by the cunning of capital. My distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] has by his patient research and careful inquiry among official statistics shown to us that under the low or so-called free trade Democratic tariff of 1860, when the average rate upon dutiable goods was 19 per cent. and the rate upon all goods, dutiable and free, was less than 15 per cent., labor received a little over 20 per cent. of the value of the product. In 1870, after ten years of high protection under a tariff when the average rate of duty was 45 per cent., labor received only about 18 per cent. of the value of the product—2 per cent. less than in 1860—while capital received 45.7 per cent. on the whole amount of capital invested. The full statistics of the manufacturing industries for 1880 are not yet ascertained, but the reports on certain industries which are at hand, show that even a greater disparity existed in the receipts of labor and capital.

But, sir, the mask under which protectionists have been parading so long as the friend of American labor has recently fallen from their face, and as their motives and intentions become known, it is already seen how avaricious and merciless they are toward the American laborer, as well as all others. In discussing the remarks of a member of this House during this debate the Philadelphia American, as I have said, a protectionist as well as a Republican organ, said, when discussing the late speech of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] that—

He assumed, with the sanction of several Republican speakers, that the difference in wages between Europe and America was the reason for protection. From this statement we entirely dissent. It is an opinion into which politicians easily fall; but it has not the sanction of any of the great advocates of the protective policy. Alexander Hamilton, Matthew Carey, Tench Coxe, Henry Clay, Henry C. Carey, William M. Meredith, Stephen Colwell, and Horace Greeley—to say nothing of living men—always treated the advantages to the laborer in point of wages as a reason for protection, but by no means the only reason.

This paper boldly announces the fact that the protection of labor shall no longer be considered as the main object of a protective tariff, but that is only one reason for it, and that paper cites as its authority names of great apostles and teachers of protection, against whom no protectionist dare contend. Need I waste time in repeating what their main reason and purpose is?

PROTECTIONISTS FAVOR CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

But, sir, the cupidity of protectionists does not stop here; they are not content with subordinating the claims of labor to their own greed. They go much further. They threaten the prosperity and morals of the American laborer with the leprosy of Chinese servile labor. A prominent protectionist, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MCKINLEY,] intimated in his speech the other day that "the introduction of Chinese cheap labor would afford all the advantage that the manufacturers would need without the aid of any tariff. He said:

The per diem of slave labor at that time (between 1840 and 1860) did not much, if at all, exceed 20 cents.

This fact is the best argument that can be made, and needs no elaboration. It tells the whole story. With slave labor at 20 cents per day, or Asiatic cheap labor, we need no protection, and save for the purpose of revenue our custom-houses might be closed.

This was doubtless used as an illustration, but I quote it here to show that there are conditions upon which protectionists seem willing to surrender their demands for a protective tariff, and one of those conditions is the unrestricted introduction into this country of Chinese coolies. These words, therefore, may not be without signification when considered in connection with the position of parties upon the question of Chinese importation. Do protectionists desire to bring the servile labor of China into competition with that of the American laborer, and the consequent impoverishment and degradation of the American laborer?

The action of the Republican protective-tariff leaders in and out of Congress give grounds for fear that an affirmative answer must be given to this inquiry. When discussing the bill recently passed by Congress restricting Chinese immigration I used this language:

HISTORY OF LEGISLATION AGAINST IMPORTATION OF COOLIES.

When, sir, all other means had been ineffectual to restrain the introduction of Chinese cheap labor, threatening as it did the prosperity, the morals, and the social order of the communities on the Pacific coast, when all local efforts had proven ineffectual, the people of the Pacific slope turned to the American Congress and appealed for relief.

In 1869 there was a Republican majority in both Houses of Congress, and a Republican President presided over the destinies of this country. An appeal was made to that, the Forty-first Congress. How was it answered? The Republican party turned its back upon the pathetic appeal of the people of California. It was renewed to the Forty-second Congress, which was likewise Republican. Numerous memorials, resolutions of public meetings, petitions, one containing over 16,000 signatures, were presented, but they were all ignored. The people of the Pacific States appealed to the Forty-third, another Republican Congress, and again relief was refused. It was not until a Democratic House assembled here for the first time since the war that the grievances of the people found a hearing. It was in the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress that a joint resolution was adopted authorizing the President of the United States to open negotiations with the Chinese Government for the purpose of modifying the treaty between the two countries and restricting immigration from China to commercial purposes. That action was followed up in the second session of that Congress by a joint resolution requesting the President to present to the Chinese Government an additional article to the treaty for the accomplishment of that end. The Democratic House in the Forty-fifth Congress passed the "fifteen-passenger Chinese bill." It commanded the support of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] as well as an overwhelming majority of the Democrats of this House. On the passage of that bill, 110 Democrats voted in favor of it, and only 45 Republican members could be found on this floor who were willing to stand up with the friends of American labor. Only 9 Democratic members voted against that bill, while 63 Republicans voted in opposition to it.

What became of the bill? It afterward passed the Senate and was placed before the Republican President, who had it in his power by a stroke of his pen to make it the law of the land. What did he do with it? He vetoed it, and our efforts were in vain and the hopes of the people were disappointed. Now, this bill has come to us from the Senate, and if you will analyze the vote in that body upon its passage you will find that among all who voted against it there was but one Democratic Senator, and of those who voted for it there were but eight Senators on the Republican side; of those Republican Senators who favored the bill there were but two of them who did not come from the Pacific slope.

The first and most deadly assault made upon that bill was an amendment which would permit Chinese emigration after ten years' suspension, and out of one hundred votes cast in favor of it there were only three who are opposed to protection. Among those voting for it were the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who has so often vaunted himself as the friend of labor, and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MCKINLEY,] who gave us the ominous intimation referred to by me.

The next vote was on the final passage of the bill, and because of some who dodged and others who had changed their position the number against the bill was reduced to sixty-six; but out of these sixty-six votes cast against the bill and in favor of Chinese immigration there were only four Democrats. This bill met at the hands of President Arthur the same fate as its predecessor, the bill passed by the Democratic Forty-fifth Congress, had met at the hands of President Hayes—it was vetoed. Now, permit me to add that of all the votes cast in the Senate during this Congress against the bill restricting Chinese immigration there was only one who can be considered as opposed to a protective tariff, and of those who voted against it in the House only three are opposed to protection. Thus it will be seen that nearly all in Congress who are in favor of the immigration of Chinese cooly labor are in favor of protection; the two influences go hand in hand and seem to be in close sympathy and co-operation. Why should this not be so? Both are built upon and fostered upon the ruins and degradation of American labor. The protected monopolists and the importers of coolies have an interest in common, and therefore we need not be surprised to find them the joint foes of the welfare and well-being of the American laborer, and that his best friend is the Democratic party.

THE VOICE OF CAPITAL AND VOICE OF LABOR ON CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Recent events emphasize the fact that protected capital is in favor of Chinese immigration. Permit me to call attention to the petition presented here the other day by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FLOWER,] which he said was signed by two hundred and fifty of the wealthiest citizens of New York, which said petition opposed "any legislation which tends to obstruct and restrict immigration from China." This is the voice of capital. Now, what is the voice of labor? I will inquire even among the laborers of protective-tariff Pennsylvania. Listen to the reading of a dispatch which appeared in all the journals of the 16th instant.

ANTI-VETO MASS-MEETING.

PHILADELPHIA, April 15.

A large mass-meeting of workingmen "to express their indignation at the action of President Arthur in vetoing the anti-Chinese immigration bill," was held in this city this evening, and was participated in by from 6,000 to 8,000 workingmen, representing all trades. The meeting was presided over by Frank A. Kaufman, president of the State Labor Council, and addresses were delivered by Hon. THOMPSON H. MURCH, the stone-cutter Congressman from Maine; Charles A. Zimmerman, of the Trade and Labor Bureau of Statistics of New Jersey, and a number of others interested in the movement.

As I said in the speech referred to, "this question draws the line of demarkation between the true friends of American labor and its oppressors." The wealthy aristocrat of New York speaks for the one and the laborers of Pennsylvania speak for the other.

WHAT IS PROTECTION?

Now, what is the real meaning and character of protection? I will give the definition as it is found in McCullough's Commercial Dictionary:

Protection, in commercial legislation, means the protecting or bolstering up of certain branches of domestic industry by prohibiting the importation of the produce of such branches from abroad or loading it when imported with heavy duties.

Let us ascertain more specifically its operation and effect in this country. We will first take for illustration the statistics furnished by the census report for 1880 on the iron and steel industries of the United States.

The total number of hands employed were 140,978. Now, in order that this number of our people may apparently enjoy high wages, and that the owners of these properties may realize large profits, contribution is levied upon the millions who use the products of such works. But the bulk of the profits realized from these industries did not go into the pockets of the hands employed, it went into the well-lined pockets of the owners or manufacturers, as will be seen by this census report. The total amount of capital, real and personal, invested in the iron and steel industries was $230,971,884; the total value of all products made was $295,557,685. The value of the materials used was $191,271,150, and the wages paid for labor was $55,476,785. These figures show a net profit of over 21 per cent. on the capital employed. What other business in the country pays a larger percentage than these infant industries?

A PROTECTIVE TARIFF MEANS PROTECTION FOR CAPITAL ONLY.

The profits of the few thousand who owned the property nearly equal the aggregate amount paid to the 150,000 laborers. When it is remembered that the tariff on iron and steel products ranges from 41 to 105 per cent. it will be seen what an enormous subsidy, through the operations of our tariff laws, the one thousand and five iron and steel establishments were enabled to force out of the pockets of the people in one year. But the figures relating to the manufacture of Bessemer steel rails are still more startling. The number of hands employed during the year 1880 was 10,835; the wages paid amounted to $4,930,349; the amount of capital invested, $20,975,999; total cost of materials used, $36,826,928, and total value of the product was $55,805,210; deducting the cost of labor and materials from value of the product there is left $14,047,933 as a profit for the capital invested, which is about 67 per cent. on the capital invested, whereas labor received only 9 per cent.

But the proportion of laborers claimed to be protected by this tariff is small in comparison with those that are left without protection. This tariff does not protect machinists, skilled artisans, ship-builders, carpenters, shoemakers, blacksmiths, and masons. There were over 1,000,000 of this class, as shown by the statistics of 1870. We have not received the returns for 1880, but it is safe to estimate the number now at 1,500,000. Their product in 1870, as shown by the special report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, was $1,000,000,000. It must now be one and a half billions, while that of agriculture was three and a quarter billions. It must be five billions now. The number directly interested in agriculture and who are practically without protection is 25,000,000, one-half of the population of the whole country.

SIXTY-NINE PER CENT. OF THE REVENUE COMES FROM SIX COMMODITIES.

Over 69 per cent. of the $198,000,000 collected under the tariff last year came from six commodities, as will be seen by the following quotation from the report of the Bureau of Statistics:

Of the total amount of duties collected on imports, the duties on sugar and molasses amounted to $47,984,032.84, or 24.79 per cent.; the duties on wool and manufactures thereof amounted to $27,285,624.78, or 14.10 per cent.; the duties on iron and steel and manufactures thereof amounted to $21,462,534.34, or 11.09 per cent.; the duties on manufactures of silk amounted to $19,038,665.81, or 9.81 per cent.; the duties on manufactures of cotton amounted to $10,825,115.21, or 5.59 per cent.; and the duties on flax and manufactures thereof amounted to $6,984,374.90, or 3.60 per cent.

The duties collected on these six commodities and classes of commodities amounted to $133,580,347.88, and constituted 69.01 per cent. of the total amount of duties collected on imports.

The cost of steel rails in this country, according to the latest quotation I have seen, is $57 per ton, being $25.90 more than the English prices put them on board at the ports of shipment, and which is $2.10 less than the amount of duty. Of course no tax was collected by the Federal Treasury on the steel rails made in this country, but the manufacturer added the amount of the tax, $28 per ton, to the price of his product and compelled our consumers to pay it. It is estimated that the bounty paid by the railroads to the manufacturers of this article alone was over $31,000,000, which is refunded by the people with enormous interest annually to the railroad companies in increased charges for freights and passengers.

But look further into the two thousand articles on the tariff list and you will find still more glaring evidence of extortion by the tariff monopolist.

THE EXTORTIONS OF TARIFF MONOPOLISTS.

It has been seen that all the other articles on the tariff list only pay $60,000,000. Why is it so? It is because the tariff duties are so high, so protective, that but few foreign goods are imported and the Government receives but little revenue from them. But the duty is collected by the manufacturer, who is his own tax-gatherer, for he adds the tax to the price of his articles that the people are compelled to buy, and puts the whole into his own pocket.

The time allotted to me is too short to enable me to call attention to many articles, but I will mention a few. Blankets are used throughout the country; the duty on them is from 85 to 104 per cent. It is estimated that $20,000,000 worth are annually bought in the United States. Yet the statistics show that only $1,239 worth were imported into this country, and only $1,089 of revenue on that article went into the Treasury, while the 100 per cent. of duty was added by the manufacturers to the price, and thereby they took out of the pockets of the people $10,000,000, and put it into their own pockets under the legerdemain of these tariff laws.

There is undoubtedly a much larger sum paid for flannels than for blankets; the duty on them ranges from 88 to 95, and is practically prohibitory, for only $3,082 worth were imported, and the Treasury only received $2,435 in duty, while the manufacturers received millions for the duty which they added to the price. With a duty running from 38 to 64 per cent., the aggregate of all the revenue collected on shot, buck-saws, cross-cut saws, hand-saws, and horseshoe nails, was only $141.

PROHIBITION.

On the following articles the duty is so high that it is prohibitory, there being none, or merely nominal importations and revenue: heavy cotton goods, so universally used by the poor, wool hats, shirts, drawers, knit goods, wire for fencing, screws for wood, cut nails and spikes, galvanized and coated iron, cast and wrought iron hinges, board nails, rivets, and bolts. When it is remembered how extensively these articles are used, and that our people are prohibited from obtaining them from the markets of the world, it will be seen what enormous tribute is levied upon the hard earnings of our people in order to enrich the lordly manufacturer.

THE BENEFITS OF PROTECTION ARE SECTIONAL.

If these manufactories were distributed into every county in the United States it would even then be a hardship—yes, a crime—to compel the farmers and other classes to divide the product of their toil as subsidies to maintain the factories in their midst. Still it might be contended that some degree of compensation would return in the development of home industries. It is impossible for me to see anything but injustice and violation of natural rights in a law compelling John Smith, the farmer, to pay or deliver a part of the fruits of his labor to William Simpson, the iron-mill owner, without fair compensation. The protectionists cannot justify their action even on the principle that you must help your neighbor, for often the tax-ridden citizen is not a neighbor of the protected manufacturer. Where are these factories and pampered industries located for whom you force tribute from the wheat grower of Illinois, the cotton planter of the South, the corn planter of Kansas, or the gold and silver miners of the mountain region? The census report on the iron and steel product prepared by Mr. Swank, secretary of the Iron and Steel Association, shows that Bessemer steel works existed in only twelve States in 1880; therefore all the other States were laid under tribute to maintain and protect the steel industries of those States. Pennsylvania produced more than half—56 per cent.—of all the Bessemer steel ingots produced in the United States. Now, answer me why should the people of Indiana, a State in which no Bessemer steel works exist, be compelled to support the steel works of Pennsylvania and other States where they are located; or in other words, when Indiana wishes to buy steel rails is it just to compel her to pay $57 per ton for them in Philadelphia when she can buy in Liverpool and lay them down in her own State at less than $30, adding cost of transportation under a fair revenue duty? My time will not permit me to present the data in this respect of other protective industries, but the steel industry will suffice as an example.

LEGALIZED ROBBERY.

Mr. Chairman, I will attempt a still more simple illustration of this subject. Suppose of two persons doing business in a county one is engaged in farming and the other owns a woolen factory, and that a person comes along who demands of the farmer a portion of his corn, his wheat, his oats, his pork, and everything else that he produces, for the purpose of donating those portions to his neighbor, the woolen manufacturer, in order to increase his wealth and maintain him in his avocation; what would that farmer say? Would he not answer that all he has is the result of his own labor, and that he needs it for his own benefit or the benefit of his family, and that if the woolen manufacturer cannot maintain himself without taking a part of his hard earnings he had better abandon his present business and pursue some other occupation? But suppose the person who thus makes the demand should further say, the law has authorized me to take from you such a share of all your products and deliver them to this manufacturer without compensation, would not the farmer reply that such a law is unjust, unconstitutional, and is nothing more than legalized robbery? Would that farmer feel that the law was any the less onerous and unfair if he is told that every other farmer, every carpenter, mason, merchant, and person in his county is forced to contribute in the same way for the support of that factory? Would he feel that it was any the less a crime if he is also told that the robbery is general and extends throughout the whole land? Would he not still say this is robbery, and that the moral nature of the crime is not changed by any enactment of Congress?

This is a fair illustration of the nature of the question which now divides the two great political parties on this floor. This is protection in its purity and simplicity.

A bare statement of its real nature will carry with it an unanswerable refutation, based on any other principles than those claimed by the Dick Turpins, Claude Duvals, and Jesse Jameses, or upon the statesmanship of a Machiavelli.

The tariff I have been describing is what our friends on the other side call a protective tariff. So may the highwayman, when he levies his forced contributions from the unfortunate traveler, call it a protective tariff. The principal difference lies in the fact that the one is collected without and the other within the forms of law; the same degree of justice and equity is found in each.

TARIFF HEAVIEST UPON NECESSARIES AND LIGHTEST UPON LUXURIES.

A very unjust and unmerciful feature of the tariff is that its burdens are laid heaviest upon the necessaries of life, which the poor are compelled to have, and is lightest upon the luxuries, which are enjoyed by the wealthy classes. A just and merciful rule of taxation would demand that the highest rate of taxation should be laid upon the luxuries, and so that the largest portion should be raised from those best able to bear it. But an inspection of our present system will show that such is not the rule adopted.

I hold in my hand the official tariff lists, with the rates of duty on each, but to save time will quote from the compilation as prepared and used in debate on this subject at the other end of the Capitol by Senator COKE:

RATES ON LUXURIES AND NECESSARIES.

Discarding fractions, wool hats are taxed 66 per cent. and silks 60 per cent.; salt is taxed 65 per cent and diamonds 10 per cent.; trace-chains are taxed 57 per cent. and treble ingrain carpets 50 per cent.; Brussels carpets are taxed 68 per cent. and coarse blankets 104 per cent.; fine woolen rugs for the lady's parlor and covers to keep the dust and moisture from her piano are taxed 45 per cent., while flannels, to keep the baby warm, to protect the shivering invalid, the strong workingman and his wife, and the aged people alike from the freezing blasts of winter, are taxed 95 per cent.; plain unbleached cotton cloth for shirts and other garments of honest working people is taxed 49 per cent. and the window-glass in their houses 60 per cent., while fine porcelain ware for the rich man's table is taxed only 45 per cent., and artificial flowers and feathers for the adornment of his wife and daughters pay only 50 per cent. Such instances could be multiplied into the hundreds. Medicines and their ingredients are taxed all the way from 30 to 220 per cent.

I appeal to the tariff list in proof of the assertion that the poor people, the working people of the country, who are least able to bear it, pay more than double the amount of taxes under the tariff, in proportion to their consumption, than any other class.

HUMBUGGING THE FARMER—HE SELLS IN THE CHEAPEST AND BUYS IN THE HIGHEST MARKET.

The cunning of the advocates of protection has been taxed to the utmost to find apologies and excuses for the unjust discriminations against our agricultural classes and the burdensome operations of the tariff upon them. Ingenious and specious arguments are employed to deceive and delude them into the belief that protection is beneficial to them as well as the manufacturer; but their efforts will fail. The farmer knows full well that while he is compelled to sell his products in the free-trade market of Old England, the cheapest market in the world, he is compelled to buy what he uses in the protected market of New England, the dearest market in the world. The American manufacturer demands of the farmer that he shall contribute to his aid, in order that he may compete with the products of the pauper labor of other countries, while, in the language of my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE]—

The American farmer is sending his surplus products three or four thousand miles to a market, and competing there with the labor of the lately emancipated serfs of Russia, and the half-naked and half-fed swarms of Hindoos in India, whose wages amount only to a few cents per day. Gentlemen should not be surprised at his inability to appreciate the wisdom and justice of a system which taxes his clothing, his agricultural implements, his means of transportation, and many articles of his food, in order that some other American producer, not more meritorious than he, may be able to conduct his business at a large profit.

Let gentlemen examine all the consular reports and other evidence showing the state of labor in different countries, and they will find that the agricultural laborer in Europe and Asia, with whom our farmers and agricultural laborers are forced to compete, is the worst fed, the worst clothed, and the poorest paid in the world. The wages received by those who are employed in the mechanical and manufacturing industries in the Old World are far higher than the agricultural laborer there can ever hope to earn, and yet we have a system of taxation based upon the theory that it is the duty of the Government to protect one class of our producers against competition with the best paid labor in the world except our own, and to leave another class open to competition with the poorest paid labor in the world.

The price of the wheat, corn, and pork of the farmer is governed by the fluctuations of an European market. The manufacturer pays for the breadstuff furnished him by his farmer neighbor at prices fixed in the Liverpool market less the cost of transportation 3,000 miles. He demands of the farmer that he shall buy his manufactured articles as fixed in the American market with the tariff duty added to other profits.

Sir, is it just that one class of our people shall be enriched with bounties and special privileges while the other is loaded with burdens? Why is it that he who coins his money by the sweat of his brow in following the plow is not entitled to the protection and encouragement of his Government as well as the manufacturer while plying his comparatively less laborious vocation?

In order to reconcile the agricultural classes to the rank injustice of this tariff, several gentlemen on the other side have time and time again vociferated that there is a tariff on wheat, corn, pork, and some other agricultural products. This is delusive. You cannot frame a tariff on wheat, corn, and pork which will afford any protection to the farmer for the very simple reason that the price of these products is fixed at Liverpool where they come in competition with like products raised in the European countries. You can by the legerdemain of your tariff laws force the farmer to buy your manufactured articles at an unfair and extortionate figure, but you cannot force the buyers at Liverpool to pay one cent more than the price fixed by free competition.

Mr. CHACE. Does not the gentleman know that on the same day the price of oats was ten cents less per bushel in Canada than it was in New York?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. We find no market in Canada for our western oats, corn, or wheat. The Dominion of Canada produces enough of these cereals for her consumption without taking any from us. The Liverpool market regulates the price of our grain, a market where our farmers enjoy no protection and where they are compelled to compete with the cheapest labor in Europe and India, after paying extortionate rates of transportation.

Mr. CHACE. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to ask him a question right here?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My time is very short, but go on; I will hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. CHACE. I wish to ask the gentleman if he knows what the prices of wheat or pork or beef and oats and breadstuffs generally were at the time he is now specifying in Canada?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I know what they were in Liverpool, which is the real market for our agricultural products.

NO REAL PROTECTION FOR FARMERS.

In order to show that the farmer has protection, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] and others have published with their speeches one of Nimmo's tables, which I hold in my hand. The amount of tariff collected for the year ending June 30, 1881, on wheat, rye, Indian corn, and oats was as follows:

Wheat	$2,116 66
Indian corn	7,516 20
Oats	6,527 68
Total collection	$16,862 54

When you remember the quantity of these articles produced in the United States you will perceive at a glance how insignificant is the amount of protection your tariff affords.

Articles.	Bushels produced in 1880.
Wheat	459,479,505
Rye	19,831,595
Indian corn	1,754,861,535
Oats	407,858,999
Total	2,642,029,634

There was collected on wheat $2,116, and we had a production of 498,500,000 bushels, valued at $554,886,003. There was collected $7,516 on Indian corn, and we produced 1,717,434,543 bushels, valued at $940,023,868.

Mr. Chairman, while legislation during the long period which the Republican party has had control of the Government is full of enactments favoring monopolies and corporations; while over a hundred and thirty-three millions of acres of land and millions of the treasure of the people have been voted away by that party in subsidies to railroads and for other purposes; while bankers and manufacturers have fattened and been fostered by your legislation, the farmer has been left to take care of himself.

Thus we have seen how protected classes stealthily reach the hard earnings of the masses. Is it not marvelous that in a free land such tyrannical and iniquitous laws should be placed on the statute-book? Sir, an examination of the infamies of our tariff laws will reveal the fact that the methods of the robber barons, who from their castles four hundred years ago preyed upon travelers, were as honorable as those of the tariff robber who preys upon commerce to-day in this land of boasted civilization and freedom. The villains or farm laborers under the feudal system were not more completely the slaves of their feudal lords than the agricultural producer is to-day the toiling slave of railroads and tariff monopolies. One-half of the product of wheat raised in Illinois is confiscated by lines of transportation in conveying it to its market in Liverpool, and the major part of the other half is filched from him by the artifice of protected monopolies. The legislation enacted since the close of the war has seemed to have but one end in view—the impoverishment of the farmer and the masses and the enrichment of the monopolies.

WHO PAYS THE TAXES.

The dealer in the manufactured articles of this country pays no Federal tax whatever, and a large portion of the raw material entering into the manufactured article is exempted from customs duties, but as soon as the raw materials are transformed into manufactured articles the masses pay not only a fair profit but an average tariff duty of 45 per cent. added, which goes into the pockets of the monopolists. How is it with the farmer? There is an excise tax of three times its actual value on one of the products of his toil and labor, tobacco; and if he dares to exercise the privilege of selling it to the highest bidder without regard to license, a right which ought to be revered as inalienable and unassailable, he may be heavily fined and thrown into prison. We have a statute which forbids under heavy penalties the producer of leaf tobacco from selling his product to any but a licensed dealer. Think of it! The farmer who owns the soil, with his own implements of husbandry, and the sweat of his brow blessed by the favor of Heaven, produces a bundle of tobacco; and yet if he should dare to exchange that bundle of tobacco with a neighbor for bread necessary to save the life of a famishing family, under an enactment of the Federal Congress he can be put into a prison and heavily fined. I can mention a number of farmers in my own district who have been arrested and punished for selling their leaf tobacco to unlicensed dealers. Doubtless there are many members who can do the same in their districts.

And such laws are permitted to remain unrepealed in face of the fact that the aggregate revenue collected from the licensed dealers is very small. If you can secure the monopoly to licensed leaf-tobacco dealers you can do the same for the dealer in corn and provisions. We may be pardoned for expressing the fear that the same party which enacted the one may, if it retains power in Congress, enact the other law.

When we remember that it is from the agricultural class that we draw mainly for the defenders of the Republic in time of war, our revenues for the support of the Government, and the sources from which business and commerce receive their prosperity, it is asking nothing more than the public welfare demands that we should foster this great interest and remove every restriction upon its freedom and success.

IT IS THE FARMER WHO GIVES US PROSPERITY.

Gentlemen over the way presented the tables of exports and used them as the main support of their arguments that it is protection which has brought prosperity to the country by swelling the amount of exports. Why, sir, it is well known to the most ignorant that 85 per cent. of all the exports ($898,152,891) were the products of the plow, and the rapid increase in exports during the last decade was not due to protection but to the improvement in agricultural implements, in the methods of farming, and by reason of the vast area which has been opened in the far West; also by reason of the enormous growth of our population. When the crops are bountiful we have prosperity in the whole country, but short crops are followed by panic and hard times. All know that the short crops of last season produced the hard times and depression and shrinkage of values which have followed. It is the exports of our farm products that are paying your bonded debt so rapidly.

You appropriate over $25,000,000 annually for the Army, and $16,000,000 for the Navy, in times of peace, and yet only $400,000 is bestowed on agriculture, the basis of national and private wealth.

The true theory for us is to reduce the army of tax-eating bayonets and office-holders, and encourage the tax-producing farmers. It is the latter class which brings prosperity to this country and sends bread to the famished in all the world.

I predict that we are rapidly nearing the day when the enlightened public sentiment of this country will be so strong against the injustice and bad policy of protection, that but few public men in or out of Congress, coveting the esteem of the people, will dare to champion such an iniquitous system of extortion and fraud. I will not have time to show how fallacious are the claims that protection produces prosperity in the country. Sir, it does not create wealth among the masses. It absorbs the earnings of the many, and concentrates them in the hands of the few. We had no Goulds or Huntingtons under revenue tariff or Democratic administrations, but we had a contented and prosperous people. We had no labor strikes, but we had low taxes and wages with a purchasing power far greater than those received to-day. We had then the golden era of peace, prosperity, and happiness. We then had a merchant marine which was the pride and glory of our land and the envy of the most powerful nations across the sea. Our products were carried into all the ports of the world, under the protection of a flag which no foreign nation ever insulted with impunity while a Democratic Secretary held the seal of state.

THE BLASTING EFFECT OF PROTECTION.

But while protection has not added to the prosperity of any except those who have received its bounties, yet the statistics reveal to us indisputable evidences of its blasting effects. Compare the condition of our merchant marine and carrying trade under the influence of the protective tariff since 1862 with its condition during the preceding revenue-tariff period. As far back as 1840 the percentage of our imports and exports carried in American vessels was nearly 83 per cent.; the percentage has fallen to about 16 last year. In 1850 American vessels carried about two hundred and forty millions of our exports and imports, and foreign vessels carried less than ninety-one millions. In 1860, when our merchant marine was in the zenith of its glory, five hundred and seven and a quarter millions were carried in American vessels, while only about two hundred and fifty-five millions were carried on foreign bottoms. But the census returns of the next decade showed how rapidly was the glory of our power on the sea passing away. In 1870 the amount carried on American bottoms had fallen to less than three hundred and fifty-three millions, while that of foreign vessels had increased to about six hundred and thirty-nine millions. But the statistics for 1881 show a far more humiliating condition of our shipping; the amount carried by American vessels had fallen to about two hundred and sixty-eight millions, whereas the amount carried by foreign vessels had increased to the vast sum of 1,378,556,017.

THE DECAY OF THE AMERICAN MARINE.

Thus in twenty years the policy of protection had caused a decay in American shipping of nearly 50 per cent., and had increased the foreign shipping in our carrying trade over fivefold. It had reduced the percentage of American shipping from 66 in 1860 to 16 per cent. in 1881. The tariff has indeed been protective, but its protection has extended to foreign shipping and has been destructive of the American shipping industry.

These figures are so startling that their accuracy might be doubted if they were not obtained from the official documents which lie upon my desk. What a bright day was dawning upon our merchant marine when the fell spirit of tariff monopoly laid its palsying hand upon it! As we had become a great people, we were rapidly attaining the lordship of the seas. Our maritime dominion was extending around the globe. Foreign nations stood in awe and admiration of the growth of the American maritime empire. Its white sails were impelled by the winds of free trade into every sea and bay, and the remotest markets of the world were opened to products borne beneath the American flag. All foreign competitors were falling fast before it. The scepter of that great ruler of the ocean, England, was within our grasp, when the selfish greed of the tariff robber began its work. He captured the American Congress, and by restrictive laws accomplished what every foreign power had attempted in vain; he drove the American flag from the seas and transferred our foreign carrying trade, with its hundreds of millions of profits, to the flags of other lands.

No country can create or maintain a large commercial marine which adopts the policy of a protective tariff, for the reason that commerce does not take place between people who cannot exchange products. If a people prohibit or restrict importations from other lands, those prohibited or restricted will buy from or trade with the people who will take their products. The wise Montesquieu said a long time ago, in his Spirit of Laws, that "commerce is sometimes destroyed by conquerors; sometimes, cramped by monarchs, it traverses the earth, flies from the places where it is oppressed, and stays where it has liberty to breathe." "The history of commerce is that of the communication of people." The permanent prosperity of any nation rests with most absolute security upon the prosperity of its foreign commerce, through which its surplus products reach the markets of the world. And this commerce depends upon the willingness of nations to exchange their products with each other.

To encourage and secure this exchange it is necessary that liberal laws and regulations shall be adopted. Discrimination and prohibition beget discrimination and prohibition. If a nation closes its ports to the commerce and products of the world, every other nation will close its ports against that nation. So, then, sir, this question comes directly home to us. If our farmer could not sell his surplus wheat, corn, and provisions in Liverpool on so favorable terms as other nations, they would become valueless to him, and would cost him more to produce these products than he could realize from them. Instead of converting his surplus readily into cash to buyers at his door, it would rot in his cribs and fields. Will free-trade England always open her ports to us if we continue the policy of exclusion against her? Sir, the welfare of the farmer is dependent upon the freedom of commerce; that of the tariff monopolists is dependent upon protection and prohibition. There is a direct conflict between those two interests. What shall be done? Wisdom dictates the adoption of a revenue tariff so adjusted as to promote the welfare of all legitimate industries.

THE PEOPLE OPPOSED TO PROTECTION.

Time and again it has been boastingly said on this floor by the advocates of protection that the sentiment of a majority of the voters of this country is in favor of a protective tariff, and that it was so expressed in the late Presidential elections. Reference to the result of the last two will demonstrate the falsity of these assertions. On the 27th day of June, in the centennial year of our Republic, the oldest political organization in this Union assembled in convention in the city of Saint Louis. Over seven hundred delegates were present, representing constituencies in every county and parish in all the States. A candidate for President was nominated who pledged that the policy of his administration should be such as had been enunciated in the platform which had been framed by that convention. At the polls in the following November a majority of over 250,000 American freemen ratified that platform and elected that candidate. I shall read one of its planks:

We denounce the present tariff levied upon nearly four thousand articles as a masterpiece of injustice, inequality, and false pretense. It yields a dwindling, not a yearly rising revenue. It has impoverished many industries to subsidize a few. It prohibits imports that might purchase the products of American labor. It has degraded American commerce from the first to an inferior rank on the high seas. It has cut down the sales of American manufacturers at home and abroad, and has depleted the returns of American agriculture, an industry followed by half our people. It costs the people five times more than it produced to the Treasury, obstructs the processes of production, and wastes the fruits of labor. It promotes fraud, fosters smuggling, enriches dishonest officials, and bankrupts honest merchants. We demand that all custom-house taxation shall be only for revenue.

This was the sentiment of the majority of the American people. Has their solemn will been respected or enforced? It might well be asked if this in reality be a free land and governed by the will of the majority. Was the result of that election disregarded? Truth points to the sorrowful fact that returning-board thieves and the enemies of free institutions, in and out of Congress, by means of fraud and crime, deprived the lawfully elected President of his office and put an usurper in his place. Again that same party met in convention at Cincinnati in 1880 and declared as one of its fundamental principles that it was in favor of "a tariff for revenue only."

It is hardly necessary for me to add—for the facts are fresh in the minds of all within reach of the sound of my voice—that notwithstanding timid counselors on the one side prevented a full and fair discussion of this issue, and the corrupt use on the other side of money furnished by protected monopolists and star-route contractors polluted the elections in several States, yet out of a total vote of over nine millions this platform lacked but a few thousand in receiving ratification. Sir, will any intelligent and candid person acquainted with the secrets of the last campaign deny, if a free and unbought election had been obtained upon a full and fair discussion of the policy of protection, that General Hancock would have been elected on the revenue platform adopted at Cincinnati?

Mr. Chairman, as long as the great crime against suffrage remains unatoned and the unjust laws which mortgage the homes, earnings, and energies of our people to monopoly remain unrepealed on our statute-books, the true patriot will feel in his heart the degradation of slavery and will confess with shame that he is but a freeman in name. The people have borne patiently for years with the usurpers and the pillage of tariff robbers. God grant the day of deliverance may not be far off!

It is useless to indulge in hope that action on the pending bill will bring any relief, but we shall soon return to our masters at the polls, where we may demand judgment upon the dereliction of the majority in this Congress. The opportunity is near at hand when the people may save themselves from the piracy to which they have been so long subjected. The remedy is in their own hands and can be applied at the polls next November.

The same party which gave the country these iniquitous laws has signalized its return to power in this House by a bold declaration in favor of an increase of the burdens on the people, and by their open advocacy of a tariff for protection they challenge an issue with the friends of revenue reform. Well, sir, for one I accept the challenge and say, Let us go with this issue to the people. If they prove too weak and fall before the power and cunning of their opulent and unscrupulous foe, I shall be content to fall with them.

THE STRUGGLE WITH MONOPOLY.

I was one of those who favored a revision of the tariff in the last Congress, but we were foiled by trickery and filibustering tactics. Our foes met our demand with vilification, but not argument. I am now gratified that they have at last dared to meet us in the field of controversy, and I sincerely trust that this debate may go on until the friends of reform have so fully laid bare the enormities of this system as to arouse the people to a realization of the wrongs which have been perpetrated upon them. It is said we are delaying some of the appropriation bills. Well, sir, suppose we are delaying the expenditure of the public money. As I conceive it we shall prove unfaithful and deserving the scorn of those who sent us here if we do not strike a blow to free our people from the galling yoke imposed by the tariff monopoly.

Three hundred years ago, under the reign of the most arbitrary and potent and perhaps the wisest sovereign England ever had, monopolists had, as they have now, secured the favor of the ruling power. Queen Elizabeth favored her courtiers, as the Republican party of this day has done, with its favorites, with grants of monopolies for the sale of salt, coal, and other articles of ordinary consumption. The brave statesmen and true patriots in the Parliament of 1579 and 1601 assailed those monopolies with bitter invective. The autocrat who had never before tolerated opposition at first defied and threatened the representatives of the people, but in vain. Then she employed the art of diplomacy to save her subsidized favorites and in supplicating tones "hoped her dutiful subjects would not take away her prerogatives, which is the choicest flower in her garden and the principal and head pearl in her diadem."

But our sturdy Briton ancestry had the nerve and the virtue to press on with the work of tariff reform until they triumphed; they destroyed the monopolies of that day and compelled their haughty sovereign to yield her acquiescence.

I have lately read the debates which occurred in the Parliament of that day as they are found collated in a work by Sir Simonds D'Estes, published nearly two hundred years ago, which you will find in the Congressional Library. I wish that all here would read the brave utterances and eloquent denunciations of monopolies by the statesmen of that early period. Sir Francis Moore, without fear of the awful potentate who ruled the kingdom, said:

I cannot utter with my tongue or conceive with my heart the great grievances that the town and country for which I serve suffereth by some of these monopolies. It bringeth the general profit into a private hand, and the end of all is bondage and beggary to the subjects.

And he concluded by declaring:

Out of the spirit of humiliation, Mr. Speaker, I do speak it, there is no act of hers that hath been or is more derogatory to her own majesty, more odious to the subject, more dangerous to the commonwealth than the granting of these monopolies.

Mr. Martin denounced the monopolists as "blood-suckers of the commonwealth," as "monstrous and unconscionable." More apt words cannot be applied to the monopolists that afflict the descendants of that glorious ancestry in this country than were heard in Elizabeth's House of Commons.

Mr. Chairman, let us be mindful of this grand lesson given us by our forefathers. If we have their wisdom, courage, and virtue, and their fidelity to the people we will lay the ax of reform to the root of the tree of monopoly, and hew until it shall fall and be cast away from the land of liberty.

Fellow-Representatives, I implore you to be steadfast and falter not. We meet a well-officered foe—relentless, and vigilant. Let us demonstrate our fidelity to public interest. Let courage and determination pervade our ranks and continue this agitation until our awakened people shall, through the agency of the ballot-box, break the power of their oppressors.

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RUSSELL. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I move that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, resumed and concluded his remarks.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally; and Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, was received, announcing that the Senate had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the House in relation to the enrollment of House bill No. 3869; also that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. No. 721) to authorize the appointment of V. McNally as an ordnance storekeeper in the Army, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested. The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

A bill (S. No. 469) to provide for the sale of certain Kickapoo Indian lands in Kansas;

A bill (S. No. 506) authorizing the board of commissioners of the Soldiers' Home to sell certain property at Harrodsburgh, Kentucky, belonging to the Soldiers' Home;

A bill (S. No. 1255) to provide for the sale of a part of the reservation of the Omaha tribe of Indians in the State of Nebraska, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 1367) for the relief of H. C. Linn; and

A bill (S. No. 1413) making an appropriation for continuing the improvement of Memphis Harbor, in the State of Tennessee.

TARIFF-COMMISSION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, it is possible to appreciate, but it is not possible to express the embarrassment under which I labor on this occasion. At the close of the day's debate, and after so many exhaustive speeches upon this subject, I do not expect to say anything either new or novel. The ground has been thoroughly trodden over. The reapers of Boaz have so thoroughly gathered and garnered the field that there is nothing left behind them for a modest and unpretentious Ruth like myself to glean. [Laughter.] I am, then, only going to indulge perhaps in some of the hackneyed phrases which have been worn threadbare in this discussion. I do not think the facts can be too often stated. I do not think that even the scroll of the heavens could contain the enormities, the outrages, and absurd iniquities of this tariff system.

This tariff discussion has been conducted at such great length that I doubt not the outside world is beginning to conclude that Congressmen "think they are under a sacramental obligation to exhaust every subject with a prolixity which scorns consideration of the preciousness of time and the brevity of human life." Yet, notwithstanding the great length to which this discussion has been extended, I shall ask the indulgence of the committee while I state as briefly as possible some of my objections to the bill, and discuss in a general way the subject to which it relates.

We are all familiar with it. It is infamous enough itself; it is a confession in avoidance and a confession in ignorantia, and it is a direct assertion that the great body of the American Congress, elected by a constituency as broad as the whole country, is unqualified and incapable of dealing with the great economic questions which are presented for our consideration.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That a commission is hereby created to be called the tariff commission, to consist of nine members.

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint nine commissioners from civil life, one of whom, the first named, shall be the president of the commission. The commissioners shall receive as compensation for their services each at the rate of $10 per day when engaged in active duty, and actual traveling and other necessary expenses. The commission shall have power to employ a stenographer and a messenger; and the foregoing compensation and expenses to be audited and paid by the Secretary of the Treasury out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of said commission to take into consideration and to thoroughly investigate all the various questions relating to the agricultural, commercial, mercantile, manufacturing, mining, and industrial interests of the United States, so far as the same may be necessary to the establishment of a judicious tariff, or a revision of the existing tariff and the existing system of internal-revenue laws, upon a scale of justice to all interests; and for the purpose of fully examining the matters which may come before it, said commission in the prosecution of its inquiries is empowered to visit such different portions and sections of the country as it may deem advisable.

SEC. 4. That the commission shall report to Congress the results of their investigation, and the testimony taken in the course of the same from time to time, and make their final report not later than the first Monday in January, 1883.

This bill is an organic injustice. It delegates powers of a quasi-legislative character to nine civilians, or experts. And, by the way, gentlemen of the House, the word expert in the last ten years has been made as odious in the American world as the Shakespearean word "occupy." It has a vague, general, indiscriminate signification that is extremely repulsive to all thinking minds.

This bill has one of two objects in view: either to secure delay in the matter of revising the tariff, or to secure a revision in the interest of a high protective system.

I pause here and ask any friend of this bill, any friend of protection, any friend of the existing tariff, if in any of the papers on file in this House the name of a single farmer appears as demanding or urging the passage of the bill. We have without number the petitions of the manufacturing interests of every section, signed, I doubt not, by their own employés, whose bread and meat and the shelter over the heads of whose families depend upon the dictum of their employers. I have no doubt we have cart-loads of such petitions on file here; but I ask gentlemen who are pleading for the passage of the bill to answer if the name of a single producer of the great cereals of America is on file in favor of its passage?

Railroads doubtless petition for it; banks petition for it; the cotton manufacturers petition for it; the spinners of wool petition for it; manufacturers of Bessemer steel petition for it; the manufacturers of iron petition for it; and I ask you gentlemen on the other side who are presumed to be the especial champions of this bill, if in all the annals of the literature of petition on this subject the name of a single American farmer appears? They are satisfied that they have been made for years the victims of this odious system of protection; and every paper on file asking for relief to the muscle that toils in the corn and tobacco fields in this great country asks for relief from the invidious, proscriptive, infamous system that discriminates against their labor and in favor of the capital and the protected industries of the land. There is not very much poetry in this sort of statement, gentlemen, but it is God's eternal truth.

These people who are protected by the present system may go on for a few years in riot, in the enjoyment of the splendid incomes which our present system secures to them; but I say that the time is not far distant when you will be called to an exact account by the American people that have been so long plundered by your infamous exactions. If the Republican party needed nothing else to damn it in the estimation of all right-thinking people, the fact that it is the author of the Morrill tariff bill is enough in the eyes of God and men to consign it to the infamy of an absolute and unconditional perdition. I do not mean the hell that is spoken of in this new translation of the Bible, but I mean the old, orthodox, unconditional hell of King James's version. [Laughter and applause.] I am not a new-translation man; I belive in an orthodox hell; and when I look on that side of the House and contemplate the iniquities of this infernal tariff system I realize the necessity of a hell. [Great laughter and applause.]

This bill, then, delegates the powers that belong to the American Congress to nine civilian experts to be chosen by an accidental President, hostile in his political views to a majority of the American people. It is an absolute surrender of the powers and privileges of this House delegated to it by the Constitution, which provides that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. What does it propose? It delegates to nine men powers and duties which by the Constitution of the United States belong exclusively to Congress. Is it not a humiliating spectacle that the representatives of the American people in this the highest deliberative body in the world should make the confession that they are incompetent to execute the high trust confided to them and to discharge the most vital functions of Government which they were elected and are paid to carry into effect?

I say to you gentlemen over on that side of the House that if this bill becomes a law by your votes, in all conscience you ought to contribute out of your salaries enough to pay the expenses of these nine civilian experts. You were sent here to revise this tariff. You were elected to devise ways and means for carrying on this Government. If you admit your incapacity and delegate your powers and reprogatives to nine paid civilians, by every principle of common honesty known among men you ought to pay the expenses yourselves. That would make an enormous difference, I take it, in the votes on that side if it were tacked on as an amendment. [Laughter.]

Amid all the screaming and howling virtue on the Republican side of this House reduction of salaries is not one of their distinguishing and peculiar characteristics. Seventy-five cents a day would be very fair pay for a man who votes for this bill. [Laughter.] I hope gentlemen will not get impatient with me; I have not occupied the attention of this House more than six hours in six years. [Cries of "Go ahead!"]

Now, let me inquire of gentlemen who advocate the passage of this bill where the members to compose this commission are to come from, and in what manner this extra-judicial commission is to be constituted? Are you to let the Irish have representation? There has been a great outcry in this House about demanding the release of the suspects on the other side of the Atlantic now in British prisons, with which I thoroughly sympathize. Our Irish population constitutes an important factor in our cosmopolite nationality. Are you going to give the German element representation? They believe in personal liberty, and they are afraid of these fanatical people on the other side who advocate temperance bills and take a drink five times a day. [Laughter.]

Those gentlemen also occasionally, in a spirit of unusual and extraordinary morality, advocate the passage of bills for the government of Utah that will wipe out all the iniquities of the polygamic system and leave untouched the plain system of fornication known elsewhere. [Laughter.] But, gentlemen, I do not impugn your virtue; God knows that in my judgment there is not a single man in the House who is not as pure and as immaculate as the icicle that hangs on Diana's temple. [Laughter.] I am not here to make invidious allusions or comparisons; I only know that the Republican party occasionally experiences a spasm of virtue that generally ends in smoke, and nothing else. While they claim to be the God-and-morality party, they have ways very much like an average sinner. [Laughter.]

Again, I ask, are these commissioners to come from the great valley of the Mississippi River, which is the grand food-producing basin of the United States, and whose people are more interested in the free exchange of products than any other people on the face of this hemisphere? Are they to come from protected New England? Are they to come from the growing States on the Pacific coast? And, by the way, I see the benevolent face of my friend from California [Mr. PAGE] beaming on me like an anti-Chinese lantern. [Laughter.] I ask him if he wants the Pacific coast left out in the general make-up of this commission? I ask the Representatives of New England if they want their spindles and their water-power at Lawrence and Lowell to be represented in the composition of this extraordinary quasi-judicial commission which is left to the discretion of President Arthur? Are there to be representatives of all these sections and interests? And, in addition, are they to be the beneficiaries or the victims of the present infernal and iniquitous tariff system?

The English language has too great poverty of expression to properly convey to the American people an idea of the incongruities, the enormities, and the absurdities of the present tariff. Are they to be intelligent and impartial citizens, having no political or sectional interests to subserve, but anxious only to promote the general welfare of the whole country? My God, gentlemen, how rare such a character is to-day! How few of us, (and I speak in a general sense,) how few of us in casting our votes upon any great measure of public policy consider what its effect is to be upon the whole country! Rather do we consider how it is going to affect us in securing our own nominations in the race for seats in this House.

How will this affect, not New England, not the Mississippi basin, not the Pacific coast, but the whole country? And I ask you gentlemen who are fair-minded, it matters not what your political convictions may be, I put it to you personally, if in the adjudication of the great economic questions that are presented for the consideration of the American Congress we give them that broad national scope of observation and regard which by virtue of the high positions we hold here we ought to give them? Or do we narrow to a district what should be designed for the whole country? I want to ask those gentlemen on the other side if the agricultural, the mechanical, and the manufacturing interests shall all be fairly represented on this commission? What assurance have you from President Arthur that it shall be so constituted?

I served here in the Forty-sixth Congress, and remember that it was pretty generally understood among us all what sort of bills Mr. Hayes was going to veto, and what sort he was going to sign. I hope no such era is to be inaugurated under the new régime.

I ask you, gentlemen, if these great interests—and I ask you in common fairness if they are not great interests—the mechanical, agricultural, and all the industrial interests of the country will be represented on this commission? Will the farmer? No, gentlemen; the farmer has taken a back seat in this House for the last forty years. He has scarcely an advocate on this floor. How many have appeared here with a bill in the exclusive interest of the great farming industry of the country? You apply for special relief for injustice alleged to have been done to the manufacturing industries; but who ever came before this Congress asking in the name of this great producing energy a single solitary measure for its relief?

I ask, then, again if the farmer is to be on that commission? Do not tell me that the farmers have not intelligence enough to serve on any commission this House could authorize. Do not tell me that the farming interest is not sufficiently vast to require and demand a representation upon a commission so important to the American people as this. Will it be represented?

Will the banker, the merchant, the mechanic, the manufacturer, the railroads, the ship-owners, the ship-builders, the salaried and waged laborers of the country—will they all have representation upon a commission so vital to all their important interests?

And, by the way, gentlemen, the salaried and wage laborers of this country have as much interest in this bill as anybody else. Who pays any attention to them? They represent about eight-tenths of the whole body of the American people. Eight-tenths of our whole population make their living by the sweat of their brows, by tilling the soil, by working in the shops, the blacksmith-shops, the carpenter-shops, and all the varied industries of the land, or depend for sustenance upon the labor of those who are so employed. The salaried and wage laborers of the land are those who need and require protection.

Capital is cautious, conservative, and self-protective. You may put a man with a hundred thousand dollars in the wilds of Senegambia, and he is a comparatively free man, for he can buy all the African princes necessary to secure his safe return to the coast. It is not such men who require the protection of the law.

It is the men who work twelve hours a day to support their wives and children, to supply them with bread and meat, and shelter over their heads, who require the protection of American legislators. They are the people for whom protective laws should be specially designed; not with a view to do any injustice to the moneyed interest; not with a view of doing any injustice to railroad or other corporations, but upon the broad catholic and benign principle that the helpless always demand the strong protective power of the law.

I appeal to you, gentlemen, who differ from me in sentiment, to know if it is not true that the legislation of the past twenty years has been in the interest of banks and bankers and railroad corporations and the great protected interests of the land? I ask any gentleman here to point me to a single statute that adorns the statute-book of our country that is designed expressly and exclusively for the interests of the farming people.

They cannot wine you and dine you. They have no paid and salaried lobby here to protect their interests. The great majority of them are poor. Your corridors are not crowded with the salaried agents of the farming interests. But you cannot start out of one of these corridors without running across a railroad lobbyist; without running afoul of a man who wants to recharter the national banks; without running afoul of the man who wants to protect the salt interest; without running afoul of a man who is in favor of the protection of the iron interest. Not a single farmer is to be heard from, either by himself or his agents, in these corridors. Producing all the wealth of the country, establishing its prosperity, he stands in legislation representing seven-tenths of the whole population of the United States; he stands here without a lobby and comparatively without a friend. I conjure you, gentlemen, to think of the idea of delegating the great and important interests of the farmers of this country to such a set of wet-nurses. [Laughter.] This infant is too nearly strangled and starved by abstemiousness and by ill-feeding to hope that its life can be preserved by surrendering it to such an infernal foundling asylum as that. [Laughter.]

Now, I ask your attention respectfully to another idea. I am not trying to say anything new on this subject, because the ground has been trodden over very thoroughly. I am only attempting, like a good cook, to make the fare of yesterday passable again to-day by a varied dressing. I am putting more sauce into this thing than usual. [Laughter.] Under the provisions of this bill the President may exercise an absolute discretion in the selection of members of the commission. He may, if he chooses, appoint every one of the members from a single protected industry. He may take every one of them from your Bessemer-steel men; he may take every one of them from your wool men; he may take every one of them from the representatives of any of the interests that are here on this floor to-day, or are here through their paid lobbyists in the corridors of this Capitol.

I now come to the consideration of a question which I approach with many misgivings. I do not want to say anything unkind; it is not in my nature. [Laughter.] I have served here a long time; and I appeal to gentlemen on both sides of the House if I have not been uniformly courteous and considerate of their feelings. But I am going to discuss a question which has somewhat of personality in it. I trust I shall be able to deal with it with that degree of deftness which will leave no sting behind. I come to contemplate the Committee on Ways and Means, and I pause in order to allow the average Congressional mind to grasp the vastness of this subject. [Laughter.]

Now I desire to ask why has not the Committee on Ways and Means, that mighty body which is the arbiter elegantiarum of this House, and which controls absolutely its economic destinies, why has not this Committee revised the tariff? Is it possible that they are willing to confess in the face of Heaven and men that they are incapable of grappling with the grand questions which are referred to them by this House? I am not disposed, gentlemen, to entertain as poor an opinion of that committee as they seem by their acts to entertain of themselves, and, God knows, modesty is not the weakness of the average American Congressman. [Laughter.] It seems to me that a sub-committee of the Committee on Ways and Means might be constituted consisting of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] whom I see before me, my colleague, [Mr. CARLISLE,] the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MORRISON,] thus embracing three great representatives of each of the two great political parties which are so nearly equally divided in this House and in the whole country.

Here is a sub-committee selected in a spirit of fairness, three of one party, and three of the other, representing the intelligence, the experience, the capacity of the two great political parties that are struggling for mastery in this country. I would have more confidence personally in the recommendations of such a sub-committee than in all the partisan commissions that President Arthur could select during the remainder of his official life. Here are men chosen by the American people, undergoing the cross-fire of adverse political criticism in their own districts, bringing to this House the prima facie fact that the people whom they have the honor to represent have indorsed them and expressed confidence in their wisdom, their fairness, and their justice. If we could have a sub-committee like this, consisting of three gentlemen on each side representing the two great political parties in this country, I ask gentlemen of this House if they would not have more confidence in the finding of that sub-committee than in this commission of wet nurses? What say you, gentlemen? I pause for one minute to know if any man in this House, Republican or Democrat, differs from me in that statement. [Mr. WHITE rose.] Oh, John, sit down. [Laughter.] I do not mean any offense to my colleague. "Then none have I offended. I have done no more to Cæsar than you should do to Brutus." [Laughter. Mr. WHITE again rose.] I have given you a sub-committee composed of an equal number of the two great political parties represented on this floor; and I ask whether you would not have confidence in the wisdom of their conclusions?

Mr. WHITE. I beg my colleague's pardon for interrupting him——

Mr. McKENZIE. It is no interruption.

Mr. WHITE. My colleague said he would pause for reply; and I thought if I did not reply he might consider that I was agreeing with him.

Mr. McKENZIE. No, indeed; I did not conclude that; I knew you did not. I knew you too well for that, John. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman from Kentucky permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. McKENZIE. With great pleasure.

Mr. ROBESON. I would like to ask the gentleman why, when he makes up his sub-committee of the leaders of the two parties on that committee, he leaves off the representative leader on the Democratic side of the House, its late Speaker?

Mr. McKENZIE. Because it is not usual to constitute a sub-committee out of the whole committee.

Mr. ROBESON. Why, in selecting representative men for his sub-committee, does he not put on that committee the gentleman whom his party selected as their representative?

Mr. McKENZIE. I always make it a rule to pick out the best men I can find. [Laughter.] And by that language I mean to cast no colorable reflection.

Mr. McMILLIN. I suppose, too, that my friend from Kentucky does not want two of them, one-third, from the same State?

Mr. ROBESON. I do not care what State they come from as long as they are the representative men.

Mr. McKENZIE. Kentucky generally sends as good people here as anybody else.

Mr. CANDLER. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. McKENZIE. Certainly.

Mr. CANDLER. I should like to ask him if we do not have the advantage of the ability and experience of the gentlemen he has named after we have received the report of the commission.

Mr. McKENZIE. I will answer that by inquiring of the gentleman from Massachusetts what avenues of information are open to this wet-nurse commission that are not equally open to this House?

Mr. CANDLER. I will answer the gentleman. He presents an exaggerated statement, which is not sustained, when he criticises the commission proposed by this bill. We shall have advantages in that commission in seeking information from the farmers whom he refers to as well as from the manufacturers.

Mr. McKENZIE. You use the personal pronoun "we." To whom do you refer?

Mr. CANDLER. When you stated that a wet-nurse commission will be appointed, it is something for which you have no authority. We have a right to believe that the President of the United States will appoint an intelligent commission, one that will command the respect of the country.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is not this an intelligent House?

Mr. CANDLER. After the report of the commission it will be dealt with as it deserves.

Mr. McKENZIE. This body represents the intelligence of the American people. There is as much intelligence outside of it as there is here, and more, too, perhaps. [Great laughter.] But these Representatives were selected because of their intelligence and supposed fitness for their position upon this floor.

Now, I ask the gentleman, in a Yankee way, a question. Does he suppose a finer body of experts can be selected outside of this House than in it?

Mr. CANDLER. I do not want a body of experts. If I could appoint the commission I would appoint, and I hope the President will, men of established reputation and character, who, after they have investigated this matter, will give an opinion which will be of value to the whole country. It is not alone that we want a commission that can make a report, but we want to get the truth from the people, and we can get it in no better way than this.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman will pardon me. It is not the duty or part of the duty of this commission to give opinions, it is simply to collate facts; and I ask him if he is willing to concede the fact that a commission appointed by President Arthur has more capacity to collate facts with the great body of statistics open before us, than any committee that may be appointed by this House?

Mr. CANDLER. No, sir. I believe from this House, Mr. Chairman, we can select men well qualified for that position.

Mr. McKENZIE. Do not take up too much of my time.

Mr. CANDLER. But experience in this House and out of it satisfies us that it requires more time than any committee of this House can have.

Mr. McKENZIE. I cannot yield further. If the gentleman from Massachusetts knew how many more good things I have to say he would not take up so much of my time. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANDLER. That is the reason you want a proper commission to investigate facts in detail and to discriminate.

Mr. McKENZIE. It would take me five years to give the enormities and iniquities of this thing in detail. I am now only generalizing. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, if I had time I would ask the indulgence of this committee while I analyzed this proposition. Here is this Committee on Ways and Means, a committee of thirteen members, consisting of Messrs. KELLEY, KASSON, DUNNELL, MCKINLEY, jr., HUBBELL, HASKELL, RUSSELL, ERRETT, RANDALL, TUCKER, CARLISLE, MORRISON, and SPEER.

If I were to refer to the Congressional Directory, the finest repository of suppressed vanity that God Almighty ever permitted, [great laughter and applause,] I could satisfy you that divine wisdom never permitted a book to emanate from the American press which contained as much modest assumption. [Renewed laughter.] Suppose I were to entertain the House upon the theory that this bill is a confession of weakness, that it is a confession that the Committee on Ways and Means of this House are not equal, intellectually, to the great task of grappling with the subject of the tariff—and I submit to every member upon this floor, in common fairness and justice, if the bill does not show that to be the fact? Suppose, following out that idea, I were to refer to the biographical sketches so kindly furnished to Mr. Ben: Perley Poore by these gentlemen themselves; suppose I were to trace out the intellectual estimates placed upon themselves by these gentlemen—and I presume they wrote the biographies themselves. [Laughter.] But I will not do it, because I have not now time. Still I invite the attention of the House and the country to the modest, shrinking, girlish estimate placed upon themselves by these God-fearing men. [Laughter and applause.]

I had begun to think, Mr. Chairman, that I had manifested a spirit of modesty myself, a sort of shrinking nature upon the floor of the House, but when I came to read these sketches by the members of the Committee on Ways and Means published in the Congressional Directory, I felt that I had been bold, self-assuming, and presumptuous, and was no longer entitled to believe myself a modest man. [Renewed laughter.] I invite attention to them; no more interesting reading exists in the annals of literature since the Canterbury Tales were written. [Laughter.] Look at the ages of these men. They are no spring chickens. [Renewed laughter.] They are about as thoroughly matured a set of individuals as I have ever encountered in this House. I thought I had the whole matter before me here, unless some of them have been too modest to insert it in the RECORD; but I will not take up the time of the committee now by reading them; still, if gentlemen choose to look they will find here about as interesting reading as they ever came across, and they will see that the compiler of this directory has succeeded in getting their ages, I suppose after the fashion of the census officers, who, when they found an old maid who declined to give her age, declared that they would set her down at eighty years, by which they generally managed to get a response. [Laughter.]

As the Represenative of 180,000 people on this floor I demand of these gentlemen who support this bill that they inform this House what necessity exists for making the Executive the autocrat of the legislative department? We have had a good deal of experience in this commission business. In the Forty-fourth Congress we created a commission that did not turn out in a very satisfactory sort of way. [Laughter.] It succeeded in foisting upon the American people as the President of the United States a man who had as much moral right to the office as I have to a quarter section of land in the moon; and, by the way, it was an administration that will go down in history remarkable for but two things, weak vetoes and cold water at state dinners. [Great laughter.] I will ask the untamed patriots on the Republican side of the House what is the necessity of placing in the hands of an accidental President the power to create the commission? Why not create it ourselves? Have you no confidence in your fellow-members? I have, on this side of the aisle. [Laughter.]

Will not your constituents—and I use the pronoun "your" when I refer to the members who will vote for this enormity—will not your constituents say to you when you shall have enacted this bill into law by your votes, that you have confessed your weakness, confessed your inability to deal with the great economic questions presented for your consideration? Will they not say you have degraded the legislative department of the Government by avoiding the duties which they imposed upon you?

Suppose you had decided to delegate the power to appoint this commission to the Supreme Court of the United States; and I ask my eminent lawyer friend, the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] to give attention to this. If you had delegated the power to appoint this commission to tax the people to the Supreme Court of the United States, under the law, would that not be as much in conformity with constitutional authority? I want my distinguished friend from New Jersey to pay attention; for when I state a legal proposition I turn instinctively toward the Nestor of the profession.

Mr. ROBESON. I will answer if the gentleman will not tell me to sit down.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I ask your attention to it, asserting that I have no disposition to sit down on you. [Laughter.] Well, if you will not answer I will ask you an easier one next time. [Renewed laughter.]

But I invite attention to that broad question. I have been dealing in generalities; now I ask attention to something that comes directly home to everybody who hears me. What will you do with the report of this commission when you get it? What use will you make of the report of these civilian experts when it is made? I have no doubt they will drink as much wine, smoke as many twenty-five-cent cigars, interview as many "leading" manufacturers, visit the hospitable homes of as many people, and be entertained in as sumptuous a manner as they entertain at state dinners. I have no doubt they will visit Mr. Nimmo, and perhaps refer to my speech for their statistical information. [Laughter.] I invite their attention to it. [Great laughter.]

But after it is all done, after this laborious effort is made, I ask you, as representatives of the American people, what are you going to do about it? [Laughter.] Do you intend to adopt it upon the idea that these people know immeasurably more about the true theory of revenue and protection than we do? An angel direct from Heaven could not make a revelation in regard to the general literature of protection that would illuminate some members on that side of the House. [Laughter.] Are you going to admit the conclusions of these people; are you going to admit that their conclusions are wiser than any that could possibly be arrived at by the nearly four hundred representatives sent here by the people to look after their interests? Whence their superiority? They ought to go home and run for Congress. If these people are so much our intellectual and moral superiors, if they are able to deal with these questions, divesting themselves of all partisan prejudices, if they are able to deal with them in a spirit of fairness, justice, and liberality toward every section, then why in the name of all that is wonderful do not the American people recognize their superior abilities and send them here to Congress in place of this Committee on Ways and Means, that solemnly and gravely admits, in the face of God and men, that they have not the ability to tackle this question? [Laughter.] I feel sorry for that committee; I think of it in the night-watches. It excites the commiseration of a heart naturally tender, when I awake at night and think that the American people are here through their representatives, with a Committee on Ways and Means that comes before the House and blubberingly says, "We cannot tackle this thing ourselves, but we have got a gang of fellows outside that are able to do it at $10 per day and found." [Laughter.]

I want to ask you another question on the subject of iron, (and that is where the iron enters into my soul;) on the subject of iron will the consumers or manufacturers be heard or heeded before this august tribunal of nine? On the subject of woolen goods will the ragged and suffering poor that pay the enormous duty on the wool and the manufactured product that constitutes their miserable squalid covering have an audience? Or will the rich owners of the million spindles and the lordly proprietors of the herds upon a thousand hills be listened to and obeyed? Will ear be given to the plaints of the lowly, the stricken, the oppressed, and an effort made to relieve their grievances? Or will these doctrinaires be wined and dined by the manufacturing and protected interests, and listen to appeals whereby the thumb-screws of taxation and protection can be so applied as to wring an additional penny from the unwilling hand of penury and want? [Applause.] Will the shivering, ague-stricken people of our malarial bottoms be listened to in their cry for untaxed medicinal herbs, or will the quinine kings of Philadelphia and New York be heard in their effort to restore a tax on quinine which, if ever enacted, should be styled "An act for the promotion of malarial fever?"

These are questions, as Lord Byron said, at once answerless and yet incessant; they appeal to our sense of justice and to all the finer, higher, and nobler instincts and impulses of our better natures.

Little as you may think it, gentlemen, Republicans are not wholly depraved. [Great laughter.] I say this in the interest of humanity; I say this for the general credit of our common country. It is an admission not extorted from me, but voluntarily made because I realize it, and I ask them, notwithstanding the great burden of sin and iniquity that hangs upon them like a cloud, notwithstanding the great dust and smoke that obscure the few good actions they have done, I ask them in the name of the shivering people of our malarial bottoms, I ask them in the interest of the half-naked and half-starved people of the whole country if they are willing to perpetuate a system for mere party supremacy that works so great ill and injustice to that class of our people that needs the protection of your laws. Do not all answer at once, gentlemen. [Laughter.]

Will Wall street have a voice in this business? And the national banks, those blessed institutions that have brought such untold and incalculable benefits upon our poor tax-payers—will they have a voice, together with other moneyed monopolies, to secure relief from the imaginary grievances of which they complain? Or will the hard-fisted farmer, clad in the humble habiliments of hodden-gray that befit his calling, be able to secure audience and obtain redress for the real grievances under which he is now and has for so long a time been laboring?

We hear our friends on the other side howl about the Democratic opposition to the rechartering of the national banks. Gentlemen, if the Democratic party never made any other record that was honorable to it, if it never made any other record in the interests of the whole people rather than a protected few, it is the fact that we have got that national-bank interest as the under dog in this fight, and we intend to keep it there if we have to stay here all summer. [Applause.]

I ask you if you are going to adopt this system as a whole, or will you reject it? or what will you do with it? A distinguished Senator said a few days ago at the other end of the Capitol—I mean Senator ALLISON—that he would vote for this bill because it secured nonaction for two years. And another member of that body, older in service and not less distinguished, said that it was the duty of the American Congress when that bill came before it to adopt it without change and without question. The meaning of all this is that the existing system, cursed of God and abhorred of man, is to be continued indefinitely by a postponement of the subject, or, if changed at all, it is to be made still more protective and oppressive upon the great body of American taxpayers and consumers of manufactured articles.

The time has come when the people of America demand relief from this odious, this infamous protective system. We have a country too broad and too grand for such a miserable and restricted policy. It may do in France, it may do in any country of Europe whose territory is only equal to one of our great States; but for a country like ours, a country bounded on the north and the south almost by the poles of the earth, a country reaching through dozens of degrees of longitude, a country rocked and cradled in the roar of two oceans, the idea of applying a principle so protective, contracted, and proscriptive is ridiculous and unjust, and will eventually be repudiated by the American people. We cannot, as the representatives of fifty million people living under a system of government that guarantees to every man equal rights under the law, afford to foster and protect and further foist upon the people a system that is in contravention of every principle of their laws and of their civilization.

Mr. WHITE. Will my colleague allow me to ask him if he in common with the rest of our delegation did not receive a letter from our own people asking for protection on hemp?

Mr. MCKENZIE. I did not.

Mr. WHITE. And does he not know that the cattle men in our State are very anxious about protection on cattle against the system which has been established in England, and which costs him and me, for we are both farmers, $20 to $30 a head upon our cattle, and which is a total loss?

Mr. MCKENZIE. No; I did not receive any such letter. And I desire to say that I would not be in favor of the protection on hemp even if there was no Republican party in existence. [Great laughter.]

Mr. WHITE. Does my colleague mean to say that he does not want the hemp used on his side of the House?

Mr. MCKENZIE. I stick to what I said. There may be occasionally a Democrat that needs hanging, but it is only the exception, not the general rule. [Continued laughter.]

Mr. WHITE. It is only the exception that gets it.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I hope my colleague will not interrupt me on the question of hemp. If he has no more important question than that to ask, I hope he will allow me to proceed in my humble way until I get through with this thing.

Mr. WHITE. I beg pardon of my colleague. But in all seriousness I desire to say that I have before me a letter asking for protection on hemp.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I know you have, but I have not had the honor to receive it, and I would not vote for such a thing, if every man, woman, and child who has ever been in Kentucky from 1792 until to-day were to petition me to do it.

Mr. CARLISLE. Will my colleague allow me to make a statement in response to the statement of the gentleman from the ninth district of Kentucky? The growers of hemp in Kentucky in convention passed a resolution declaring explicitly that they agreed with the Kentucky Representatives on the subject of protection; but so long as other articles manufactured in this country were protected they thought they were justly entitled to have at least the small measure of protection that they now have under the law.

Mr. WHITE. Will my colleague allow me to read the resolution, if there is any dispute about it?

Mr. McKENZIE. There is no dispute about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUSSELL. I move that the gentleman's time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. For how long?

Mr. ROBESON. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman is speaking directly upon the subject, and I wish to hear him.

Mr. McKENZIE. Whenever there is the slightest indication that the House wants me to stop, I do not propose to go an inch further. [Cries of "Go on!" "Go on?"] I want the electrician to light up here, for I have some additional facts, as little as you may think it, that bear on this question. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE. I ask my colleague——

Many MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. McKENZIE. I cannot afford to be discourteous to my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state the question before the gentleman proceeds. The request is made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McKENZIE] be allowed to proceed without limit. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. WHITE. My colleague was kind enough to allow my colleague from the sixth district [Mr. CARLISLE] to make a statement.

Mr. McKENZIE. And I will yield to you with equal pleasure.

Mr. WHITE. Now, that there may be no misunderstanding about this matter, I desire to read but three or four lines:

Resolved by the hemp-growers of Kentucky, That we are in full accord with our Senators and Representatives in Congress on the tariff question, but desire that, while any other interest is protected by the General Government, the hemp interest of the country shall have that protection; and we respectfully request that they watch this interest in our behalf.

P. P. JOHNSTON, President.
R. H. PREWITT, Secretary.

That shows clearly that as long as there is any protection in the country they want the same protection on hemp. Kentucky produces 80 per cent. of all the hemp grown in the country, and they want as high protection on that as there is on any other product. I would therefore like to know if the State of Kentucky, as far as hemp is concerned, is not a protective State?

Mr. CARLISLE. It has protection to the amount of 19 per cent. ad valorem, and no more, against 100 per cent. on other articles.

Mr. WHITE. In addition to that, we are assured that we lose $20 a head on our cattle in the European market.

Mr. McKENZIE. Now I come to another hard-pan fact. I ask the attention of both sides of the House when I say that the authors and supporters of this measure mean simply to secure delay in the matter of tariff legislation—to bridge over the time between now and the next Presidential election, when possibly the "old man" will have something to say about what the Republican party shall do. The meaning of all this is, then, that the existing tariff is to be maintained by a postponement of the subject, or if the tariff be changed at all, it is to be made more protective and oppressive.

Mr. Chairman, the Morrill tariff in force to-day imposes an average duty of over 45 per cent. upon all dutiable articles. It is the highest tariff we have ever had during the entire history of our tariff legislation. Besides, it is a war tariff. It was not gotten up in time of peace, for the raising of revenue to carry on the Government, but was adopted in the midst of the greatest civil conflict that ever convulsed a nation in modern times; yet not a single change has been made in it from that day to this, except the effort made in the Forty-sixth Congress to show the beneficent results of free trade, when that drug which relieves tertian ague was put on the free list in the interest of common humanity, and against the protest of some of the protectionists.

Will the House pardon me if I say that I indulge a reasonable pride in the fact that I happened to be the author of that bill, which has secured a reduction of 78 cents an ounce upon an article which is as necessary as flour in the domestic economy of every household? Notwithstanding the howl which went up from the quinine kings of Philadelphia that it would break down their interests, it has secured a reduction of 78 cents upon every ounce of the sulphate and salts of quinine, while at the same time two additional manufactories of those sulphates and salts have been erected since the passage of that bill. In order to show that there has been in fact a reduction of 78 cents per ounce on quinine since the passage of that act, I refer to the following table, prepared by J. S. Moore, esq., a gentleman thoroughly familiar with this subject:

January, 1879, to June 30, 1879, price of taxed quinine	$3 63
July 1, 1879, to December 31, 1879, price of free quinine	3 29
Saving per ounce	34
The year 1877, taxed quinine	3 76
The year 1880, free quinine	3 03
Saving per ounce	73
The year 1878, taxed quinine	3 54
The year 1881, free quinine	2 47½
Saving per ounce	1 06½

Or, if you want it still shorter, the average from January 1, 1877, to July 1, 1879, (two and a half years,) with duty on, was $3.64½. The average price of free quinine during two and a half years, from July, 1879, to December, 1881, was $2.86. Therefore the average reduction was 78 cents per ounce.

While it is not always true that the American manufacturer adds the full amount of the duty to the price of his product, yet it has been estimated by those most competent to judge, and has never been disproved, that upon the average he adds to his price at least two-thirds of the duty imposed upon the foreign article; or, in other words, he stops just short of the point which would permit the foreign article to compete with him, and thus secures absolute possession and control of the home market. In this way he inflicts two evils upon the country and the people. In the first place he prevents the Government from receiving any revenue from the article which otherwise would be imported, and in the second place he compels the American farmer and other consumers to pay him from 25 to 40 per cent. for his article more than it is really worth, its real value being what it would sell for in the open market in competition with like products from every other place.

To illustrate the operation of this rule we may take the article of salt. The very highest quality of salt imported into this country during the last fiscal year cost on an average at the place of production 3 mills per pound, or about 16¼ cents per bushel, while all the other qualities of salt imported during the same time cost 1 mill per pound, or about 5½ cents per bushel. Now the duty on the quality of salt first mentioned is 39 per cent. ad valorem, while the duty on the lower grade of salt, mostly used by farmers in curing meats and for ordinary domestic purposes, is 69 per cent. ad valorem.

There was manufactured in this country during the year 1880 salt to the value of $4,817,636, and the consumers of salt throughout the country have been compelled to pay to salt manufacturers here at home from 20 to 40 per cent. on this sum of $4,817,636 more than they would have been required to pay if salt had been free of duty, for the reason that two-thirds of the duty is always added to the price of the domestic product. So that it will be seen that this enormous bonus or bounty is payable to the salt manufacturer, and the Government gets not one dollar of it.

The product of our domestic manufactures of woolen goods, such as blankets, flannels, cloths, cassimeres, &c., articles of absolute necessity in this climate, amounted during the year 1880 to $266,998,454. The average rate of duty on such goods is over 60 per cent. Now, if 40 per cent. or two-thirds of the duty was added to the price of the domestic article, then the people paid as a bounty to the manufacturers of these goods during that year over $80,000,000; in other words, if this class of woolen goods could have been admitted free of duty, the consumers of such goods could have procured precisely the same quality and same quantity for more than $80,000,000 less than they were actually compelled to pay.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while this war tariff with its burdens on the poor remains substantially the same, (and I defy anybody to contradict me,) the income tax, the stamp tax on documents, the license taxes, and every tax upon the surplus wealth of the country has long since been repealed. The special license tax upon lawyers (and more than two-thirds of the members of this House are lawyers) has been repealed. The burden has been taken off of you, gentlemen, and off of your profession; but I ask you whether the great burdens of this tariff system do not bear with equal hardship to-day upon the great producing interests of the country as they did when this tariff was enacted as a war measure, and the people were assured that, as the original act embraced a tax on bank-checks, a tax on professions, a tax on incomes, the wealth of the country was to be made to bear its correlative proportion of the great burden of supporting that civil conflict, thereby quieting the murmurings of the farmer, the artisan, and the mechanic. I ask you, gentlemen, to-day whether every burden upon the lawyer, the doctor, the banker, the broker, every tax upon the income of the rich has not been repealed while these burdens upon the poor remain substantially the same?

I now come to a beautiful piece of literature which I have collated with great pains. Do we not all remember that since this session began the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. HASKELL,] whom I do not now see in his seat, acknowledged the infamy and the outrage of this tariff system, and the Committee on Ways and Means concurred in the acknowledgment? Did he not report here from the Committee on Ways and Means, by unanimous consent, a bill to enable some benevolent people in England to send here the half-worn clothes of the effete nobility over there to clothe the shapely limbs of the half-naked negro children in Kansas who left comfortable homes in Kentucky and elsewhere to go after the ignis fatuus of personal liberty, which in a negro's mind means absolute exemption from labor, which they hoped to find in Kansas. Did we not all vote for that measure? And do not gentlemen remember the question which I put to the gentleman from Kansas as a humanitarian; for I know he is not only a man of large ability but a man of strong humanitarian impulses; and I sympathized with him in his efforts to clothe those half-naked negroes. I said to him: "Sir, why not make this measure applicable to the whole body of the American people?" Is not a white man as good as a negro if he behaves himself? [Laughter.]

Is it to go forth to the American people that the poor, half-clad, half-starved operatives of our manufacturing industries, the poorly clad and poorly paid employés of our agricultural industries, are to suffer, with no Congressional enactment to enable them to be clothed without the payment of the duty on wool and its manufactured products? Are we willing to go upon record as asserting that this is a benign and God-like principle applied to a half-naked negro, but that the old system ought to be kept in force as applied to a miserable white man?

Do we not remember Mr. McKINLEY? By the way, I will say of him that he never did me the honor to vote with me in his life, [laughter,] and that is as good a reputation for Republicanism as a man ever made on God's earth. [Laughter.] Mr. McKINLEY, of Ohio, not long since reported to this House a bill to suspend the operation of the tariff laws in order that an invoice of English Bibles might be distributed among the American people. And I allude to California when I say that we have been appealed to in the matter of the admission of steam-plows free of duty to break the tule lands of that State. And here we Democrats, good people as we have always been, are willing to grant these favors as an act of personal benevolence to these distressed people, and it is no more than fair when we come before you pleading for the general welfare, and insisting that the great body of the American people are as much entitled to these favors as the parties for whom these acts were passed, that you shall grant our request. We have been appealed to by the people of the various sections for relief, and in these three instances we have accorded it.

Mr. ROBESON. One other. In the appropriations for the relief of other sufferers in the valley of the Mississippi.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am glad the gentleman alluded to that.

Mr. ROBESON. That only shows——

Mr. McKENZIE. One moment.

Mr. ROBESON. That only shows that when we rise to the height of the necessities of our common humanity we sink out of sight legal principles and sometimes constitutional land-marks; and then we are ready to vote as an act of Christian charity, but not of right, for the relief of suffering humanity, appealing from the valley of the Mississippi or the banks of the Kentucky, as freely and if need be as recklessly as when we find it amid the snow-clad regions and under the hard winters of Kansas.

[Here Mr. McKENZIE stretched out his hand to Mr. ROBESON and they shook hands amid great laughter and applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. I am glad the gentleman alluded to the appropriation of money which was made by this House and the other for the relief of the flood-stricken people of the South. It was not only an act of charity but it was an act of principle.

Mr. ROBESON. Ay, and an act of public duty.

Mr. McKENZIE. And of public duty.

Mr. ROBESON. Whenever the imperative necessities of our common humanity demand it then constitutions relent, laws are silent, and systems fade out of sight; but the gentleman must not disparage the rule by citing its exceptions.

Mr. McKENZIE. Now, there is too much of this thing. [Laughter.] You are piling it on too thick. [Laughter.]

But I was going to say, Mr. Chairman, that I was glad the gentleman alluded to that act of benevolence, kindness, and justice. God knows that people have suffered enough. The war swept over them, poverty succeeded, starvation has stared them in the face, and after that, as if the wrath of God was unappeased, the flood came and swept the remaining pittance of their subsistence almost from beneath them. But I point with equal pride and gratification to the fact that when fire, with its desolating wings, swept the great city of Chicago, and literally wiped it from existence, the great heart of the South responded with a benevolence unparalleled to the appeal for the relief of a people that had lately been their foes. [Applause.]

Mr. SPRINGER. So did Congress in voting to remit duties on material for rebuilding.

Mr. McKENZIE. I ask you gentlemen to think of a system of laws which prevents benevolence from clothing the naked, and which prevents Bible societies from distributing the Scriptures among the people.

Pay attention to this. Here is an incongruity which possibly has not occurred to the occult mind of the average tariff investigator. I invite the attention of both sides to one of the greatest economic curiosities presented in this great national museum which we have been for two weeks parading before the American people. Under the general law now in force on the subject, the Holy Scriptures, printed in our mother-tongue, are forbidden to enter the ports of the country without the payment of a duty, and yet during the last Congress the Committee on Ways and Means—this committee for which I have such unbounded respect and which in the face of their protestation I have endeavored to defend—through their agent, Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, reported, and this House passed, a bill to place Bibles printed in the Chinese language upon the free list. [Laughter.]

Now, think of this; it will grow on you the more you think about it. [Renewed laughter.] Thus while we are enacting a law to prohibit the Chinamen from coming to this country we are at the same time legislating to give Chinese Bibles an advantage over both King James's version and the new translation. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, with all your sense of fairness, which I am quite ready to concede, I appeal to you as the organ of this committee, if a more laughable absurdity, incongruity, and injustice in the interest of morals and the reformation of the American people ever was presented than the fact that after we prevent the Chinamen through the aid of my friend from California [Mr. PAGE] and his confrères from coming to this country, we admit the Bible printed in his language, which no man born of American parentage ever did or ever will understand, at the same time imposing a duty of 25 per cent. on King James's translation, which has sent all our ancestors to Heaven. [Laughter.]

God knows if there ever was a time in the history of the American people when free Bibles were needed it is to-day. Just look on that side of the House. [Laughter.] I ask any moral reformer, I appeal to Moody and Sankey, I appeal to all the evangelists now living, in the name of mercy to come and exercise their best endeavors just beyond that aisle. [Laughter.] I am willing for the attempt to be made to convert these bold, bad people, notwithstanding I realize the fact that it will be an enormous strain upon the general plan of salvation. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, as long as the present body of Chinamen remain in the the United States I do not want the tariff interrupted in the matter of the admission of their Bibles free. If everything that has been said of these poor people by the gentlemen from California and others is true, they need the soothing and benign influences of the Scriptures just as much as the average type of Republican. I do not mean of course the man that has grown old in his iniquity; I just mean to strike a general average. [Laughter.] These are matters that appeal at once to our sense of justice, our sense of fairness, our sense of morality, our sense of benevolence; and I commend them to all the people and to the American Congress as embodying the cardinal doctrines of the whole tariff system.

I do not mean with reference to a tariff for revenue only. I am in favor of that; and in this connection let me say I would cheerfully vote for such an amendment to the Federal Constitution as will enable this Congress to levy taxes for the support of the General Government upon values, upon property fixed by valuation, just as the assessor fixes it in our counties.

Mr. WHITE. May I ask the gentleman if he is in favor of direct taxation?

Mr. McKENZIE. That is inhibited by the Constitution, except according to population, which is unjust and unequal, but when we get in power in this House, as we will do in the next election, I shall favor the introduction of measures of reform just as radical as that.

Mr. WHITE. That is all.

Mr. McKENZIE. In conclusion—and by the way I desire to say to the House that their kind attention has been such as I had not expected, nor did I deem myself worthy of such attention on the part of such a body—I have endeavored in my weak, feeble way, in a manner perhaps incongruous, in perhaps not logical sequence or connection, in a manner lacking method, to present to the House and to the country what I deem to be the absurdities, the incongruities, and the inequalities of the present system of tariff legislation, and the fact that I am not, for one, in favor of adopting the plan of a commission suggested by the Committee on Ways and Means, and declaring thereby the opinion that this House is not capable of a satisfactory revision of the tariff.

If the Committee on Ways and Means is not competent, if they believe, as I am forced to conclude by their recommendation, that they are not, in the name of human conscience let them resign and let the Speaker have another opportunity to appoint one that can and will do the work; and if he needs any assistance in that regard I could furnish him some valuable suggestions. [Laughter.] I have endeavored to show that this system of revision is not compatible with the Constitution. I have endeavored to show that the commission, when created, is an extra-judicial body, with quasi-legislative powers, and is unknown to the Federal Constitution. I have endeavored to show that the responsibility of tariff legislation rests with the people's representatives in Congress, and that it is our duty, our sworn duty, to perform this legislative act and relieve the people from the burden of which they are loudly complaining. I do this sir, not as a partisan, not from a selfish desire to assist the Democratic party to success, for I would rather see a complete revision of the tariff in the interests of the people, and in the interests of what I believe to be right, under Republican auspices than to see the tariff remain as it is under a Democratic House. I have never been sufficiently imbued with partisanship to wish to see my party succeed at the expense of the great body of American taxpayers, and, if I do nothing else during my unpretentious service here, I shall always cherish it as one of the proudest reflections of my life that no vote I have ever given and no purpose which I have ever entertained has been inimical to the interests of the oppressed and the poverty-stricken; that every vote I have given has been in the interest of the burdened taxpayers of the country, and not in the interest of those who are protected by law, and whose incomes are derivable from unjust, discriminative, and invidious legislation. I thank you, gentlemen. [Great applause.]

Mr. CHACE was recognized.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] yields to me for a motion that the committee rise. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2315) to provide for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff and internal-revenue laws, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask if any gentleman present wishes to go on this evening. In that case I will ask that a recess be taken.

Mr. SPARKS. It is too late now.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the joint resolution (H. R. No. 197) making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for public printing and binding for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 5221) to amend section 3066 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to the authority to issue warrants.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HARDENBERGH, till Monday next, on account of important business.

To Mr. WAIT, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. KNOTT, indefinitely, on account of ill-health.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan, asked and obtained unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD some remarks on the Utah contested-election case. [See Appendix.]

MISSISSIPPI RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. KING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5901) making appropriations for the construction, repair, completion, and preservation of certain works on the Mississippi River, in accordance with the recommendations, plans, specifications, and estimates of the Mississippi River commission; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, and ordered to be printed.

ROBERT M. COHENOUR.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5902) granting a pension to Robert M. Cohenour; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS P. JOHNSON.

Mr. KASSON also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5903) granting a pension to Thomas P. Johnson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TALBOTT. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Committee of the Whole House for present consideration and passage a bill to do justice to an old officer in the United States Navy.

Mr. PEELLE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I think it better not to enter on the consideration of business now.

Mr. HAZELTON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and thirty-seven minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ARMFIELD: The petition of citizens of Iredell County, North Carolina, for an appropriation for educational purposes—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. MILLER: The petition of citizens of Crawford County, Pennsylvania, for the passage of bill granting pensions to certain Union soldiers and sailors of the late war who were confined in confederate prisons—to the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay.

Also, memorial of the select and common council of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, for the establishment of military workshops at the United States arsenal in that city—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the petition of Walter S. Payne and others, honorably discharged soldiers of Titusville, Pennsylvania, urging the passage of the bill establishing a soldiers' home at Erie, Pennsylvania—to the same committee.

By Mr. MORSE: The petition of M. V. Attwill and others, for the passage of the French spoliation claims bill—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. NEAL: The petition of James A. Bean, for a reduction of special assessment made upon his property—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of Paymaster H. C. Machette, United States Navy, in behalf of himself and other officers of the pay corps, protesting against the restoration to the Navy of Edward Bellows—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. RICH: The petition of 227 citizens of Port Huron, Michigan, and vicinity, remonstrating against the passage of any bill providing for the sale to private parties of the marsh lands along the Saint Clair River and Lake Saint Clair, which are valuable only for hunting and fishing—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. G. D. ROBINSON: The petition of E. S. Wilkinson and others, for a reduction of taxes on the business of banking—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. A. HERR SMITH: The petition of Wm. G. Baker and others, of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, asking that apothecaries and pharmacists may be exempted from taking out a license to sell spirituous liquors as a beverage—to the same committee.

By Mr. J. H. SMITH: The petition of the Washington Frœbel Society, relative to the establishment of kindergarten schools—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, the petition of the Washington Society for Moral Education, for legislation to define the duties of the National Board of Health—to the same committee.

By Mr. STONE: The petition of the heirs of Jonathan Moulton, for the payment of the French spoliation claims—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. TUCKER: The petition of the heirs of Robert Ridgeway, for relief—to the Committee on Elections.

Also, the petition of citizens of Campbell County, Virginia, for the increase of the pension of James H. Woodal, a soldier in the war of 1812—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. J. T. UPDEGRAFF: The petition of J. D. Shutt and 53 others, citizens of Covington, Kentucky, in favor of an appropriation for education in Alaska—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. URNER: The petition of John C. Kearney, for legislation for the relief of soldiers of the late war confined in confederate prisons—to the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay.

By Mr. VAN AERNAM: The petition of 266 citizens of Chautauqua County, New York, for legislation to regulate immigration, securing protection of immigrants by the Government, to repress, as far as possible, the shipment of diseased and infirm persons, paupers, and criminals, and to provide for the return of such criminals, paupers, and infirm persons to the country whence they came—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. VANCE: Memorial of W. C. Evans, of Cherokee County, North Carolina, relative to the alcoholic liquor traffic—to the Select Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

By Mr. YOUNG: The petition of Acker, Merril & Condit, grocers of New York City, for the passage of a bill imposing a tax on glucose—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The petition of Samuel Hall was reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, under clause 2 of Rule XXII, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 21, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PENDLETON presented a petition of the Board of Trade and Transportation of Cincinnati, and a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 5380) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Ohio River, and to prescribe the dimensions of the same; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, presented several petitions of citizens of West Virginia, praying for the passage of the bill providing that all distilled whiskies which are in bond on the date of its final passage shall remain in bond for an indefinite period, instead of being subject to withdrawal within three years as is now the case; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GROOME presented the petition of Philip W. Downes and 40 others, citizens of Caroline County, Maryland, praying for the removal of taxes upon national banks, and the repeal of the law requiring revenue stamps to be affixed to bank-checks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CALL presented a petition of citizens of Jacksonville, Florida, praying for the removal of New Berlin Shoals in the Saint John's River, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BLAIR. I am directed by the Committee on Education and Labor to report back the bill (S. No. 151) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools. I ask that the accompanying report be read, it being but a few lines.

The Acting Secretary read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred Senate bill No. 151, entitled "A bill to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools," have considered the same, and have decided to report it back to the Senate without amendment and without recommendation as to the superintendence of expenditure and other details of the bill.

A majority of the committee is in favor of and recommends the appropriation of money from the Treasury to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, the same to be distributed to the several States and Territories for a limited period of time and upon the basis of illiteracy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, and the report will be printed under the rule.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 153) establishing courts of justice and record in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BUTLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Territories to report back the bill (S. No. 1153) providing for the organization of the district of Southeastern Alaska, and providing for a civil government therefor; also a memorial of citizens of Alaska, and a memorial of the Board of Trade of Portland, Oregon, upon the subject. The memorials have been considered by the committee in connection with the bill, and I am instructed to report a substitute for the bill, accompanied by a report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substitute will be treated as an amendment to the bill. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, and the committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the memorials.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1725) for the relief of certain settlers on the Duck Valley Indian reservation in Nevada, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Harriet M. Owen, praying for a pension, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1759) granting a pension to Harriet M. Owen.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3833) for the relief of Mrs. Maria B. Craig, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 620) granting a pension to Susan Jeffords, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1379) granting a pension to William H. Richardson, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1330) granting a pension to Catherine Greybig, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2148) granting a pension to Catherine Silvey, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1505) granting an increase of pension to John D. Terry, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1024) increasing the pension of Julia A. Chambers, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. GROOME, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 137) granting a pension to the heirs of Captain Christopher T. Dunham, deceased, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1390) for the relief of William H. Hill, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1813) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Martha A. Beerbower, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 380) granting a pension to John B. Stone, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1469) for the relief of Albert Arrowsmith, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Alpheus T. Palmer, praying an increase of pension, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. CAMDEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2290) for the relief of Robert Pelkey, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1479) granting a pension to Mary C. Thomson, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1704) to amend section 1860 of the Revised Statutes so as not to exclude retired Army officers from holding civil office in the Territories, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SLATER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1196) for the relief of Mary McMahon, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2031) for the relief of Eli D. Watkins, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4661) granting a pension to Edmund Eastman, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4229) to amend the general incorporation law of the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1350) to amend the general incorporation law of the District of Columbia, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 896) concerning the land records of the District of Columbia and for the security of land titles in said District, reported it with amendments.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SEWELL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1760) for the erection of a public building at Camden, New Jersey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CALL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1761) for the protection of actual settlers against fraudulent homestead entries; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1762) to amend the laws with reference to elections in West Virginia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. A similar bill has been passed, I understand, by the House. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I ask that that committee take it up at as early a day as they can, and act upon it.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1763) for the relief of Francis L. Valle; which was read twice by its title, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORRILL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1764) authorizing the restoration of the name of Thomas H. Carpenter, late a captain in the Seventeenth United States Infantry, to the rolls of the Army, and providing that he be placed on the list of retired officers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 5221) to amend section 3066 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 26) to amend section 2326 of the Revised Statutes, in regard to mineral lands, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 5221) to amend section 3066 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to the authority to issue warrants; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 197) making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for public printing and binding for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

CENSUS PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. BECK submitted the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on the Census be instructed to inquire into the number and character of subjects being prepared for publication under the direction of the Census Bureau, and to report to the Senate as to the cost of preparing and printing them and the probable time required before they will be ready for distribution, together with such information as the committee may think necessary to lay before the Senate.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. BECK. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to say a word upon this subject. Our attention was on yesterday called pretty sharply to the subject by the deficiency bill in relation to printing, the debate showing that it run up to somewhere near $3,000,000 for the current year, an increase of nearly $1,000,000 over last year, and still more startling information was given by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] in these words:

> Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to say that I have been informed, on what I regard as very high authority, that the printing of the census reports will cost about $2,700,000.

The Senator from Iowa having spoken of it as $1,500,000.

That is the first estimate. I am very much afraid that it will run up to at least double that sum, nearly equal to any of our extravagant river and harbor bills, more than the committee has asked for the improvement of the Mississippi River. What the subjects are which require this great sum to print I think the Senate ought to know. To illustrate why I make these remarks, I hold in my hand a very interesting work from the Department of the Interior, entitled "Tenth Census of the United States, Francis A. Walker, Superintendent." Under the title "Social Statistics of Cities," giving the "history and present condition of New Orleans, Louisiana, and report on the city of Austin, Texas, by George E. Waring, jr., expert and special agent, and George W. Cable, assistant, for New Orleans," I find they take up and illustrate the early history of New Orleans. There are maps and plates showing how the present site of New Orleans appeared at the time of its discovery; how the city appeared in 1708, and in another fine engraving it is shown how it appeared in 1728; how it appeared again some years afterward, in 1763, in 1770, and so on, with a history of all the Indian wars, a history of the war of 1812; a history of everything connected with it, all very interesting, no doubt; but what that has to do with the present census I am not aware. I cannot see what it has to do in a census report.

I happen to live in a very interesting city, and if we are going to have the history of every city written and published by Congress, the history of Lexington would form a very interesting episode in this report. It was named when the news was received of the battle of Lexington, Massachusetts. The story of the struggle between the schoolmaster and the wildcat might be told, and how the great-grandfather of the present Secretary of War shot the Indian chief out of the top of the sycamore tree which still stands near the old Bryan Station fort, and the history of the battle of Blue Lick, and everything connected with it might be written. The writer might go into our celebrated stock of cattle and horses, and show how, after the whisky rebellion of 1792, the Pennsylvania Germans floated down the Ohio to Limestone, now Maysville, and how the Hessians who came along were driven still further on through the settlements in Bourbon and Fayette. A very interesting work might be made in regard to the blue-grass region. I want the committee to say whether the history of each city is to be written, and if so written, I should like the history of Lexington written. I would like to help do it.

Mr. PENDLETON. And with pictures, too; especially of your court-house.

Mr. BECK. Yes; and I want pictures, too, which will show our race-horses and our court-house, which the older farmers yet say, having been good enough for Mr. Clay, is good enough for us. We have tried to have bomb-shells and everything else applied to that relic to get clear of it. It seems to me, all joking aside, that we are going on absurdly, and there must be some check put upon this business of writing local histories at public expense, and the Committee on the Census ought to look into it. I understand everybody now who wants to immortalize himself as a distinguished author is writing a book about almost anything he wants to, and the taxpayers have to foot the bills, and very extravagant bills at that. I am glad I was furnished with this history of New Orleans; it gave me the history of the creoles, of the early Indian wars, and a number of very interesting things which I did not know much about; still it seems to me we are going too far. I hope the resolution will be adopted, and that the inquiry will be made.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to offer by way of suggestion a resolution which I prepared last evening at the close of the debate, designed to accomplish the same purpose.

Mr. BECK. Perhaps it is better than mine.

Mr. PLUMB. At the close of the debate last night which resulted in the passage of the printing deficiency appropriation bill, I drew up a resolution for the purpose of having it presented then, but in the hurry of adjournment it was not done. I offer it by way of suggestion to cover the same point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed resolution will be read for information.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Superintendent of the Census report to the Senate the number of volumes of which the report of the census of 1880 will consist, the subjects of each, the order in which they will be prepared for publication, and as nearly as may be the time within which each volume, including the compendium, will be ready for the Printer, and also the number of pages of each.

Mr. BECK. I think it would be better to let our committee look into the matter and give us the information. They may be able to tell us many things which perhaps the Census Bureau are not at liberty to state.

Mr. PLUMB. I am not going to press the resolution I offered, but only wish to say that I think in the first place we ought to have the information.

Mr. ALLISON. I should be glad to have the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] read in order to see what it is.

The Acting Secretary read the resolution of Mr. BECK.

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw the resolution I offered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think there ought to be a limitation added to the resolution prohibiting the publication of any more of these documents of the Census Bureau till the order of Congress.

Mr. BECK. I thought the committee would report on that subject, and we should then be better advised.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator from Ohio will allow me, let me ask, would not what he suggests be more fitting at the time when the Committee on the Census reports upon the subject-matter? Then, on the information given by the committee a prohibition of the kind indicated by the Senator from Ohio may be adopted; but it seems to me it would be better to withhold it till after this investigation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Provided it is done speedily my object will be attained. My attention has been called to the enormous bulk and the great expense of printing these folio volumes containing a multitude of details that are not necessary at all to the census proper.

Mr. BECK. I agree with the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the publication widespread of the census returns so far as they relate to population and production, but when they go beyond that and give as they do in one large folio volume a history of all the debt of the United States, copying and compiling from our common Treasury reports, from the ordinary finance reports of the Government, information that is open to the public and known to thousands, and print it as part of the census report of 1880, it seems to me it is an unnecessary expenditure of the public money. Unless there is some express provision of law about it, I should like to see it limited and controlled.

Mr. PLUMB. It ought to be in fairness stated that the publication to which the Senator refers is only the printing of a limited number of volumes for the use of the Census Bureau itself. Under the law which creates that bureau a limited appropriation of $10,000 was made for the printing of that bureau, and it is not done under the general law providing for printing; so that no other numbers will be printed except those already printed, even if Congress takes no action whatever. The type, I understand, which has been used in printing these volumes has been distributed.

Mr. SHERMAN. The cost of composition must be very large indeed.

Mr. PLUMB. It is large.

Mr. SHERMAN. If these volumes are printed merely for the benefit of the bureau, only a few copies, they ought to be printed in cheaper form and not in the most expensive form which could have been adopted. I do not see myself any object in printing just for the Census Bureau documents so expensive as these, for after the composition the cost of printing a greater number of volumes would not be so great. If they propose to print all these returns first and then distribute the type and reset it again, it would involve us in an expenditure of $2,000,000 or $3,000,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

The resolution was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

SIXTH NORTH CAROLINA COLLECTION DISTRICT.

Mr. VANCE. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to call up a resolution submitted by me on the 2d day of March last for the appointment of a committee to investigate the affairs of the sixth North Carolina collection district.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is in order without asking unanimous consent. It is in order under the Anthony rule if its consideration is requested.

Mr. VANCE. Then I request the Senate to take up the resolution.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. VANCE on the 2d of March:

Whereas the cost of collecting the internal-revenue tax in the sixth collection district of North Carolina is near 60 per cent., being greater than that of any other district in the United States; and

Whereas there are many and serious charges of corruption and misconduct against the officers in charge of the execution of these laws made openly in the newspapers and elsewhere, which charges are generally believed: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved, That a committee of three Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, shall be charged with the duty of investigating the condition of affairs in said State with reference to said charges and complaints, with ample powers to compel the appearance of witnesses, to administer oaths, employ a stenographer and clerk, and do all other necessary things in the premises.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to any investigation which the Senator desires to make; he shall have his own way in regard to the matter of the investigation; but the preamble ought to be stricken out. That is not necessary at all to the investigation. It recites what is disputed. The collector of that district himself demands the investigation; and while I agree to it, at the same time these recitals ought not to be set out. I therefore wish the preamble omitted, and simply an order made for the investigation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be taken first on agreeing to the resolution, and then the question will next be on adopting the preamble.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Secretary to read the resolution by itself.

The Acting Secretary read the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. It should read "in the sixth collection district of North Carolina with reference to charges and complaints," instead of "in said district."

Mr. VANCE. I suppose it is necessary to lay some ground for the information of the Senate as the basis of its action; and as the resolution refers to the statement in the preamble, it would involve the necessity of amending the resolution if the preamble were stricken out.

Mr. MORRILL. Only a word or two.

Mr. SHERMAN. We could insert a word or two. The fact that the Senator states that there are some charges made is itself a sufficient foundation for the resolution. I think the resolution should be amended. It is not right to set out such a preamble.

Mr. VANCE. Yes, sir; but I suppose the resolution would have to be amended in order to prescribe the limits and powers of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. That can be done by simply saying "charges which have been made," and so on. The Secretary can do that by inserting a single word

Mr. RANSOM. The preamble does not say that the charges are true.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The preamble asserts that it has been alleged.

Mr. SHERMAN. And is "generally believed." I think it is sufficient first to say that charges have been made. The resolution may be easily modified.

Mr. VANCE. I am willing to have the preamble amended by striking out the words "which charges are generally believed."

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me it is rather an extraordinary proceeding to have an investigation by three Senators of a collector of a single collection district. I do not understand why we should be called upon to make an investigation, unless there are some very distinct charges openly and fully made in this Chamber.

Mr. VANCE. I can make them to the satisfaction of the Senator from Iowa, on information and belief. I have stated that charges were openly made in the country, and were generally believed, of gross corruption and malpractice in the collection of the revenues of the United States in that district.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator what has become of the collector who is charged to be guilty of this corruption? Is he still in office?

Mr. VANCE. That is what I cannot answer. Here are some matters that the Senator might be made aware of if we were in secret session, of which I suppose I cannot speak here.

Mr. ALLISON. What I want to know (and that certainly cannot be a secret) is, is this gentleman who is charged with corruption in office now exercising the duties of the office of collector?

Mr. VANCE. I suppose he is, pending the appointment of his successor.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the amendment I have suggested I have no objection to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let it be read as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Ohio.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of three Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, shall be charged with the duty of investigating the condition of affairs in the sixth collection district of North Carolina, with reference to charges and complaints made against the collector of said district; with ample powers to compel the appearance of witnesses, to administer oaths, employ a stenographer and clerk, and do all other necessary things in the premises.

Mr. VANCE. I would prefer that that amendment should not specify the collector of the district, but the whole subject-matter of the collection of revenue in the district.

Mr. ALLISON. I quite agree with the Senator from North Carolina. I think the amendment he has just suggested ought to be made, so that if there are frauds in this district, and that is the reason why the cost of collection is so great, that matter ought to appear.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so modified.

Mr. VANCE. Let the investigation be into the collection of the revenue in that district.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert "made against the officers of internal revenue in said district."

Mr. INGALLS. Now read the whole as it is proposed to be amended.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The resolution as proposed to be amended would read:

Resolved, That a committee of three Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, shall be charged with the duty of investigating the condition of affairs in the sixth collection district of North Carolina with reference to charges and complaints made against the officers of internal revenue in said district, with ample powers to compel the appearance of witnesses, &c.

Mr. INGALLS. That will not do, Mr. President. The allegations, as I understand, are that the cost of collecting the revenue of that district is 60 per cent. more than in any other collection district in the United States.

Mr. VANCE. No, sir. The Senator will allow me to correct him.

Mr. RANSOM. Sixty per cent. of the gross amount of revenue collected.

Mr. INGALLS. Then the expenses of collecting, as alleged in the preamble, amount to 60 per cent. of the gross amount received.

Mr. VANCE. Near that.

Mr. INGALLS. And I understand further that an investigation of the facts will show that in consequence of illicit and illegal combinations of persons who are engaged in systematic attempts to defraud the revenue, who are engaged in the illicit distillation of whisky in the mountains of North Carolina, who resist the efforts of the Government to ascertain the facts and to collect the revenue, this expense is necessarily incurred. I do not say that this is the state of facts, but that these are the allegations.

Now, I do not propose, so far as my vote is concerned, to consent that the investigation shall be simply with regard to the action of this collector. I want the facts in regard to the allegations that are made as to the frauds on the revenue also the subject of inquiry, and I ask the Senator to so amend his resolution as to include that branch of the inquiry.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will put in the words "and obstruction to such collections."

Mr. VANCE. I thought I had made it clear to the Senate that I wanted the whole matter in connection with the collection of revenue in that district inquired into, and if the resolution in its present form does not embrace the matter——

Mr. INGALLS. The resolution does not say so.

Mr. VANCE. I will readily submit to an amendment to it that shall so embrace it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to insert after the words already inserted in my motion "and to the methods of collection and the obstructions to collection." That would be sufficient, or "to the methods of collection, and obstructions to collection and frauds on the revenue."

Mr. HAWLEY. I would suggest a wording that will perhaps answer the purpose:

That a committee of three Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, shall be charged with the duty of investigating the manner in which the internal revenue has been collected in the sixth district of North Carolina, with reference to charges and complaints, together with ample power to compel the appearance of witnesses, &c.

That is what the Senator from North Carolina suggested, the manner in which the collection of internal revenue has been collected. Is not that what the Senator wants?

Mr. VANCE. The administration of the affairs of the internal-revenue office in that district, including the charges.

Mr. HAWLEY. I suggest that the matter be laid aside for five minutes, and let the resolution be put in exactly a shape to suit the two Senators from North Carolina and Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be passed over and taken up again.

Mr. VANCE. I am willing to agree to the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be passed over.

Mr. BLAIR. As the matter is to be passed over, I suggest to the Senator that he substitute for "the sixth collection district of North Carolina" "the States of North Carolina and Georgia," so that the whole "moonshine" business may be inquired into and the bottom facts ascertained. That would seem to open the whole subject-matter and do justice all around.

Mr. VANCE. I prefer to have a vote in reference to the affairs of the revenue department in my own State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield to the suggestion to have the resolution passed over for the present until it can be arranged in proper shape? and it can be called up at any time.

Mr. VANCE. I would prefer to have a vote on it now, but I will adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McMILLAN. Let the resolution be read.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that the Senator from Ohio is just trying to put the resolution in shape as agreed to on both sides of the Chamber. If he will wait one moment it will be ready.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suggest that if the two Senators get together they can arrange the matter without any trouble.

Mr. VANCE. Very well. Can I call it up again at any time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At any time at all. The first bill on the Calendar will be called.

Mr. VANCE subsequently said: I now ask to call up the resolution which was under consideration a short time ago. It has been modified so as to be satisfactory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read as modified.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of three Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, shall be charged with the duty of investigating the administration of the collection of internal revenue in the sixth district of North Carolina with reference to charges and complaints that have been made, and including any frauds or misconduct in either collecting or resisting the collection of such revenue, with power to compel the attendance of witnesses, to administer oaths, and if necessary to employ a clerk and stenographer, and shall have power to sit during the recess of Congress if necessary.

The resolution was agreed to.

L. MADISON DAY.

The bill (S. No. 73) for the relief of L. Madison Day was announced as first in order on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. That case has been here pending for many years, and was pending in the Supreme Court and decided there some time ago; but I have not had time to look over the reports. There are half a dozen reports which have been made in both the Senate and the House. I do not want the bill to lose its place on the Calendar. I ask that it be passed over to be called up some morning next week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over without prejudice.

EDGAR HUSON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 596) for the relief of Edgar Huson; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize Edgar Huson, of Ithaca, New York, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of letters-patent granted to him February 17, 1857, reissued March 5, 1867, for improvements in gearing for wagons, extended by the Commissioner of Patents for the term of seven years from the 17th of February, 1871, as reissued September 28, 1875, for the term of seven years; and upon such application so filed the Commissioner of Patents may consider and determine the same upon the principles prescribed by the acts of Congress of July 4, 1836, and the amendments thereof, governing and granting extensions. If, after hearing the petition, upon due notice to the public, according to the practice of the Patent Office in cases of extension, the Commissioner should decide that the petition ought to be granted, he is empowered to extend the letters-patent for the term of seven years from and after the issue of the extension.

Mr. PLATT. Let the report be read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. HOAR on the 9th of March:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 596) for the relief of Edgar Huson, have considered the same, and report:

Edgar Huson, of Ithaca, New York, a blacksmith, obtained letters-patent on the 17th of February, 1857, for an improved gearing for wagons. This is an invention of very great ingenuity, value, and importance. It consists in hanging the body of a wagon upon a platform composed of two splinter-bars connected at their rear ends to a head-block; said frame-work resting upon three springs, two of which are secured upon the axle, the third connecting the rear ends of the former two also, and in the mode of attaching the pole or thills to a draft-bar, which is secured between the splinter-bars.

The specification being defective, a new patent was issued to Huson March 5, 1867.

An extension of said patent was granted to petitioner for seven years from the 16th day of February, 1871. The specification being still defective, he was compelled to surrender his extended patent, and the same was reissued on the 28th of September, 1875.

Huson was unable to bring his invention into general use until 1870, for the reason that the art of making springs suited to his style of wagon was not understood. He used all reasonable effort to introduce his wagon without success, giving rights to territory to induce persons to aid in bringing the invention to public notice, and assigning one-half the patent for a nominal sum, in 1868, to William Halsey, who with fidelity and energy, but without success, exerted himself for its introduction. In 1870 a manufacturer of springs succeeded in making springs by machinery suited to Huson's platform wagon. The invention then for the first time came into extensive use, and about two thousand dollars were received as royalty on the patent. In 1871 a strong and extensive combination was formed to break down the patent, issuing circulars and calling for contributions to break down the patent. Suits were brought against infringers, which resulted in a decree fully sustaining the patent, in the circuit court in New York, in June, 1877. In prosecuting these suits the patentee expended more than all his receipts from the patent.

It appears that, without the slightest fault, the patentee has enjoyed the benefit of his patent less than two years. The committee do not place great stress upon the fact that the original specification was defective. The invention was in advance of the time, and has only become profitable by reason of the ability of the manufacturers of wagon-springs to supply them at a cheap rate. We think it reasonable that the inventor should derive a reasonable reward from the great benefit he has conferred on the public.

Mr. Huson is a poor man, and has had a shock of paralysis which impairs his power of speech and the use of one leg. Mr. Halsey, the owner of the other half of the patent, is insane. Their rights in this patent are their only means of support, with trifling exception.

Mr. COCKRELL. The patentee having had the use of this patent since 1857, a period of twenty-four years, I am compelled to object to the present consideration of this bill.

Mr. HOAR. I wish the Senator from Missouri would withdraw his objection for a moment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly I will withdraw it to hear the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. This bill was reported unanimously from the Committee on Patents in the last Congress, and passed the Senate after a statement, without, I believe, any objection from any quarter. It is a case where the invention was made a great many years ago, but it required a particular kind of wagon-spring which very few blacksmiths knew how to make, and until a proper kind of spring was discovered it did not come into general use, and the inventor has failed to receive any considerable compensation. The present owner of the patent is a person who is paralyzed. There were two owners. One of them has had a paralytic shock, and the other is a widow whose husband, I believe, was confined in an insane hospital for a long time.

The Committee on Patents thought it was an exceptional case, very plainly. It was reported by the late Senator from New York, Mr. Kernan, and it passed the committee when I think they rejected probably 90 per cent. of all such applications which were made without any considerable dissent.

I hope the Senator from Missouri will be induced to allow the Senate to express its opinion upon the bill.

Mr. McPHERSON. I wish to say that if there ever was a case in which Congress should extend a patent, it is in my opinion this case. The invention was seemingly before its time, before it could be utilized for the benefit of the inventor. It was a certain device or invention by which wagon-springs were to be constructed, but it was impossible to get the material and the kind of construction necessary to put the plans into practical use.

As is stated here, the inventor is to-day disabled. He has a family dependent upon him for support. The partner in the enterprise is insane, and the wife of Mr. Halsey and that family is also dependent upon the profits that were expected naturally to result from this patent.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator answer the question, if it is proposed that the Government shall extend a patent-right because a man happens to be poor or his wife is a subject of charity?

Mr. McPHERSON. I make no such claim; but I say it is incumbent on the Senate and on Congress to pass judgment on the bill. If the Congress of the United States refuse to grant this request, then let them know it, let them understand it. They have been before Congress two or three years. As the Senator from Massachusetts said, at the last Congress the Senate passed the bill and it was sent to the House, and insufficiency of time was the only reason why the House did not pass definitely upon it. Now let the Senate vote upon it, and if it is the judgment of the Senate that it is not a proper measure, reject it, and let the parties understand that they can get nothing here. I believe it to be a meritorious case.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me before he proceeds to make a suggestion to the honorable Senator from Missouri in answer to his question? The committee did not place the slightest stress upon the fact that one of these owners was paralyzed and another the widow of an insane person, as indicating that it entitled them to any remedy which the wealthiest and most robust citizens would not be entitled to; but they did place stress upon those circumstances in dealing with the fact that during the last two years of the existence of the patent, when there was a combination of infringers to break down this patent, its owners were in this helpless condition. It is one of the facts tending to show that the patentees were in no fault in not having obtained a reasonable compensation for the invention during the life of the patent.

Mr. McPHERSON. I did not intend that the Senator from Massachusetts should occupy my time, and I hope it will not be counted against me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It must be, under the rule.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Constitution provides that Congress shall have power "to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries."

In this case the circumstances were such that this inventor could not avail himself, within the limited time, of the benefits that would naturally flow from his patent, and I think it is eminently just and proper under all the circumstances of the case, as he has never received a dollar's benefit over and above the amount absolutely expended in contesting his right, that an extension should be allowed. I hope, therefore, the Senate will vote upon the bill and vote favorably.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suggest that if the Senator from Missouri is going to insist on his objection——

Mr. PLATT. I rose for the purpose of appealing to the Senator from Missouri not to object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have already withdrawn the objection.

Mr. PLATT. It will lead to no extended discussion, and the vote may as well be taken at this time. I simply wanted to say that this bill was reported last session favorably by the then chairman of the Committee on Patents—Senator Kernan—who knew these parties and knew all about the invention and all about the circumstances, and who was thoroughly convinced that it was right and proper to extend the patent.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator please explain what this is? What class of people does it affect? Does it affect all the farmers of the great Mississippi Valley who use wagons? We want to know what class of persons it affects.

Mr. PLATT. I was about to say that I never have seen or heard before the committee of any objection to it from any quarter. It has been before Congress certainly for three years; the whole country has known about it, and so far as I recollect there has never been an objection to the extension of this patent. There certainly never has before the committee. If there has been anything it has been some letter written casually to some member of the House or Senate. I do not understand that it is anything which is to impose an onerous tax upon the public or upon wagon-makers.

With these remarks I am perfectly content to take the vote.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the patent? I have been trying to find out from some member of the committee what this patent-right is.

Mr. HOAR. It is a double system of wagon springs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts is not in order.

Mr HOAR. I do not think it is the function of the Chair to interpose such an objection if the Senator who has the floor does not see fit to do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts rose to speak. It is the function of the Chair to stop him when he is not in order; and if the Senate expects the Chair to administer this Anthony rule it must allow him to treat all persons alike.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me to answer this question?

Mr. PLATT. I will very willingly yield to the Senator to answer, because he is much more familiar with the invention than I am.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts is not in order to speak upon this question. The Senator from Connecticut cannot yield to him. That Senator has taken his seat and he cannot yield to the Senator from Massachusetts unless by unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I did not understand that the Senator had taken his seat.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do I understand that if I have the floor and am entitled to five minutes, and a question is asked me, I cannot yield to another Senator who is more familiar with the subject?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator speaking yielded the floor when he sat down.

Mr. PLATT. Can I not yield the remainder of my time to the Senator from Massachusetts?

The PRESIPENT pro tempore. The Chair supposes a Senator can yield his time.

Mr. PLATT. My time was not out.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I will have no controversy with the Chair on this point. I move to amend the bill by striking out the last word, and I desire to say that if I, in any impatience, made any disrespectful utterance to the Chair I am exceedingly sorry for it. The Chair, however, I think misunderstood me. I did not intend to take the floor; I supposed the Senator from Connecticut was still going on. I simply intended in one sentence, whether regular or irregular, to say that this is a double system of wagon-springs, a mere interpolation into the speech of the Senator from Connecticut.

If the Senator from Missouri will now give me his attention. This is a double system of wagon-springs, by which there is a cross-spring from side to side resting upon two heavy, strong, iron springs hanging from front to rear, a sort of platform on which the wagon-body is placed. It was invented a great many years ago by this blacksmith, but there were no springs which any blacksmith knew how to make which were suitable for this invention. The springs were very costly, and the patent did not get into use until about 1875.

In addition to that, there was a mistake in the patent, so that the original specifications had to be surrendered and amended and the extension had to be surrendered and amended. Then in 1875 there was quite a powerful combination to defeat this patent. The owners of it brought suit, but they did not get a judgment asserting the validity of the patent until two years before it expired, and then one of the owners was insane and the other had a paralytic stroke. Mr. Kernan, the chairman of the Committee on Patents in the last Congress, as has been said, knew all about the facts, and on his statement the Senate then unanimously passed the bill as the Committee on Patents have twice unanimously adopted it.

Mr. MORGAN. I think that I was a member of the Committee on Patents at the time this bill was first reported. There was then no dissension in committee as to the merits of the patent, or as to the fact that the patentee had been deprived by a combination from realizing from his invention anything of value at all. Litigation absorbed more money than he had earned from his invention; and, more than that, as was stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, there was then no machinery in the country for putting this invention upon the market. The inventor became a paralytic and was unable to transact his business. He came to Mr. Halsey, of New York, and sold to him a one-half interest in the invention.

Mr. Halsey was a man of very high character, who was recommended, I remember very distinctly, to me by a letter of Governor Seymour of that State as a man of excellent character. While he was industriously engaged in trying to set this patent on foot and make the invention valuable and remunerative, he was stricken on one occasion while passing on the streets of New York by two or three persons who assailed him for the purpose of robbery, and inflicted a blow on his head which deprived him of his reason, and he lingered on until a recent date, when he died.

By these accumulated misfortunes the patentee has been unable to realize anything from the patent. He deserves the sympathy of the Congress of the United States, and he deserves the generosity of the community for whom he has made a very valuable invention, and out of which he has realized nothing. It is one of those cases against which we are called upon to relieve because of misfortune, which is inflicted by the act of God and not in any sense due to the deficiency or fault of the man himself.

Mr. COCKRELL. How is it the act of God?

Mr. MORGAN. When a man is stricken on the head by a robber and becomes insane, we generally call it the act of God; it is not his own act, to say the least.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. JACKSON, (when the name of Mr. HARRIS was called.) My colleague [Mr. HARRIS] is necessarily absent to-day.

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 10; as follows:

SALT SPRINGS IN CHEROKEE TERRITORY.

The bill (S. No. 1071) for the manufacture of salt in the Indian Territory was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that certain salines, or salt springs, or deposits on the western plains are located on lands conveyed by patent in fee-simple to the Cherokee Nation, but are so situated as not to have been worked or made in any manner useful or productive; and that the Cherokee Legislature by enactment directed the delegation thereof to take steps to make the same produce some revenue. The bill therefore provides that the Legislative Council of the Cherokee Nation, or a duly authorized delegation thereof, may execute a lease of the salines or salt deposits on the plains, not to exceed three in number, located on the lands of the Cherokee Nation lying west of the ninety-sixth degree of longitude, in the Indian Territory, for a period of years, with right of a highway for ingress and egress and lands therewith, not to exceed for all of such locations five townships, to be reserved for such purpose and to facilitate the manufacture of salt; and the conditions of which lease shall insure the payment to the Cherokee national authorities of a royalty of not less than $1 per ton; the lease being subject to such conditions and to the proper jurisdiction of the Cherokee National Legislature, and the lease and conditions to be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. The proceeds of such royalty from the manufacture of salt are to be an addition to the educational fund of the Cherokee Nation.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, to strike out in lines 20 and 21 the words "not to be alienated, but remain the permanent property of the Cherokee Nation" and insert "continue subject to any rights of the United States under sections 15 and 16 of the treaty of July 19, 1866, with the Cherokee Indians;" so as to make the proviso read:

And provided further, That said salines shall continue subject to any rights of the United States under sections 15 and 16 of the treaty of July 19, 1866, with the Cherokee Indians; and said lease or leases shall be liable to revocation by the Legislative Council of the Cherokee Nation and the Secretary of the Interior for the non-performance of any of said conditions.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the report be read, that we may see what this bill means.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no report with the bill.

Mr. BECK. Is there no limit to the time of the lease?

Mr. INGALLS. It is subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior by the terms of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I ask whether this bill provides for citizens of the United States taking possession of this Territory and working the salt springs?

Mr. INGALLS. It does not.

Mr. CONGER. Who then? Who is permitted to occupy these salt springs?

Mr. INGALLS. It authorizes the Legislative Council of the Cherokee Nation to execute leases for the manufacture and exportation of this salt.

Mr. CONGER. Persons outside of the Territory, or Indians? Who are to operate the salt springs? Does it provide for whites going in there and occupying this Territory and carrying on this manufacture?

Mr. INGALLS. I do not know what action the National Council of the Cherokees will take. The salt lies south of the southern boundary of the State of Kansas in vast superficial deposits, almost chemically pure, that are now inaccessible in consequence of the non-intercourse act that regulates immigration into and settlement in the Indian country. It is exceedingly important to the rapidly developing packing and other cattle interests that are growing up in that section of the country that some method should be adopted by which these deposits can be utilized; and inasmuch as under existing treaties the consent of the Government is assumed to be necessary to any action the Cherokee Nation might take, this bill is introduced and reported by the committee.

Mr. CONGER. Then I understand the Senator does not know whether it is intended to make an opening for the settlement around these great manufactures of salt of white men who are now prohibited from coming into the Territory, thus opening the way for whites to go into the Indian Territory.

Mr. INGALLS. It is intended to permit the authorities of the Cherokee Nation to execute leases, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, for the manufacture and exportation of this salt. There is no intention of opening the country to settlement nor promoting colonies of white citizens around these saline deposits. If the arrangement made does not in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior sufficiently guard the treaty rights of the Indians, it will not be approved, and if at any time there is any invasion of those rights by those who may be there the lease can be abrogated.

Mr. CONGER. Almost every bill that is introduced here reaches out in some way to get possession of Indian territory and to make an opening for the occupancy of Indian lands by the whites, sometimes for agricultural purposes, and, if that fails, it is to cut timber upon lands, sometimes where there is no timber. Now I see it is to work salt springs. There should be some rule adopted in regard to the Indian Territory. It should be understood some time that the Indians are to have their territory with whatever it contains for their own use, or else let us abrogate all laws on that subject.

The principal Indian bills that have been before the Senate since I have had the honor to become a member of it have been apparently to get from the Indians the desirable portion of their territory in one place or in another. There is no report accompanying this bill; nothing to indicate who are to have the right to go into the Indian Territory contrary to the present law, nor to what extent they may go or what violation of the spirit of the treaties and of the laws this may bring about. I for one should desire to have some reference to what laws are changed; what new rights are given to white men by which they can procure from Indians leases of their lands for this purpose or any other purpose, or else let the Senate admit at once that all Indians' lands are open to settlement by the whites whenever there can be a plausible excuse made for the passage of such a bill.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, this bill is an attempt to secure from the Congress of the United States a recognition of a title in fee-simple to these lands in the Cherokee Indians in express violation of the terms of the patent issued to them and of the treaty under which the patent was issued. It has not been a week since that question was thoroughly investigated and the truth of the statement that I make established beyond any question in this Chamber; and yet this bill is now brought here from the Committee on Indian Affairs with the assertion in the preamble that—

Certain salines, or salt springs, or deposits on the western plains are located on lands conveyed by patent in fee-simple to the Cherokee Nation.

That is absolutely and unreservedly incorrect. I read the other day the patent and I read the treaty, both of which expressly state that these Indians own these lands not in fee-simple, but so long as they preserve their tribal autonomy, and so long as they occupy the lands; yet session after session it is attempted here in all sorts of ways and by all sorts of measures to make this Congress and this Government commit itself to an assertion which is absolutely false. I protest against it. I shall move therefore to strike out in the preamble the words "on lands conveyed by patent in fee-simple to the Cherokee Nation."

Mr. INGALLS. I think the entire preamble might be omitted.

Mr. VEST. Well, I move to strike it all out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is not yet in order.

Mr. VEST. Now, another word about this bill, which I see here today for the first time. If it is proposed, as the Senator from Michigan says, that this Government should continue its relation of guardian to ward in reference to the Indian tribes or nations, then this Government should do its full duty as a guardian, and if we propose to oversee and to inspect the contracts under the Indian intercourse laws which are made by the councils of these respective nations and to retain in ourselves this authority, we should do our duty if the duty devolves upon us.

Now, what does this bill authorize? It authorizes these Indians to make a lease of these salt springs for ninety-nine thousand years if they see proper. It authorizes them, if white men can go there and induce them by any sort of means to do so, to convey this land away for an unlimited number of years, and this bill says in so many words—for it amounts to that—that the Indian council can convey this land away forever to any corporation or to any set of white men who go there and offer sufficient inducement to them to make that contract. If we propose to act as guardians no such authority should be given to that council. The lease should be for a limited term of years, and should be for a reasonable time; but I care not so much about that, because I for one do not consider myself a guardian for these Indian tribes in any sense at all. If they are, as their friends claim them to be, independent sovereignties, let them have all the rights of a sovereignty; let them convey their lands; let them assume—and I say that is the solution of this whole question—all the responsibilities and all the duties of American citizenship. Till Congress does that we shall have these questions recurring before us.

What I rose principally to say, however, was to object to this preamble, and to move to strike it out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurrred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] that after the vote is taken on the passage of the bill the question will be on the preamble, if the bill be passed.

Mr. VEST. I see no great objection to the bill now. If the friends of the measure will limit the lease, make it a reasonable term of years, many of us on this side of the Chamber will vote for the bill. If it is left in the present condition, for an unlimited term of years, of course I shall vote against it. I feel no especial concern in it, but I make that suggestion.

Mr. INGALLS. It appears to me that lines 16 and 17 would meet and probably obviate the objection that the Senator from Missouri holds, and that to a certain extent I share with him.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator read the lines?

Mr. INGALLS. "And said lease and conditions subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior." Of course it is to be assumed that where the Indians and the Government are both represented such stipulations will be made as will not interfere with what are supposed to be the respective rights of the parties under the treaty and under any view that might be had of the title by which this land is held. In fact I know but little about this matter, and certainly have no great desire one way or the other, but if the Senator from Missouri desires that a limitation shall be placed in the bill, and he is especially strenuous about it, I should not object to that, although I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. VEST. I am not particular about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, shall the bill pass?

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Kansas to insert in line 8 "for a period not exceeding ten years."

Mr. INGALLS. That period is probably too brief. It might be necessary in carrying out these plans for the manufacture and exportation of salt, to construct works that would be more or less permanent, and might require the investment of capital. I should suppose that if a period of limitation were to be prescribed, that which is demanded by the friends of the Chinese restriction would not be unreasonable, say twenty years.

Mr. BECK. Why not make it twenty or twenty-five years?

Mr. ALLISON. Here is a provision which practically——

Mr. MAXEY. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa to insert in line 8, before the word "years," "not exceeding twenty," so as to read, "for a period of not exceeding twenty years."

Mr. ALLISON. I think there should be a limitation on this grant.

Mr. MAXEY. There undoubtedly ought to be a limitation.

Mr. ALLISON. Here is a grant of five townships of land. The Cherokees are entitled to this land except as provided in sections 15 and 16 of this treaty, which provide that other friendly Indians may be placed there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it the pleasure of the Senate that the vote ordering the bill to a third reading be reconsidered?

Mr. INGALLS. Let the amendment be inserted by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the reconsideration. The vote is reconsidered, and the bill is open to amendment. The Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] moves to amend the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, this is proposed legislation upon the basis of treaty stipulations with the Indians, is it not? Then I would suggest to the Senate that while it may be very preferable to put a limitation upon this power of leasing, it should not transgress the boundary of reasonableness as lately interpreted by another branch of the Government, and twenty years may be considered unreasonable.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator permit me to interpolate an observation?

Mr. BAYARD. That was considered unreasonable in the exercise of an express power under a treaty permitting us to limit or suspend the immigration of Chinese into this country. I think therefore probably you had better make the time ten years.

Mr. MAXEY. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware that I was in favor of twenty years for Chinamen; I thought it reasonable, and I think twenty years is reasonable here.

Mr. BAYARD. I was in favor of twenty years there, and a longer period if we could make it.

Mr. INGALLS. The difference is, that in this case we ask the consent of the Indians to the proposed limitation of twenty years; in the other case you proposed to make it without the consent of the Chinese.

Mr. BAYARD. But in the other case we had the conceded right to fix the term at our own pleasure.

Mr. INGALLS. Making it reasonable.

Mr. BAYARD. And in this case we have not. In the one case we were within the very spirit and meaning, as well as letter, of the treaty stipulation when we put it at twenty years, and in this case we simply take the matter in our own hands. We are dealing with a weak and a friendless people, and I think they are entitled to the consideration of great limitation upon acts of power by the General Government. I shall vote for the twenty years, but I should prefer ten.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. I move, in line 3, to strike out "or a duly authorized delegation thereof." I have not any great faith in some of these delegations, but if a lease is made by the Cherokee council then it is subject to revision by that council, whereas from the wording here if the lease is made by an authorized delegation the delegation can make it and the council will be bound by it without ever having had the privilege of seeing it. Therefore I say let the council itself make the lease.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. MAXEY. I move that amendment, to strike out these words:

Or a duly authorized delegation thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. CONGER. Since the amendments have been adopted I do not ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the adoption of the preamble.

The preamble was rejected.

UMATILLA RESERVATION.

The bill (S. No. 1434) providing for allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians residing upon the Umatilla reservation, in the State of Oregon, and granting patents therefor, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. Let the report be read.

Mr. HOAR. If the reading of the report is commenced it will carry the bill over, as it cannot be finished by two o'clock. Would it not be better to consider that two o'clock has come now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts a very good one. If there be no objection, the Chair thinks the bill had better go over to Monday, and two o'clock be considered as having now arrived.

Mr. SLATER. I shall not object to that.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to that arrangement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is Senate bill No. 1572, on which the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] is entitled to the floor.

OBSTRUCTIONS TO NAVIGATION.

Mr. SAWYER. I ask unanimous consent to call up a bill, if the Senator from New Jersey will give way——

Mr. MCPHERSON. How long will it take?

Mr. SAWYER. But a very few minutes. It is a bill to which there will be no objection, I think. It is in regard to bridges on the Mississippi River mainly, to enable the Secretary of War to make proper regulations as to draws. It is important to have it acted on promptly. It is Senate bill No. 1392.

No objection being made, the bill (S. No. 1392) to provide for the removal of obstructions to the free navigation of the navigable waters of the United States was read.

Mr. ALLISON. Is this bill now up in regular order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir; no objection was made. Unanimous consent was given to take it up. The Senator from New Jersey who had the floor at two o'clock on the unfinished business yielded to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin that this bill be taken up, and unanimous consent was given.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the Senator from Iowa will permit me, I will state that this bill has been submitted to the War Department, and the Chief of Engineers has thoroughly examined it. They have insisted upon provisions of this kind being introduced into bridge bills, and recommend the passage of a general bill of this kind. It is merely authorizing the Secretary of War to require the owners of bridges over the navigable streams of the United States to construct sheer-booms where boats and rafts are passing under the bridge, so that accidents may not happen by vessels or rafts striking against the piers. That is the whole provision of the bill. It is one that is required by the interest of navigation, the steamboat and rafting interest of every stream in the country. The War Department have insisted upon it time and again; the Committee on Commerce have considered it, and reported this bill favorably.

Mr. SAWYER. So far as I know, all the bridge owners and the railroad companies desire it because they want to know when they put a guide at a draw that it is there legally and that if they put it there they will not be liable for damages.

Mr. MCMILLAN. And I was informed by the Senator from Missouri that the other day a very serious accident occurred on the Missouri River by which great loss of property ensued in the destruction of a large steamboat on that river. Our rivers in the West all require this protection as they do elsewhere.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not see that this bill has been reported from any committee.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir; it is reported from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ALLISON. Is there any special reason why it should pass to-day? My attention has just been called to it. I think it is a very important question, affecting a great many interests. I do not wish to impede its passage, but I would like to look it over.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I will inform the Senator from Iowa that there is a special report from the engineer in charge of the Upper Mississippi River printed and laid upon the tables of Senators during the present session.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask Senators to allow the bill to go over for the present. I do not know that I have the slightest objection to it, but I should like to look into it.

Mr. McMILLAN. It was taken up on motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SAWYER. I will not press the bill now if the Senator from Iowa desires to have it go over. I will withdraw the request for its consideration now.

Mr. McMILLAN. Let it be understood that it will be taken up at some time within a short period.

Mr. SAWYER. Let the Senator from Iowa have time to examine it, and I shall move to take it up to-morrow or Monday morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be regarded as postponed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 5352) to amend the laws with reference to elections in West Virginia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5541) to extend to sailing-vessels the same privileges in unlading cargo as are now granted to steamships.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 632) granting a pension to John Taylor.

PRINTING OF A DOCUMENT.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask leave for the Committee on Finance to have printed, when it shall arrive, as I do not expect it will arrive until perhaps late in the evening or to-morrow morning, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to bonded spirits.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the order will be made.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the act (S. No. 1601) authorizing the Public Printer to pay A. Hoen & Co., of Baltimore, Maryland, for the lithocaustic illustrations made by them.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON] is entitled to the floor on the unfinished business.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I ask the Senator from New Jersey to yield to me for a moment. On consultation with a great many Senators in respect to the time when the Chinese bill should be taken up it is thought that the best time will be on next Tuesday, it being supposed that the Mississippi River bill will be disposed of on Monday.

Mr. KELLOGG. Perhaps to-day.

Mr. MILLER, of California. If it is disposed of to-day we shall call up the Chinese bill on Monday. I desire to have an understanding, if possible, with the Senate that the Chinese bill will be taken up on Monday if the Mississippi River bill is disposed of to-day, and if not, on Tuesday, at any rate, whether the Mississippi River bill be disposed of or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator that there cannot be an understanding about it because notices have been given as to various bills. There may be a struggle. It will depend upon the sense of the Senate at the time. The Senator can give notice that he will ask on Tuesday to have his bill considered.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I give that notice, then.

Mr. FARLEY. I am satisfied that the Mississippi River bill will be disposed of either to-day or on Monday, and on Tuesday the importance of immediate action on the Chinese bill will address itself to every Senator on this floor, and I do not think it will occupy more than one day. It is important not only to our own coast but to the entire country that we dispose of the matter in one way or the other. I hope it will be understood that on Tuesday next, after the morning hour, we shall proceed to take up the Chinese bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At two o'clock the Senator means.

Mr. FARLEY. Yes, sir; at two o'clock.

MISSISSIPPI AND MISSOURI RIVERS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1572) for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, I am not in the habit of using much of the time of the Senate in the discussion of questions coming before it, and upon this question, important as it is, I will not depart from my usual custom. I shall present very briefly a few general propositions, and will not follow the line of argument in respect of the comparative merits of different systems of improvement marked out by those who preceded me in this discussion.

Let me say, however, with due respect to those who defend the jetty system and ignore the other, or levee system, or vice versa, that the discussion with the light we now have as to future requirements seems to be premature, and it is more properly a subject of experiment and demonstration rather than of argument.

If I understand the Senator from Indiana and the report of the commission, the jetty system is an interior line of solid filling restricting the channel in width and trusting to the increased confined volume of water to wear the channel deeper, and thus relatively raise the banks. Now, that is a simple, plain proposition, as I understand it, if it raises the banks sufficiently, or, what is the same thing, lowers the channel to prevent overflow; but if a given volume and force of current will give a certain result, why dissipate any of the power by which that desired result may be most expeditiously and certainly reached. If to utilize the whole power of the river levees become necessary as an adjunct to the jetties, why limit your appropriation to jetties and thus virtually obstruct the very object we have in view.

I do not know that the jetty system alone will give us good navigation on the river, but taken conjointly with a system of levees we are enabled to utilize all the forces with which nature has supplied us, and failing then we fail absolutely. If the jetty plan will so deepen the channel and relatively raise the banks as to prevent overflow, then we need no levees; but that is still a matter of experiment. The only safe plan is to give the largest liberty in the expenditure of this appropriation until all these facts have been demonstrated.

Mr. President, I shall vote for this appropriation; and as long as I have a vote in this Senate it will be given for further appropriations until the sum appropriated shall equal the sum needed to make this magnificent water-way what God and nature intended it should be—the great artery of commerce.

The valley of the Mississippi is the most magnificent dwelling place prepared by God for man's abode. As we survey the river in its course and comprehend its magnitude from its northern sources to its sourthern outlet, as it makes its way through every variety of climate and every order of production suited to the wants and the enjoyments of mankind, we cannot fail to recognize that our whole country is interested in the progress and welfare of those who do and of those who are to occupy its fertile fields, grow into wealth in its cities, into opulence and affluence by its commerce and its products.

The question of the improvement of the Mississippi has long attracted public attention; public necessities and the public welfare now demand it. It has ceased to be a local question; it is no longer hampered by any of the narrow influences which pertain to local expenditure for local advantages. It has become and is an interstate improvement for interstate transportation, interstate commerce, and national welfare. It is a national question. The Mississippi stops at no State lines, it is measured by no State boundaries, but flows from clime to clime, almost from zone to zone, from the northern extreme of our domains to their southern limit in the Gulf of Mexico. It is sovereign beyond the sovereignty of States, and the question of its improvement is as broad as the territory it drains and as universal as the blessings the wealth of its valley confers.

Whatever plan for this great work may be adopted must be national. No State can undertake it; no State should undertake it. It is not the work of the States through which it runs. They are interested in it, but it is not their property; they have but a divided semblance of sovereignty over it. The Mississippi belongs to the nation; it is the highway of all the States; it was purchased with the common treasure of all; it is the inheritance of all; its channel unites and drains an empire of States to form a common water-course to the ocean; it combines into unity all varieties of climate to bring into exchange all varieties of products. In this unity of interests it is at all times an arbiter for continental supremacy, a mediator for harmonies of purpose, and a never-failing advocate for federal union, linking into one chain of communication nearly half our population, gathering into one current a continent of rivers, and bearing into one outlet thousands of miles of navigable waters capable of transporting the products of the soil, the forests, the mines, and of all the industries of man to their ocean markets. If the work of its improvement is not national, nothing can be national; if it is not of national importance, nothing is of national importance. It is altogether too big to be left in the custody or care of any State. The States are weak and unfit for the work. Nor can they act together. And the work to be done needs for effectiveness and economy one head, one plan, one hand, and perpetual control. If it is done at all, the United States must do it.

Daniel Webster, as early as 1846, when the question of improving its channel was discussed, pronounced in favor of the broadest improvement. He said: "This noble and extraordinary stream, with seven or eight millions of people on its banks and on the banks of the waters falling into it, demands the removal of all obstacles which obstruct its navigation." Fervent with the importance of the question, he demanded to know: "Who shall do this work? Will any one of the States do it? Will all of the States on its banks do it? We know they will not; it is not the duty of any one State or of all the States on its banks to do it; but it is the duty of all the States—their constitutional duty. The improvements must come from the Government of the United States, or they will not come at all. Why, sir," he exclaimed, "what a world is there; what rivers lead into it; what cities are on its borders—Cincinnati, Saint Louis, Natchez, New Orleans, and others that spring up while we are talking of them."

These words were spoken in our own days, and yet the 8,000,000 of people have increased to 23,000,000, and we have but to look upon the maps of to-day, into the census of our cities and towns, into the tables of our exports, and the regions from which they come, to find that while the Congress of the United States has been debating the extent of the aid which should be doled out to promote this needed improvement, in the very words of Mr. Webster, while we have been talking of them, cities like Minneapolis, Omaha, Dubuque, Des Moines, Davenport, Quincy, Alton, Cairo, and many others have become great centers of trade, and States almost as numerous—with 40,000 miles of railroads and 15,000,000 of people—have been added to this ever-increasing valley.

Since these words were spoken, and fitly spoken, by the immortal Webster, desolating floods have been permitted to overflow this vast and fertile region, destroying each time more than the entire cost of the improvement. It is estimated that the flood which is now subsiding will probably cause a loss of 300,000 bales of cotton in this year's crop. At present prices this would be a loss of more than $18,000,000, besides the homes, products, horses, cattle, everything living, everything dear, all that industry has accumulated, all that care and years have refined into comfort, all of wealth, and almost all of hope ingulfed in the hundreds of miles of uncurbed waters.

The improvement of the Mississippi is demanded by every consideration of national economy which can address an intelligent and progressive people. It directly affects the value and productiveness of the public domain. So long as its waters are permitted to flood and overflow the immense region now submerged, so long as the property, products, and lives of the people who venture into its fruitful valleys are endangered, it never can be and never will be a safe and desirable abode for man.

The value of all lands depends upon two or three normal elements. Safety of life, safety of property, and safety of production are absolute essentials to value. Not an acre of the most fruitful lands in the immediate range of its waters are now safe. Continuous occupancy is impossible. General cultivation cannot exist. The extent of the overflow is the only means of measuring the extent of the region to be reclaimed and brought into cultivation. It stretches for hundreds of miles upon its banks. It covers the richest cotton and sugar lands upon the continent. It embraces a section of country the most fruitful in animal wealth, and the most extensive in its limits to be found on the globe. Every acre added to the producing capacities of the lands of the United States, especially every acre located on the highways of commerce, is a continuing element of natural wealth. It is enough to say that the improvements contemplated, if carried out on a scale equal to the importance of the subject and within the power and means of the Government, will reclaim and bring into cultivation an extent of territory whose annual product above the cost of production would be sufficient to extinguish the entire cost of the improvements.

The whole question if it could be reduced to the pure mathematics of profit and loss would leave no room for debate. It would show that the loss must be certain and continual and often as by the present floods overwhelming, so long as the improvements are unmade. It would show that the profit would be certain, increasing, and munificent as compared with the outlay required.

Senators, it might be asked—it is asked—if all this might of calamity, loss of property, loss of life is not directly attributed to the failure of the Government of the United States to establish bounds beyond which these flood deluges shall not pass. With an overflowing treasury from which to draw the means, longer neglect seems to approach criminality.

Let us then elevate our statesmanship to the level of the importance of the great work. Let us make the comprehension of our duty as broad as the country, as elevated as its destiny, and as positive as the necessities which demand our action. There never devolved on any Congress a higher or more imperative trust in removing formative, physical, and positive obstructions to navigation, to production, to commerce, to demanded progress and to the general welfare of the people than is forced upon us in considering and providing for the improvements on the Mississippi. As legislators we shall fall short of the duty our position imposes if we evade or postpone the removal of every obstruction it is in our power to cause to be removed to the free and unobstructed navigation of the Mississippi and to the peaceful and undisturbed cultivation of its borders.

But I am asked, have we the constitutional power to apply the revenue derived from taxation to reclaim the overflowed lands? My answer is simple and easy. Incidental protection is a very popular phrase in this country, and scares nobody. Make, then, your improvements within the scope of constitutional power contended for by the most strict constructionist, and we will accept without controversy the incidental protection which such an improvement will give to property upon its banks. Limit, if you please, your constitutional power to its military, postal, and commercial necessities, and we will rest our cause on these alone.

The world is beginning to be educated to comprehend the declaration of Napoleon, in 1803, when he said that whoever commanded the navigation of the Mississippi and controlled its valley would become the most powerful nation on the globe.

As a purely military necessity, the free navigation of the Mississippi is an essential beyond any estimate of the costs it would occasion. The importance of its waters during the rebellion is an ample illustration of the necessity of making every navigable portion of the river accessible and available. The difficulties and obstructions in its channel cost the United States more from 1862 to 1865 for military purposes than the whole sum required to improve it. No war can exist in which the Mississippi will not play an important part. It is a continental element of our strength. It is an artery of life-blood to invigorate our land. Everything which intercepts its current or dissipates its force is an impediment to the vigor of our power and to its military importance as the highway of our armies, of our supplies, and of our munitions of war.

POSTAL NECESSITY.

In peace, as in war, the postal service of the United States is one of the necessities we can never abandon and never overestimate as an element of civilization. The improvements on the Mississippi would not only greatly facilitate it but they would protect from injury and destruction the common roads and railroads upon which that service is conducted to and from the river banks and throughout the regions subject to overflow. Entertaining these views in respect of its military and postal advantages, without the power of producing definite estimates based upon established facts to prove the positive accuracy of the conclusions I have reached, I now proceed to examine the question of improvement as it bears upon the question of COMMERCE AND TRANSPORTATION.

All improvements to be made by the Government of the United States on the Mississippi to be of permanent value must be made with reference to a general plan and to the general utility of that plan. The demand for transportation is as general as the production of the great valley it drains. The great bulk of it must always be interstate or, to coin a phrase, national commerce. That is to say, it must come from points remote from the immediate banks of the river where improvements are most essential—Minnesota, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, Illinois, Ohio. All the States on its border and all the States united by determinal water-courses to its channel, and all sections connected with it by internal railways and tributary to it and directly interested in its facilities are in the price established upon it for transportation. Hundreds of navigable branches pour their floods of traffic into its channel for market and thousands of miles of steamboat navigation are dependent for their success upon the condition, depth, and freedom from obstruction of its channel.

It cannot be said that it now transports all or a major part of the products of its valleys to the seaboard, but it can with truth be declared that the main reason why they are forced into other and vastly more expensive routes is because it is not improved to perform its legitimate functions, and the want of this improvement costs the people and sections not on its immediate banks more yearly in exorbitant charges for freight than the whole outlay to make its waters permanently available either as a direct route of transportation or as the direct medium of fixing the competitive cost of transportation. Thirteen great interstate railroad lines bridge the waters of the Mississippi and its tributaries, and each of these thirteen carry more products over its waters than its channel bears to its outlets; while its capacity to transport, if improved, is vastly beyond the combined power of all of them, and the difference in cost between floating the products on the river, with a secured and uninterrupted channel, and on rails, is so enormous that it is no longer difficult to estimate the magnitude and certainty of the loss to the people.

During the spring and high-water navigation the railroads are forced to bring their prices to the proximate rates of river charges, but the uncertainty of the duration of high water, the always present certainty of obstructions, prevent the accumulation of facilities for shipment which would never fail if the river were improved into reliable and certain means of transportation. The charge for freights are therefore made to fluctuate exactly as the channel fluctuates. The railroads take advantage of every obstruction to increase from double to ten times the rates which a uniform current and a certain depth of water would establish into uniformity. At the same time the river rates are by reason of this very uncertainty made vastly more than they would be if certainty of channel and depth existed so as to permit certainty of estimate of the demand and cost of transportation.

This question of transportation is to-day paramount over all others connected with subsistence, and subsistence is not only life itself but it is the sum and substance of our foreign trade.

The great grain, cotton, produce, cattle-growing, and wool-producing region of the United States lies in the valley of the Mississippi and its tributaries. Seventy-five per cent. of the whole value of our exports come from its fields, and depend for their value where they are produced upon the cost of transporting them to market. With a soil inexhaustible in fertility, and with modern appliances to aid production, its cost has been reduced to the minimum. With cheap transportation to reach the foreign consumer the demand for our surplus product abroad will be practically without limit. The whole excess above the legitimate cost, and this excess is often oppressive, depends upon the condition of the water transportation upon the Mississippi. In short, the facilities of transport on the Mississippi determine the price of transport on every other route to the Atlantic seaboard. The difference, therefore, between possibilities of transportation on the Mississippi when improved, and present rail transportation to the Atlantic seaboard, which scarcely admits of much reduction, is the sum of the importance of improving the Mississippi as a mere question of transportation.

Now, what is the difference? The actual cost of transporting grain on long lines of road, with low grades representing the minimum of cost in moving, is said by the highest authorities to be not less than one-half a cent per ton per mile, and to do it for less will require a reduction in the price of coal, iron, and labor—contingencies not likely to happen. Counting Saint Louis to be 1,200 miles from the Atlantic seaboard, at the above rates the cost per bushel of grain by rail will be eighteen cents. This sum represents the actual cost, (and is therefore the most liberal presentation which can be made in favor of rail transportation,) but it does not by any means represent the actual charge the product is required through absence of cheaper competition to pay. This is of necessity left to the rapacity of railroad pools, and may be as extortionate as they please to make it.

The most competent authorities agree that the cost of transporting under such favorable conditions as the improved Mississippi will furnish that same bushel of grain from Saint Louis to tide-water at New Orleans may be represented by a fraction of a penny. In other words, the possibilities of one route compared with the best effort of the other are as one to eighteen.

Confronted by these facts—for myself at least—to longer doubt the propriety of throwing the millions (or so much thereof as may be at present employed) of surplus revenue into the Mississippi is to doubt my power to reason.

The great State of New York has given us an example worthy to be followed. Its wisdom and foresight gave to the country a great water-way from the lakes to the ocean. The liberality of its people rescued the territory from the ocean to the Mississippi from the extortions of corporate greed. It has recently made its great canal—that first great apostle of liberty and enterprise—free from the lakes to the sea.

If the wisdom of its founders is to be measured by its beneficent results, they were wiser than anybody, and the later wisdom in making the canal free of tolls has removed the last shackle upon its commerce. It is—it can be viewed in no other light—a gratuity to the nation.

The commission of engineers appointed by the Government have determined that the improvement for commercial purposes is feasible and the cost thereof not unreasonable. To make it navigable for commerce is to make overflow well-nigh impossible. It is estimated the cost of this great work will not exceed the amount appropriated and practically squandered in the past five years in reforming trout streams, and this amount we should not hesitate for one moment about appropriating as it may be needed for so magnificent a purpose, for an improvement so essential to commerce, to trade, to production, to the preservation of life, property, and the rescuing from annual devastating floods a vast area of land of wonderful fertility, capable of supporting millions of inhabitants and of largely increasing the national wealth.

It is high time the Government looked to the improvement of its own property, especially when followed by the results I have stated. In a few years Congress has given to individuals and corporations more than one hundred millions of money or credit and an area of territory greater than the combined area of ten of the States in this Union. It is estimated that 70 per cent. of this princely gift is held and owned to-day by citizens of other nations.

One-tenth of the present value of that gift would wall the Mississippi with granite from its source to its mouth, secure to it the entire commerce of the great water-shed which supplies it, which commerce, at the present ratio of increase in production, will soon save to the producer an amount greater than the sum now paid annually for transporting our entire exports to Europe from the seaboard. This improvement will so cheapen transportation that the great grain fields west of the Mississippi will determine the cost of living in Europe. California and Minnesota, even at present high freights, now regulate the rates of rental paid by the grain producers of Great Britain, and fix the prices at which they may sell their products. Under like freights the cattle from Texas and Illinois compete with the English herdsmen in every important city in England. In proportion as the supply is increased and cost lessened the demand has increased.

The introduction of American beef into English markets made consumers of people who had never before been able to purchase it. Cheap transportation, coupled with cheap production which we have, means cheap food. Give us cheap transportation to reach the consumer, wherever that may be, and the question of surplus food production, both question and food, is forever disposed of.

Senators, as legislators we may not be obliged to assume the recommendations of the commission as binding upon us. And they are not; but in so far as they come commended to us as the carefully considered result of scientific and practical experiment, recommended to us after years of investigation, consultation, and comparison of experiences, from men whose duty it has been to investigate, and whose glory it has been to win and deserve public confidence, and that, too, upon principles of every-day application, with which we are all familiar, and in which we must all concur, there can be, as I conceive, no variance of opinion.

I am opposed to all half-way measures. I am in favor of the broadest, most liberal, and most effectual measures to consummate any system adequate to meet the end in view. The nation has selected its commission to investigate and to report. They have investigated and reported. I accept their report, for I am satisfied that the plan proposed will bring the waters of the Mississippi into subjection to the demands of commerce, its banks into barriers against destructive floods, its channel into depth for safe and continuous navigation, its border lands into safe and productive fruitfulness, and fructify with advantages to the millions of our people in saving them from the extortions of monopolists in supplying the cheapest transportation it is ever possible to attain.

Let us then so far forget the conflicts of partisan ambition, so far pause in the zeal of political strife as to bring ourselves up to the conception of the magnitude and importance of the duty this subject imposes upon us. Doing this, we shall accomplish a work worthy of our age and our country. Never did there devolve on statesmen the consideration of a physical improvement so vast in its far-reaching and so important in its immediate results as that embraced in the means of making the waters of the Mississippi, as they flow to the sea, minister to the welfare of the people, to the safety, productiveness, and riches of the valley it drains, and to the commerce of the continent. It is a question which addresses itself to all of us; it should invite us all for the common welfare of all. No monarchical throne or combined aristocracy of power presses these States into unity. No military chain of fortresses encircles the people, but united in a government founded in equality of rights, representative in character, and whose highest purpose is to secure the largest degree of benefit to all, we as legislators will fall short of the duty our position imposes upon us if we fail to comprehend the importance of a great common bond of union, without which the Union would be powerless. The Mississippi unites the continent. It blesses it. It must be improved.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I hope I shall not overtax the patience of the Senate if I ask leave at the present time to submit some remarks on the pending measure.

Reference has been made in the debate to the fact that for a period of about three years I was a member of the Mississippi River commission. I did not allude to that fact myself, because I did not at all conceive that such a relation to the work of the commission had given me any such special information, not contained in the published reports of the commission, as to entitle what I should say here to undue weight. I did perhaps have this advantage, that I heard in the commission the discussions of the engineers upon the first report and upon the second report which was submitted by that body to the Secretary of War, and through the War Department transmitted to the Senate. I had then the advantage simply of some preliminary knowledge, which was afterward accessible to every Senator here who would take the time to examine the published reports of the commission.

In the Senate in what I have said in my previous remarks I have simply taken the same view which, as a member of that commission, I took after listening to the fullest discussion of the able engineers and experts who constitute the body of the commission. I did not suppose that any one could be so unfair as to suppose from anything said in my previous remarks, or from anything done by me as a member of the commission, that I had either then or now brought to the consideration of this question any spirit of sectionalism or partisanship. I am glad to be able to know, as I do know, that there was but a single Senator on the other side of this Chamber among all the distinguished gentlemen immediately representing this afflicted section who found himself willing to put such a construction upon anything I had said or done.

If I know my own mind, I have not now, and have not had, as I expressed myself in my previous remarks, any disposition at all to withhold anything from or inflict anything upon any State of this Union by reason of its participation in the war. I announced then, as I do now, an equal rule for all the States of this Union and all sections; and what gentleman upon the other side of the Chamber can claim more than that the Constitution and the law should have equal application and should bring their benefits evenhandedly to every section of this country without reference to the relation which it occupied to the great conflict? I am as ready to-day to build levees for Louisiana as I am for Illinois, and not a whit more ready. Nor was the Senator accurate when he imputed to me the introduction into this debate of such references to the war. Every word that I said upon that subject, as he knows, was said in response to what he had said and what had been said by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.] I undertook simply to combat the idea that we should do something other or more for a State that had been in rebellion by reason of the condition of suffering or poverty which ensued; and I did that in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri that this was a great opportunity for the men of the North to show their magnanimity to the South by voting this appropriation for levees. I am sure, after what I have said, and when my position upon this subject is rightly understood, that no even-minded, fair-minded southern man can claim that I have withheld anything.

I undertook to meet two suggestions, to one of which I have already referred, attributing in some degree the suffering and embarrassed condition of the people in the States on the lower river to the emancipation of the slaves, and their present inability to do what the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] said they did do before the war, maintain a perfect system of levees, and that at a cost which did not seriously embarrass them or trouble them. I need not pursue that subject further.

I say again, as I suggested before, that this question is a very wide one. If we build levees upon the lower river why shall we not build them on the upper river, for there is on what we may call the upper river in Illinois a very wide and very rich section of country that needs to be, and is to-day, protected by levees, and levees that break with devastating effects upon a large section of country. I suggested before that if we were to do it for the Mississippi we must do it for the Red River and all its tributaries that were similarly situated; and I suggested that the condition of the people upon the shores of any of these streams as to their pecuniary ability to undertake this work for themselves could not at all enlarge our constitutional jurisdiction over the subject and could not be the basis of any legislation here. No one is more conscious than I am that in a time of great distress, wide-spreading, involving not merely individuals or families, but communities and counties, so extreme that it drives people from their homes and leaves them shelterless and without food, it seems to be an ungracious task to suggest constitutional limitations or to speak of dangerous precedents.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] used against my position the report which I made recommending an appropriation of $100,000 to feed the people upon the lower river. He asked me how I could justify that appropriation and oppose on any constitutional grounds an appropriation of $15,000,000 for levees? I frankly say to the Senator that I do not know how I can justify that appropriation on constitutional grounds. I do not think any Senator stopped to consider that point. I did venture to suggest in the report which I made on the subject that certainly the extent to which the relief given by the General Government could go would be to meet the first urgency of this great affliction, and after that it should be turned over to that charity and public benevolence which have never failed in any section of this country in time of distress, and which have been strong enough to cross seas to the relief of suffering people. But it was not so. We went on and appropriated to the extent of $350,000, besides some smaller appropriations for other specific methods of relief. I frankly say to the Senator that I do not know upon what constitutional provision we can justify those appropriations. I do not think any one stopped to ask that question at all. But it is hardly fair to turn that benefaction against us and to bring our consistency into question when we do stop a moment to inquire whether we shall appropriate $15,000,000 without constitutional warrant. That is the danger of all these things, little or big. When for once, under the impulse of good fellowship and good feeling, under the stir of those sympathies which every kind-hearted man feels, something is done in the way of benefaction, it will come back to trouble us.

I was anxious that, so far as I had it in my power, the Senate should have a clear and distinct idea of the bill reported by the committee, its effects and limitations, and of the amendments which have been proposed to it. The bill itself as reported by the committee, I say in the outset, appropriates practically every dollar, just as many millions, as the commission have asked for all purposes; but it contains a limitation as to the use which may be made of this money, and that limitation is in these terms:

> Provided, That no part of the said sum herein appropriated shall be used in the construction or repair of levees for the purpose of preventing injury to lands by overflow, or for any other purpose whatever except as a means of deepening the channels or improving the navigation of the said rivers.

That proviso clearly divides those who in this Chamber desire to vote money for the improvement of the navigation of the river and believe such an appropriation to be constitutional and proper, and those who ask that some part of this appropriation, or an increased appropriation, may be voted either specifically for the construction of levees without reference to navigation, or may be voted under such ambiguous terms of appropriation that the commission may construe it into an appropriation for the construction of levees to prevent overflow.

This bill, as I have said, gives every dollar, but limits the use of it to a specific purpose. We have a clean-cut, a very sharp limitation here that all can understand. The bill itself must be satisfactory to every one who is willing to limit the appropriation to channel improvements, because it puts no restriction upon the use which shall be made of the money except that it shall be used for channel improvements and shall not be used to reclaim lands. Of course those who take the view that the Government should go into the business of reclaiming these lands will be dissatisfied with this restriction; but if it were stricken out and the bill were left otherwise as it stands, what would be the effect of it? We have given here the exact sum which the commission ask for channel improvements and for levees both; and they could not construe it otherwise but as an invitation from Congress to spend $2,000,000 with the express view of restoring what are called in the reports the breaks in the existing system of levees.

Those who intend that would naturally desire to strike out this proviso, but those who believe that the money should be devoted primarily, with the sole object in view of improving navigation, cannot insist that this restriction in any way hampers the proper use of the money.

I like the way the Senator from Arkansas gets at this question. I have been resisting all the time a disposition to slide into the levee project rather than to walk into it. I think I know that in the original act as it was framed defining the duties of the commission there were words very skillfully introduced intended to open the way to that which we have under full discussion to-day.

I like better, I say, the proposition of the Senator from Arkansas when he boldly affirms the power of Congress to appropriate money to build levees to reclaim these lands for the sake of reclaiming them, and asks that we enter candidly and honestly upon the discharge of that duty. Then any suggestions which may be made with a view of weakening this proviso to the bill are only intended to open a track through which that may be accomplished by indirection which the Senate are not authorized directly to do. Therefore, I express the hope that the bill as it stands may pass. It gives money enough and it limits the use of it to right purposes.

The position of the commission upon the report submitted seems to be the subject of difference in this Chamber, and I confess that to me it is strange that it should be so. I think I can in a very few minutes show that I represented in my first speech on this subject the conclusions of the commission correctly and fully. The gentlemen who have spoken upon the other side have read from an appendix which is attached as an exhibit to the last report of the commission; they have read from testimony before a House committee at this session, and they have read what purports to be and is proposed or intended as a report of Captain Eads, a member of the commission. I want to give the Senate, if I can, in a few minutes an exact and clear view of what the commission has said.

Let us understand this matter at the outset. The commission was required to report upon the levee system, and to report estimates of the costs for constructing levees; and the very fact that they have done so, complying with the organic law of the commission, is now used as evidence that the commission recommend these levees. My legislative experience is too short to verify it, but I am told that it is not unusual that the Senate adopts what seems to be rather a harmless resolution of inquiry directing an engineer officer to survey a certain stream and to report the cost of improving it, and when his report comes in it is taken to be a recommendation of the Engineer Department that the work should be done, instead of being as it is a mere response to an inquiry by Congress as to the cost of doing the thing, leaving Congress wholly unembarrassed upon the question whether it will do it or not when the report comes in.

As I have said, the commission was compelled to report upon the levee question, and in its first report may have said, "We do not know what a complete system of levees will cost; but we estimate upon the best information we have that it will cost about two million and twenty thousand dollars to repair existing breaks in levees." What is the last report that comes to us with the message of the President? It is simply an addition saying that "by reason of the floods which have recently occurred in the river our estimates of the amount necessary to close existing gaps of levees must be doubled." That is what it is, and nothing more.

I undertake to say that the commission has not in any report recommended the construction of a system of levees upon the Mississippi River. The commission reported, as it was directed to do, what it would cost, and the question is wholly free from embarrassment to us to-day whether we shall undertake the work or not.

The Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE,] whose candid, very careful, and very able discussion of this great question I listened to with deep interest, read at length from the appendix of the last report of the Mississippi River commission. The commission themselves have told us in introducing that appendix, and in the very report to which it is attached, that they are not themselves satisfied with the evidence which it contains, and yet the evidence there contained is brought here and it is asked that the Senate shall be convinced by it when the commission, two members of which submitted this report as a sub-committee on levees, report that they are not themselves satisfied with it. Let me read just a word or two. I read now from page 10 of the report of the commission:

> The utility of levees as a means to "deepen the channel" of the river and "improve and give safety and ease to the navigation thereof," which are other ends enumerated in the act, is a subject on which differences of opinion exist—

That is, exist in the commission—> and in respect to which the facts collected do not carry equal weight as evidence to the minds of all the members of the commission.

Yet we are asked to regard this evidence as satisfactory here and to act upon it.

> It is considered by all that levees, by confining the flood-waters of the river within a comparatively restricted space, do tend, in some degree, to increase the scouring and deepening power of the current. But the extent and potency of their influence in the improvement of the low-water channel, in respect to which, for the purpose of navigation merely, improvement is most needed, and their value, for that purpose, as compared with other methods of improvement, and as compared with their cost, are regarded as subjects requiring further observation and study, and the accumulation of further and more comprehensive data.

In regard to all the evidence from which the Senator from Mississippi read, and which other Senators introduced here as being before the commission, the commission agree and say that the information which they have, the data they have obtained are insufficient to enable them to pronounce a judgment upon this question; and yet we are urged here by Senators (and I make no complaint of it, because I can readily understand what pressure is behind them in their States) to act now upon this question, when the commission we have constituted to study it tell us that the very facts which they comment upon are insufficient to justify them in forming a conclusion.

The Senator from Arkansas very kindly said that he did not desire to impute any intentional omission to me, but that in reading the opinion of the commission upon this question I had omitted one clause which he affirmed to be expressive of a decided opinion on the part of the commission as to the effect of the levees. The clause referred to by the Senator from Arkansas reads as follows:

There is reason to believe that during the period when levees were in their most perfect condition, from 1850 to 1858, the channel of the river was better, generally, for purposes of navigation than it has been since that time.

The Senator argued that this was fully committing the commission to the proposition that levees did improve the navigation of the river. After they had collected largely more facts than those which are set out in this minority report, they tell you, in the language I have read, that they still have not facts enough to answer this question; yet the gentleman argued that upon the single expression that it was believed—not demonstrated, but believed—that from 1850 to 1858 the navigation of the river was good and that levees existed at that time, any engineer, yes, any Senator, could from that single fact derive a safe conclusion as to the effect of the levees. I do not know whether there was a comet in any one of those years, but it would be almost as safe to conclude that if there had been there was some connection between good navigation and the comet. Certain it is that upon a single statement like that, not yet well authenticated as a fact, and if a fact it is a single fact that did not take into account the varying condition and effect of that river, it is claimed that any engineer or any Senator could base upon that a conclusion as to the usefulness of levees.

So it is that I come back to the language of the commission. They are not themselves agreed upon this question, and the evidence they have is not satisfactory to them, and so they reported what they had said in the previous report and what I quoted in my first speech, the substance of which is that levees were not "demanded," which is the expression used in one quotation; in another it is said that they are "not necessary" to a system of channel improvement.

The Senator from Mississippi, in discussing the constitutional question, very fairly said that I laid too much stress upon the word "necessary;" that the constitutional power extended beyond that which was in the strictest sense of the term "necessary." I agree that we may adopt reasonable methods; that we may almost go to the extent of convenience in determining whether a matter is or is not necessary or properly connected with navigation; but when we undertake a great work that involves money, and we set before us a single object, which is the improvement of the navigation of the river, then I say, while we may have no constitutional limitation as to spending money in certain directions which may be convenient in connection with navigation, we have the limitation that we shall undertake nothing except that which proximately, in the easiest manner, and at the least cost will accomplish the object we have set before us. Is not that the duty of any engineer? If the Senator from Mississippi had an engineer or an architect employed to do a piece of work for him, and the object to be accomplished was set before him, would he not think he had departed from his duty and obligation if he did not confine himself to those things that would accomplish fully the purpose which he had set before him, but undertook to drag in something else that might have some connection but that was not necessary to the result which was to be accomplished?

The Senator very candidly said that the other thing, drawn in and connected with navigation, must not be drawn in in the nature of a pretext, but must be really and obviously for the purpose of accomplishing the object set before us. I am willing to judge the whole question upon the rule he suggests. If the object is to improve the low-water channel of that river, to give a way for boats, a sufficient depth of water that we may carry cheaply and at all seasons the commerce up and down the river, then what have the commission said? They have said, and I affirm not only upon their reports but upon knowledge, there was not a member of that commission who was not willing to say that these interchannel works which they contemplate would be in themselves, of themselves, and without any help from anything else, efficient to accomplish this purpose. If that is true, how can we justify ourselves in regard to the levees?

The argument of the Senator from Mississippi was ingenious and forcible, and I am sure sincere; yet I would respectfully ask not only that Senator but all Senators whether it is not apparent from the whole debate that the question of levees is looked at by all the Senators and by all the people in those States, not as a project for improving navigation, but as a project of land reclamation. Let me suppose that that stream found its way through land that was not cultivable, does anybody believe that engineers looking to the improvement of the navigation of the river would consider the levee project for a moment? What was it, then, that induced the leveeing of it? What is the real stimulus and motive? Every candid man must admit that it is the reclamation of land. Therefore, instead of regarding the reclamation of land as an incident to something to be done for navigation, the aid to navigation is the incident, and a forced and strained one, sought after with labor, whereas the effect upon the land is the primary and real purpose.

The conclusions of the commission are: first, that these interchannel works are necessary and nothing else can be substituted for them; and, second, that they are in themselves and of themselves equal to the work of the improvement of the channel of the river. But if a great deal of the evidence which was read were to be allowed its full force, it would suggest that we might dispense with the channel works and depend upon levees altogether. If the commission could be satisfied and the Senate could be satisfied that the testimony of the witnesses which was read by the Senator from Mississippi is reliable, and if the construction of levees, sometimes immediately upon the banks and sometimes a mile back, will deepen the channel, as they say it has done in Red River and at some other points, then for one I am ready to say that those who believe that should consistently advocate the abandonment of these interchannel works altogether and depend on levees. The evidence proves too much. These will not go together.

Mr. President, I do not intend to spend much time on the constitutional question. I am not a constitutional lawyer, and in the presence of the members of the Judiciary Committee on this side and on the other side of the Chamber I should tremble to make any assertion with any great degree of confidence upon the constitutional features of this question. Yet I was a good deal surprised at the view taken of the Constitution by the Senator from Arkansas, who is a member of the Judiciary Committee and whose views upon all legal questions, as they have been expressed since I have been in the Senate, I have listened to with the greatest interest. I notice he almost always goes to the books. He gives us frequently references to cases decided by the Supreme Court of the country as the basis of the legal position which he takes. When he is arguing a constitutional question he usually goes to the book and locates himself so that we can know upon what particular clause of the Constitution he stands in his argument. I noticed, however, that in his first discussion of the levee question the Senator brought no books, as I had occasion to say before, except books which related solely to the question of the admiralty control of the Government over the river and had nothing to do with the building of levees for the reclamation of land. But I understood the Senator to affirm that, under some power or grant of the Constitution, Congress had power to appropriate money to reclaim the lands of A, B, C, and D, individual owners of land in his State. I took occasion to ask whether the Senator meant to say that it would be a constitutional use of public money if a law were to be introduced here appropriating $100,000 to drain the Kankakee Swamp in Indiana, now held by individual ownership, and he said he thought it would be a perfectly constitutional use of public money.

I do not know where we have any limits to that sort of legislation. It amounts to saying that we have here as Congressmen the right to donate money to fence men's farms, to build their houses, to enrich them in any way we please, and so an act to appropriate $10,000 to fence John Smith's farm would be a constitutional and valid law.

As I said, I am modest in discussing these constitutional questions, because my practice has not been of that kind, and I have not been brought often in contact with such questions; but if this view is sustained it enlarges my ideas of the scope and power of this Government, and I thought they were pretty wide already. I am a little surprised to find myself discussing a question of this kind as one of those who believe in the big N theory, but still, large as I have been in the habit of making the N with which I spell nation, I had never got it large enough for this.

The Senator from Arkansas referred to the celebrated report made by Mr. Calhoun in 1846, and I confess that I was utterly amazed. I thought I must not only be a very poor constitutional lawyer, but I must be very poorly versed in the political history of the country if it could be possible that John C. Calhoun, the apostle and founder almost of the State-rights doctrine, ever had asserted such views of the Constitution as the Senator from Arkansas affirmed; because when I asked the Senator on what clause of the Constitution Mr. Calhoun put his advocacy of appropriations to build levees I understood him to say that he put it upon the clause which gave power to regulate commerce between the States and that other clause which gave power to provide for the general welfare.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator is mistaken as to what I said, or I was mistaken in understanding him at the time. I understood the question as it seems to be recorded in the RECORD. I said that Mr. Calhoun in making his report—

Analyzed the Constitution from A to Z on this subject, and here is what he says in reference to it.

Mr. HARRISON. Allow me to ask the Senator under what clause of the Constitution, or did Mr. Calhoun refer to any specific clause?

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Calhoun referred specifically to the clause empowering Congress to regulate commerce between the States, and to do those things needful for the welfare and protection of the people of the Mississippi Valley.

He referred also to other sections, but the question was not, as put to me, upon what ground he placed the power. He placed the power specifically upon the commerce clause of the Constitution and that alone. He did not place it upon the other two powers on which the Memphis convention in their memorial placed it. That is the distinction.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator is mistaken. I think I shall be able to show in a moment by a reference to the report that Mr. Calhoun did not discuss the question of building levees as in any way connected with the commerce clause of the Constitution, and especially that he did not affirm, as I understood the Senator to say he did, and as was advocated by the Senator himself, that there was power to appropriate under some clause of the Constitution money to reclaim land from overflow that was held by individual ownership. I wish to refer to the report. The Senator has called it an interesting one, and so it is. There had been a convention held at Memphis, Tennessee, which had suggested some very extensive works of internal improvement. Among these was the improvement of the Mississippi River, and other projects contemplated the construction of railroads, and so on. Mr. Calhoun made this report, as I have said, in 1846, and in the course of it these various projects are discussed. I will trouble the Senate to give me a little time, in order to call attention to one or two paragraphs. I want to show just how far Mr. Calhoun did say the power to regulate commerce on the Mississippi went; and I will show the Senate that he put a much more narrow construction on it than I am doing. I will say further that I think he never suggested anywhere in the report the power of Congress to build levees to reclaim private lands; and he did not suggest that the Government should give those lands to the State for that purpose. I find that the fame and the reputation of Mr. Calhoun do not suffer at his own hands when I read his report. I see in the expression which I shall read presently, that John C. Calhoun, as I had appreciated him in history, was true to those sentiments which had been attributed to him. He said:

> Whether the Federal Government possesses the power or not, it is certain it has heretofore acted on the supposition that it did, as the numerous acts of Congress for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi, including its principal tributaries, abundantly prove.
> Your committee, after the most mature deliberation, are of the opinion that this power does not authorize Congress to appropriate and expend money, except as a means to carry into effect some other specifically delegated. In coming to this conclusion, they concede that the provision not only delegates the power to lay and collect taxes, but also that to appropriate and expend the money collected to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States. Such they believe to be the plain import of the words. Indeed, they cannot see how any other construction can be put on them without distorting their meaning. But they deny—

They deny, Mr. President—

> That there is in constitutional language any general welfare of the United States but such as belongs to them in their united or Federal character as members of the Union. The general welfare in that language is the welfare which appertains to them in that character in contradistinction to their welfare as separate and individual States. Thus interpreted, the general welfare of the United States cannot extend beyond the powers delegated by the Constitution, as it is only to that extent that they are united or have a Federal character. Beyond this they constitute separate and distinct communities, and as such have no union nor common defense nor general welfare to be provided for.

Further, he says, and this is the characteristic language which shows the authorship:

> Ours is a Union of sovereign States, for specific objects. As members of the Union, they constitute not a single State or nation, but a constellation of States or nations, and hence its powers and the objects for which it was formed are appropriately called Federal, and not national. But, whether the one or the other term be used, the reason already assigned to show why the general welfare, in constitutional language, does not extend beyond the welfare of the States in their united or Federal character, that is, beyond the powers delegated by the Constitution, is equally applicable.

He took the ground in this report that we could not improve a river which is in one State; that we could not improve a river which is in two States; that a river must be, some part of it, in three States before the power under the commerce clause could be extended to its improvement. Not only that, but he took the position that we had no right to build levees except as they might improve Government lands, and we had a right to contribute by land or otherwise for their construction because of the benefits which would be received by the United States as the owner of the land. Without detaining the Senate further I come to what is said in the report on the subject of levees. I will read first what the distinguished South Carolinian said as to what is embraced in the power to regulate commerce:

> It has been stated that commerce, in legal and constitutional language, includes transit or navigation as well as trade. It may well be questioned whether it was not intended by the Constitution, as far as it relates to commerce among the States, to restrict it entirely to the letter—

"Latter," I suppose it should be—

> that is, transit by vessels on water. Certain it is that the provisions connected with and having reference to it would indicate that it was so intended; and it may be added that the legislation of Congress in carrying the power into effect, as far as your committee is informed, is confined to the regulation of transit by water to the exclusion of that by land.

Then as to how far they may improve the Mississippi River, Mr. Calhoun said:

> They are of the opinion it extends to the removing of all obstructions within its channel, the removal of which would add to the safety and facility of its navigation, including such as might endanger or impede it by sliding in or projecting from its bank, or islands, over the channel. It includes (to be more specific) the removal of snags, logs, rocks, shoals, sand-banks, bars, including the one at its mouth, and trees projecting over or liable to slide into its channel, where the removal would improve or secure its navigation.

There is the limitation placed upon the power to improve the river, the specification as to the causes to which it would extend, as given by Mr. Calhoun. You see he does not put it on the bank at all; he does not so much as allude to this power as extending beyond the bed of the stream and that which would obstruct a vessel traversing it.

As I promised, I now come to show the Senate what he did say on the subject of levees, and I say again that the Senator from Arkansas is entirely mistaken in supposing that anywhere in this report did Mr. Calhoun consider the levee question as related to any constitutional clause or discuss at all constitutional power in connection with it. What he does discuss is simply a practical and business method by which the question may be disposed of. I will show the Senate that he held just the view which I have advocated here, namely, that lands, which are to be increased tenfold in value by the expenditure of money, having in view that increase, should contribute to the work which is to be done. I believe that is an honest maxim which runs through very many of the laws in all our States, and will commend itself to every unprejudiced man who will think about it. I do not believe there is a Senator representing one of the States who, if he will candidly sit down and discuss this question, will not admit that if this appropriation is to have in view the improvement and reclamation of lands, and their value is to be increased, as the Senator has said, tenfold in value, those lands ought to bear the cost or a large share of the cost, and that it ought not to be distributed over the whole country and paid by those who do not participate in the benefits. Mr. Calhoun said further:

> Having now finished the portion of their report which relates to the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi, including its great tributaries, your committee will next proceed to the consideration of that portion of the memorial which relates to the reclaiming, by embankments, the public lands—> which, in consequence of being subject to its inundations, are not fit for cultivation.

Notice, Mr. President, "the public lands"—

The memorial seems to have suggested that the United States should reclaim its own land. Let us see what he said further:

> The subject is one of no small importance. The Mississippi, like most of the other great rivers, has formed by its deposits, in the long course of years, a tract of great extent and fertility in its approach to the ocean, and which is subject to inundations by its floods. There is no data by which the extent of this tract can be ascertained with any accuracy.
> It is believed by far the greater part may be reclaimed by a proper system of embankment. It is more difficult to estimate with any precision what portion of it is still public land.

He goes on to say:

> Your committee are of the opinion that something ought to be done toward bringing this great body of fertile land into cultivation. While it remains in its present state, with one, and that the larger, portion held by the Union, another (that granted for schools and other purposes) by the States, and a third by individuals, and these several portions not held in parcels or bodies separate and distinct from each other but intermixed one with the other, nothing can well be done toward reclaiming them.

That is what the Senator quoted. Now let me go a little further with the quotation:

> It would require the co-operation of the parties interested, each in proportion to the extent of his interest, to accomplish the object. To obtain such co-operation and fix satisfactorily the amount that each should contribute toward making the necessary embankments would obviously be a work of too much difficulty and complication to be undertaken.

What was the suggestion of Mr. Calhoun? He says the Union, the United States, owns a large quantity of land; the State of Louisiana owns a large quantity of land; individuals own other lands; we cannot tell how much each ought to contribute; every person should contribute in proportion to his interest to the construction of these embankments to reclaim the lands from overflow—and what is his suggestion? His suggestion is that the Government should sell out its land to individual owners at a graduated price, falling at intervals, and when it got down to twenty-five cents an acre the Government should give what was left unsold to the State of Louisiana. There is no suggestion there of the condition which appeared in the subsequent legislation, namely, that the proceeds of those lands should be applied to reclaiming them. Therefore, so far from sustaining the suggestion that the Government had power to build levees, Mr. Calhoun does not discuss the question except as the Government was interested as an owner of the land—not as a sovereign but as an owner of the land; and the project for relieving the question was that the Government should cease to be the owner of the land, and then the cost of constructing the levees could be levied upon the individuals who owned the land.

Mr. President, I have no other feeling in the discussion of this question than to arrive at that which is right. I said before that I believe it would be a great blessing to the people on the lower river that this question should be settled now and settled permanently. So long as they are looking to the Government to do some part of this work, they will themselves do nothing. I believe to-day that if the expectation that out of the public Treasury and without cost to them these levees could be constructed were once dispelled and put away, there is energy and force enough in those States to reclaim these lands which are described as so magnificent in themselves and capable of such magnificent productions.

The Senator from Mississippi said that this wealth is potential. Potential wealth is available wealth. Any enterprise that can show its capacity to produce the $750,000,000 that he talked about can command the capital of this country to do the work that is necessary to make that potential wealth actual.

I believe that instead of modifying this bill and holding out expectations, we should come upon some understanding with those States now, and either take the levee business on our shoulders, and say to them "we will reclaim your lands and appropriate money enough to do it," or give them to understand now that we will not, and that they must look to their own energy. As long as this question is unsettled, as I have said, it will simply encourage the supineness of those who should stir themselves to this work.

I have already said, Mr. President, that I believe it to be entirely possible and altogether fair that these States should by some method levy a tax for this purpose, and that there are methods by which we may co-operate with them and aid them in connection with the improvement of the river that will greatly lessen the cost of this work to them, and will greatly increase its permanence, and diminish the cost of its maintenance, and I repeat again that so far as there shall be beneficent incidents, so far as there shall be healthfulness and gain to these afflicted people of the South by the discharge of our duty to improve that river, I would welcome the beneficent incident and not stand too close on the edges of it. It is possible for those States to inaugurate a system of legislation by which the help of the General Government may in some proper way be given to them, and at the same time not to put upon the public Treasury and the tax-payers of the whole country the entire burden of building a system of works that is intended to reclaim their own lands.

And now, Mr. President, I hope I have not said anything, either in my remarks to-day or at any previous time, to give anybody, not specially touchy or sensitive, any suggestion that I feel an unfriendly spirit to those people or have failed to enter fully into the afflictions and distresses under which they have been suffering. I am sure that the calm judgment of Senators will prevail upon this question, and that we cannot by reason of the sympathy we feel for them go into a class of legislation which must bind us by precedent to allow our sympathies to take up the sufferings and to relieve the distresses of all people in our country.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I have been told that in my absence from the Chamber the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] stated that he was induced to make the remarks that he did the other day with regard to the claim of the Lower Mississippi Valley for the leveeing and improvement of the Mississippi River, by a statement I had made to the effect that the people of that section claimed the improvement of the Lower Mississippi on account of the losses incurred by them in the late rebellion.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator misunderstands me altogether. I quoted in my previous remarks what the Senator had said, as taken from the RECORD, and which simply appealed to the magnanimity of the North to take this great occasion to heal the division. That is what I said.

Mr. VEST. I was not in the Chamber. What I have stated was reported to me. I was singularly unfortunate in what I said if I did make that impression upon any Senator present. I did claim, and I claim now, that the Government of the United States owes it to itself and owes it to the entire country, and not exclusively to the people of the South, that its property, the Mississippi River, should not be an instrument of terror and of annually recurring loss and damage to the people of any portion of this country. I did say then that no moment could be more opportune than the present, when the South in the providence of God had been desolated by war, pestilence, and famine, for the great and victorious and wealthy North, controlling the Government, to hold out a helping hand to them. I say it now, sir, and I undertake to say that in less than fifty years from this moment, and—

> The sunset of life gives me no mystical lore,
> Nor do coming events cast their shadows before—but I say, believing in the broad catholic nationality of this country and in the progressive ideas of the American people, now in their infancy, in less than fifty years the wonder will be that any Senator from a sovereign State ever stood upon this floor and questioned the right and duty of the National Government not only to improve the Mississippi River, but to reclaim that magnificent alluvial territory from the ravages and desolations created by the property of the Government itself.

Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] from my heart for his patriotic utterances the other day, in which he said what I have always believed, that the people of the North did not hate the people of the South, as I know the people of the South do not hate the people of the North; and what I meant to say then and say now is that there can be no theater, no question, no idea, no argument upon which the two sections can meet upon such common ground with such true and honest and real fraternity of feeling as in the improvement of this magnificent river, the unquestioned property of the whole nation.

Sir, the Senator from Maine spoke of what the North had done for the South. It has been most generous; and when at Vicksburgh that Northern soldier fell a victim to the scourge which was desolating the people whom he had assisted to succor, the last vestige of sectional feeling was eradicated from every true and honest and brave Southern heart; and when the bullet of the assassin struck down the late President of the United States, from every hamlet and township in the whole South came the wail of undisguised and honest grief. And, sir, why should it not have been so, when that Chief Magistrate had spoken so much better than I could ever hope to do the words that I have before me, the same sentiment and expressed the same feeling I have feebly attempted to utter to-day? Said James A. Garfield, when an honored member of the other House:

> I believe that one of the grandest of our material national interests—one that is national in the largest material sense of that word—is the Mississippi River and its navigable tributaries. It is the most gigantic single natural feature of our continent, far transcending the glory of the ancient Nile, or of any other river on the earth. The statesmanship of America must grapple the problem of this mighty stream. It is too vast for any State to handle; too much for any authority less than that of the nation itself to manage. And I believe the time will come when the liberal-minded statesmanship of this country will devise a wise and comprehensive system that will harness the powers of this great river to the material interests of America, so that not only all the people who live on its banks and the banks of its confluents, but all the citizens of the Republic, whether dwellers in the central valley or on the slope of either ocean, will recognize the importance of preserving and perfecting this great natural and material bond of national union between the North and the South—a bond to be so strengthened by commerce and intercourse that it can never be severed. [Applause.]
> I rejoice in any occasion which enables Representatives from the North and from the South to unite in an unpartisan effort to promote a great national interest. [Applause.] Such an occasion is good for us both. And when we can do it without the sacrifice of our convictions, and can benefit millions of our fellow-citizens, and can thereby strengthen the bonds of the Union, we ought to do it with rejoicing; for in doing so we inspire our people with larger and more generous views, and help to confirm for them and for our children to our latest generations the indissoluble Union and the permanent grandeur of this Republic. I shall vote for this bill.

So speaks the dead President from his grave to-day in letters of gold the language of fraternity, the bond of an indissoluble Union bound together by no coercion, but bound together by the bonds of a confiding nationality which will last as long as the human heart shall beat. I meant to say this the other day—this and nothing more. Sir, I have taunted no State with what this Government has done for it in improvements of rivers or of harbors. The history of this Government has been but the history of every other government and the history of the human race; with political power has come the improvement of natural and material resources. When the Atlantic States held the power the rivers and harbors of the Atlantic States were improved, and as the tide of population gradually poured to the West the improvement of rivers and harbors has gone with the amount of that population. Therefore we find—and I speak it to invoke no sectional distrust or hate; I speak it only to show the just and equitable claims of the section to which I belong; and when I say I belong to a section I mean that I belong to that section only as a part of this great Union—we find that from 1789 to 1873 the New England States received $2,440,388 for river and harbor improvements; the Western States on the Mississippi River received $1,481,464; the Atlantic States received $5,190,179; the Lake States received $5,155,253. During this time the great States of the Mississippi Valley and the northwest tributaries of that river received altogether $1,481,464.

Mr. HOAR. What period was that?

Mr. VEST. From 1789 to 1873. In this time New England received in excess of the Mississippi Valley States $958,924; the Atlantic received more than they by $3,708,715; the Lake States more by $3,673,789.

Mr. President, I again repeat, for I want no mistake in regard to it, that I blame not these sections or these States for improving their rivers and harbors. I simply state these figures here to-day to show the just demands of the States in the Mississippi Valley for like improvements to this great river that belongs to the whole United States.

Mr. President, a word further in regard to the constitutional question——

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow me right there, before he goes further, to ask him a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator think that this appropriation, unanimously agreed upon in committee, of $6,000,000, to be expended in one year on the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, and the expenditure of $150,000 authorized yesterday for Memphis, is a step toward generosity to that section?

Mr. VEST. I do. I do accept it as a step in the proper direction, and appreciate it, as the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] suggests. If the Senator from Maine means by "generosity" to convey also the idea of justice, I emphatically accept it. I say it is time the Mississippi River should receive these appropriations from the General Government; time, because it is the property of the whole Union; time, because the great States upon its banks, my own State included, are just commencing the formation of an empire that will dazzle the world with its grandeur, feed the world, and in its political influence control this continent.

Mr. President, I could go further, and take the statistics from 1824 to 1876 of appropriations for two States alone—and I say to my friends from Michigan and Wisconsin again that I mention this not as a reproach to them; I honor those States for having attended to their material interests—those two States received in that time together $9,079,464, and the Lower Mississippi River received during the same time $3,761,941. There is the difference in the appropriations, and so stands the account to-day.

Now, sir, as to the constitutional question, in my mind it simply amounts to this: that the power exists on the part of the General Government to improve its own property, the Mississippi River, in its own way, is as unquestioned in my mind as is my power to improve my real estate in any State of this Union. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] undertakes to convict my friend from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] of inconsistency when he says that he asked him a question in regard to the improvement of a swamp in the State of Indiana by the General Government. Ah! Mr. President, that is no fair way to put this question to the country. The General Government has no right to improve my property; the General Government has no right to improve the property of five men, of ten men, of twenty men, of one hundred men; but the General Government has the right under the Constitution, for a national purpose, a national object, to exhaust the Treasury of the United States if it sees proper. In the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, the Supreme Court of the United States announced the doctrine, which has stood unquestioned ever since, that the general powers conferred by the Constitution upon the Congress of the United States carried with them all legitimate powers, all powers that by corollary or deduction could legitimately flow from those great powers.

There are half a dozen sections of the Constitution under which this power exists, but we put it on one alone, and I go not back to Mr. Calhoun to get the authority. I say when the Constitution gives the power to Congress to make all needful rules and regulations in regard to the territory or other property of the United States, it gives the right to improve the Mississippi River. In the Gratiot case, in 14 Peters, the Supreme Court of the United States decided emphatically that the power to regulate was the power to govern and the power to improve; and is not this river the property of the United States? What Senator here denies it? What Senator pretends to say that the Mississippi River is not the property of this whole country, of the Government of the United States, and of every part of it? And if we have the power to improve in the District of Columbia, if we have the power to improve in the Territories of the United States, we have the right to improve our property in this magnificent river of the Mississippi.

Oh, sir, when $83,000,000 of the public money were given to the Pacific railroads that went with their corporate powers to the Pacific Ocean, this question was settled without difficulty—$83,000,000, the interest upon which we are paying to-day. Then no question was started, or a question was barely raised, in regard to the constitutional power of the Government to make these great highways to the Pacific Ocean; and here is another highway, made by the Almighty God for the benefit of the American people; and yet we are told that the Constitution is so lame and so defective that we have no power to improve this property given to us by the beneficence of the Author of nature himself.

But, Mr. President, more than that. I hold it the duty of the Government of the United States to see that its own property is not an instrument of destruction to its own people. I hold that it is a violation of the compact between the Government and the people if the property of the Government is made an instrument of destruction and ruin to the people who own that Government and for whose benefit that Government was made. Sir, the commonest principles of justice and of law require that I shall use my property so as not to injure my neighbor. What different relation exists between the Government and the people of the Mississippi Valley or any portion of the people of this country than exists between the Senator from Arkansas and myself? He has his property, I have mine; he has his rights, I have mine. The Government of the United States is the property of the people and cannot be antagonistic to the people. If the doctrine is ever established in this country that the Government of the United States is so absolutely disconnected from the interests of the people that the interest of one can be antagonistic to the other, then the end and aim of the Constitution and of free institutions is destroyed eo instanti and forever. Sir, is it possible that to-day we must learn the lesson in regard to national obligation and national duty from the countries of Europe?

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question in reference to his last proposition, that it is the duty of the General Government so to use its own as not to allow an injury to come to others?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Do I understand the Senator to express the opinion that that ought to be applied to all navigable streams in this country, that the Government should guarantee the riparian owners against injury from flood? I lived on the banks of one of these streams when I was a boy; and it would have been greatly to the interest of our family, in the way of crops and fences and lands, if that rule had been in force then. I think it is a pretty wide one, if the Senator will reflect a moment.

Mr. VEST. I understand the object of the Senator from Indiana. He is perfectly ingenuous, but at the same time his suggestion is unavailing in this case. I am a Democrat; it is not necessary to say that. I am a strict constructionist; it is hardly necessary to those who know me to say that. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] shakes his head; but I am. I believe in a strict construction of the Constitution, and I say it is a strict construction that the General Government has the right to improve its own property, and I say that it requires no latitudinarian construction to come to that conclusion, and it requires a vast amount of anything else but a patriotic construction to come to any different conclusion, in my judgment.

But to return to the question of the Senator from Indiana. He asks me if I apply this doctrine to all the other navigable streams in this country. Mr. President, I declare the doctrine to-day, as I understand it, according to the Democratic creed, as I have been taught to understand it for forty long years, that whatever the States can do they ought to do themselves, and what the States cannot do for the general welfare ought to be done by the General Government. If there is a navigable stream in the State of Indiana, and it is not national in its character, or if that stream can be improved by the State, then the State ought to improve it.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator will allow me to suggest that that was not quite the point of my inquiry, if it had a point, as I supposed it had. It was to this effect: I understood the Senator to be arguing that it was the duty of the General Government, its constitutional duty, to protect the riparian owners on the Mississippi River from the effects of overflow, upon the ground that the Government was the owner of the stream itself, and therefore it was the duty of the Government to see that its property did not hurt somebody else. I asked him whether he extended that doctrine to all the navigable tributaries of the river, because there are many of those that overflow and work great damage on their banks. Would he be in favor, therefore, or would he hold it to be constitutional that the Government should undertake either to reimburse those losses or to protect the people against them by leveeing the Ohio and the other tributaries of the Mississippi?

Mr. VEST. If the necessity existed; if 23,727,168 acres of the most magnificent soil in the world were annually devastated——

Mr. HARRISON. But the maxim of law to which the Senator from Missouri referred does not relate at all to the number of people injured or to the extent of the injury. The maxim is that a man shall so use his own as not to produce injury to another—it does not matter whether the injury is small or great. If the principle is logically applied to this case, as a constitutional principle, it must embrace the small as well as the great.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator had only waited a very few moments he would have seen that I was proceeding to answer that proposition and to elaborate what I meant to say.

Mr. President, I repeat that under our system of government, as I understand it, looking in all its details, in all its structure, to the one great end of the welfare of the people, who own the States, who own the National Government, the people, the imperial people of this country, under that structure of government, State and national, I hold that when the States can perform the functions which will bring about the largest amount of prosperity to the people, and can levee streams or improve streams and thereby redeem from destruction large areas of territory in the State, when the State has resources to do it it is the duty of the State to do it. When the State has not the power to do it, when the extent of damage is so great, when the area of the country devastated is so immense that it is beyond the resources of a State or of two or more States to accomplish this object, then I say that the clause of the Constitution intervenes which says that Congress shall provide for the general welfare, not of one State, not of one neighborhood, not of one community, but the general welfare of the whole country, whether that welfare consists in the preservation of one section from destruction or of two or more sections.

That is my understanding of the autonomy of this Government; and, sir, it is not possible for one State or for two or more States in the Mississippi Valley to perform this great work of preserving the valley from the annually recurring floods of the Mississippi River. If I needed anything to strengthen my opinion in regard to it, take the message lately delivered by the present President of the United States—

> Having possession of and jurisdiction over the river, Congress, with a view of improving its navigation and protecting the people of the valley from floods—> and protecting the people of the valley from floods, has for years caused surveys of the river to be made, for the purpose of acquiring knowledge of the laws that control it and of its phenomena.

And he goes on then and says:

> The immense losses and widespread suffering of the people dwelling near the river induce me to urge upon Congress the propriety of not only making an appropriation to close the gaps in the levees occasioned by the recent floods, as recommended by the commission, but that Congress should inaugurate measures for the permanent improvement of the navigation of the river—

Does he stop there?

> and security of the valley.

What does the President of the United States mean by the "security of the valley?" Does he not mean that by levees or by revetment, by all the means recommended by the Mississippi River commission, any measure the Constitution authorizes, the security of the valley shall be maintained from the recurring floods of the Mississippi River? But, sir, I hasten to conclude what I intend to say by asking the question, is it possible that to-day, with our boasted civilization, with our vaunt that we of all the nations of the world have progressed further in the science of government than all that have gone behind us and all that can come before us, we have a Constitution so lame and so impotent that the property of the Government is destroying a large portion of the property of the people and we are to stand here with folded arms and bound hands and say "the Constitution of the country forbids us to interfere?" Is it possible, Mr. President, that to-day we must go back to the monarchies of the Old World to learn the true theory of government, which is the welfare of the people and the preservation of their property?

Sir, what are the Netherlands to-day but made land redeemed from the ocean by the levee system that we propose here for the Mississippi River? Not one foot of soil in the Netherlands but would to-day be under the yeasty waves of ocean but for the levee system there adopted. Sir, the facts as stated in a report made to the British Parliament are most suggestive now in the discussion of this question.

The history of the protection and development of the Netherlands—

I read from an interesting pamphlet of Mr. Alexander D. Anderson:

> The history of the protection and development of the Netherlands, (low countries,) an exact parallel in formation to the alluvial lands of the Mississippi Valley, proves very clearly that we have not overestimated the importance of the subject. The United Kingdom of the Netherlands contains but 12,680 square miles, and North and South Holland, two of the eleven sub-divisions of the same, but 2,209 square miles. The whole of the Netherlands are made land, having been formed by protection from the overflow of the Lower Rhine, the Maas, the Scheldt, and other rivers, ninety lakes, and the Zuyder Zee. The total cost of their protection by dikes, embankments, and other works was $1,500,000,000. The annual cost of guarding, protecting, and repairing is stated to be from $2,000,000 to $2,500,000. Probably that country, in proportion to its population, is the wealthiest nation upon the face of the earth. An elaborate review of the same says: "The country is everywhere well peopled, and no population in the world exhibits a more uniform appearance of wealth, comfort, and contentment." Holland not only has capital enough for home use, but the Dutch of Amsterdam are capitalists who have a large surplus to lend for public improvements and large enterprises in other nations.

All the wealth of this rich and commercially powerful people was accumulated in an alluvial country rescued from the rivers, the lakes, and the ocean by the levee system, and the levee system alone.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate by more than mentioning that magnificent empire of alluvial soil which would be reclaimed if this Congress were true to its mission, as I honestly believe it to be under the Constitution of the country—23,727,168 acres of land the possibility of whose production is almost incalculable. Think of the cotton alone which could be raised upon it; think of the corn, of the grain of every description that would spring as if by magic from that land if this Congress would protect it from the ravages of the river that belongs to the Government itself. Oh, the Senator from Indiana tells us, let those States do it; let them, like boys that are flung out in the world, learn to take care of themselves.

Mr. President, that is not what I have heard here for the last two years. Bill after bill has been introduced into Congress to donate money to the Southern States for educational purposes. A bill is now pending here for the purpose of taking the entire internal-revenue tax on alcoholic liquors and giving it to the Southern States for educational purposes. We say, and I say to-day to this Congress, give us the money to reclaim those lands and we will educate the people; give us the material wealth and prosperity that will come from this reclamation, give to the people of the South to-day the assistance that now is worth more to them than untold millions will be worth hereafter, and my word for it the people of that country will be educated, the resources of the country will be developed, and the aggregate wealth of this entire Union will be such that what exists to-day will be a mere fraction of that which shall come hereafter.

Sir, upon constitutional grounds, upon the grounds which should be dictated by statesmanship and by patriotism, I for one, without disguise, say that the Government of the United States should not only levee the Mississippi River from end to end if necessary, but keep those levees in repair in order to bring that magnificent empire into the highest condition of production for the benefit of the Union at large.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I have not much to say about this bill, but what I do say I desire to speak with due consideration and carefulness, because I regard it as the initial movement of what may turn out to be a very great advantage to the country or else a large expenditure of money without accomplishing anything. I will not undertake to prophesy as to what the result of this investment of $5,000,000 under this bill shall be, for I have neither the experience nor have I the scientific skill to forecast what that result is to be. I am willing to trust the committee of the Senate who have reported this bill, and I am willing to trust the experts of the commission who laid the foundation for this bill in their conclusion that there are some means to be availed of for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Mississippi River.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. How many rivers are there in the southern country to-day subject to overflow and that have lands that need leveeing and protection?

Mr. MORGAN. Inasmuch as the other southern States have never asked for any levees to protect their lands, I have never put myself to the trouble to count how many such rivers there were.

Some doctrines have been advanced here by Senators who advocate the amendments proposed to this bill which I cannot subscribe to, and I think that it is altogether essential that we should now come to a distinct understanding whether these doctrines avowed by Senators are to be adopted in this measure and made the basis of our future action, or whether they are to be discarded. We cannot pass the few hours that will intervene between this time and final action on this bill ignorant of these questions, and we cannot afford when we vote on this bill to leave them undecided.

It has been broadly stated here, both by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] and the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST,] that the Mississippi River belongs to the United States, and the Senator from Arkansas went so far, in quoting from what he said was Mr. Jefferson's view of this question, as to assert the proposition that when the territory of Louisiana was purchased from the French we acquired the title to all there was under the river and to all the margins of the river, and that that became the property of the United States.

Just there, Mr. President, is a fundamental proposition of law which requires to be better understood. I take issue with the honorable Senators upon that proposition of law broadly and boldly. I do it boldly because the Supreme Court of the United States have frequently considered and fully decided the question; I do it broadly because the issue is a very broad one, and it is one upon which hinges a great deal that is to be done hereafter if the doctrine insisted on by the honorable Senators is to be carried into the legislation of this country in the future improvement of the shores of the Mississippi River.

The Senator from Arkansas, quoting from Mr. Jefferson, not in so many words, but what he understood to be the substance of some statement he had made, which is printed in the ninth volume of his works, said:

> He said in that document, which is a text-book now, I believe, in all schools on this subject, that the king or sovereign, whatever you may call him, owned the navigable waters, the bed, the beach, and the banks of the river; and when he purchased the Mississippi River he purchased all; he did not purchase merely the bed of the river; and though there are riparian owners, yet they cannot own the land upon the bank and use it to obstruct navigation, for the purpose of obstructing commerce, for that is one of the principles of sovereignty which is never surrendered to anybody or by any government.

That is not as clear a statement of doctrine as the Senator is usually in the habit of making; at the same time, it presents the proposition that when we purchased all that domain which we acquired from France, under the treaty made by Mr. Jefferson, we acquired the right to the land under the rivers, to the rivers themselves, and to the shores. This subject happens to have been several times under discussion in the Supreme Court.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him by stating that, under my view of the law, by the admission of the States into the Union whatever sovereign authority the Government of the United States had passed to the States.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator agrees with the Supreme Court on that proposition. It was decided as far back as the case of Pollard's Lessee vs. Hagan, many years ago in the jurisprudence of the United States. I will read from a late case, however, that of the County of Saint Clair vs. Livingston, decided in 1874. One single extract from that opinion covers the whole ground. Referring to the authority which I have no doubt the Senator from Florida had reference to, the court say:

> By the American Revolution the people of each State, in their sovereign character, acquired the absolute right to all their navigable waters and the soil under them. The shores of navigable waters and the soil under them were not granted by the Constitution to the United States, but were reserved to the States respectively. And new States have the same rights of sovereignty and jurisdiction over this subject as the original ones.

That seems to cover the whole question. This decision arose upon a construction of the very treaty by which we acquired from France this vast territory. It was argued in that cause that the peculiar language of the treaty conferred upon the United States in the acquisition of that territory, certain rights which could not be yielded by the Government of the United States, but must be held on to notwithstanding States were carved out of the territory and became invested with their respective sovereign powers. The Supreme Court met the argument by saying you cannot make a distinction between the old States and the younger ones; they all stand on the same footing.

It is not necessary to elaborate that proposition; it is not necessary for an American lawyer to try to controvert it. The equality of the States themselves is made to rest upon the decision of the Supreme Court thus regulating the right acquired by each of the States, whether new or old, to the rivers and soil beneath them and the shores of the rivers at the time of their admission into the Union as States. I dismiss that subject without further comment.

But now, sir, I think the committee have acted very wisely in touching this subject as gingerly as they have when they come to the question of entering upon the shores of the Mississippi River upon those works which have been already established by the States and under their authority.

The Mississippi River has been leveed in part for many years. Year after year these levees have been extended until through some of the States at least there has been a continuous line of levee, as I am informed, constructed on both sides, and very far up the tributary streams also. Whose property are these levees? To whom do they belong? Unquestionably to the States that erected them, and under whose authority they were erected. What right has the Government of the United States to appropriate these levees to its own use, granting, if you please, that it even has a duty incumbent upon it to protect all the lower lands from overflow? What right has the United States Government, even supposing it has the duty of protecting the lower lands in the valley of the Mississippi against overflow, to appropriate these levees erected by the States? You have no system of law by which it can be done; you have not declared that these levees shall be condemned for public use. They were built for public use, and it would be a curious sort of legislation that would take a structure made for public use, the land for which was condemned under the right of eminent domain in these respective States, and now condemn it by an act of Congress to public uses just the same as those for which it was originally constructed. That would be an absurdity.

How is this commission going, against the authority or license of either of these States, to enter on these embankments even for the purpose of rebuilding them? We have no right to do it under the laws of the United States or the Constitution. Sir, when I find that barrier standing in front of me I stop; I do not go hunting about with microscopic eye to see if I cannot find some word or phrase or some hidden meaning in some sentence of the Constitution to justify me in doing that which I very much desire to do. It is my duty—whether as a Democrat or not makes no difference—it is my duty as an American Senator to stop when I find the barrier of the Constitution in my front, and I do stop. If this bill did not contain the express provision that this money should not be used for the purpose of leveeing to protect private property, I would never vote for it though it appropriated $100,000,000 of money and though every friend I had in the South lived on these shores, for I would have no right to do it. I have no right to tear down a Government in order to build a levee. Our fathers, when they constructed this Government and put the proper balance of powers between the States and the Federal Government, knew what they were doing, and the Supreme Court in following it out have done it as with a pencil of light from the beginning of our Government down to the present time, and I shall follow the authorities on questions of this kind, let come what may.

I do not believe that the Government of the United States has the right to levy a specific tax upon the people of the State of Alabama to build a levee to protect the people of Arkansas, of Louisiana, or Mississippi. Suppose you bring in a direct-tax bill here and declare the purpose of it to be to build a levee to protect the property of the people inundated in the Mississippi Valley, and you apportion it between the States according to population, as the Constitution requires you to apportion direct taxes, I should never be found advocating a bill of that sort on the idea that the Government had the right to impose such a direct tax for the specific purpose of protecting the property of the valley of the Mississippi. I could find no constitutional warrant for that, none whatever.

There are two rivers in my State which unite one hundred and twenty-five or one hundred and fifty miles above the coast of the Gulf of Mexico, and from that on down pass through a beautiful alluvial region. It is very fertile; it makes nine crops out of ten better than it would but for the overflow of the Alabama River, very much better. We have never leveed it at all.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The same thing is true of the Chattahoochee River, in Florida and Georgia. Some of the finest lands in the South border on that river. The only trouble about them is that the river overflows occasionally and destroys the crops.

Mr. MORGAN. I never have thought it would be proper for me to introduce a bill in the Congress of the United States to ask the Government of the United States, or ask the people of Maine and California and Oregon to contribute out of their means to put a dike on either bank of the Alabama River to protect the cotton plantations or the rice plantations there. I never thought of such a thing; and the only distinction between that case and this is that this is a larger river, it is a national river. I admit that distinction. It is "an inland sea," so called. The "inland sea" used to extend to Cairo; it is only a late discovery, I believe, that the Missouri River is an "inland sea," and that the Upper Mississippi is not, and that the Ohio is. I suppose when we get the "inland sea" doctrine extended we shall have it up to the Alleghany and the Wabash, and perhaps into West Virginia, into some of those trout streams up there; they will be "inland seas," because they are tributaries of the Mississippi.

Mr. FRYE. They are now, in the river and harbor bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I have perceived them on the river and harbor bill, and have heard the roar of that "sea" there for some years past, and set myself in vain against it.

Now, Mr. President, I leave that subject, having said upon it all that I desire to say, for I wish to do nothing more than merely to express my view on two questions of law connected with this bill.

The honorable Senator from Arkansas thought that Congress had committed itself to the whole doctrine of leveeing the Mississippi River because it granted to the States certain swamp lands, upon the trust I will call it, the expectation, (never realized, however,) that the proceeds of those lands when they were sold would be applied to the draining of the lands themselves. The Senator from Indiana elucidated that question sufficiently in his last remarks to the Senate.

That was a peculiar law, a very unfortunate law, a total miscarriage in legislation, one of the most embarrassing statutes ever set on foot. A large quantity of land was granted to the State of Alabama for the purpose of drainage. Much of that land has been sold, nearly all of it, and I have never heard yet of a dollar being appropriated by the government of the State of Alabama for the drainage of a single acre. We have no law on the subject; we have actually paid no attention to the subject at all; we have taken the money and applied it to such other uses and purposes as we thought were best for the good of the people of the State at large.

But the authority which is quoted to sustain that proposition of law, while correctly quoted in terms, has been misapplied; that is, the authority of the great Southern statesman, Mr. Calhoun, who was a strict constructionist of the Constitution and who did understand the principles of the Constitution perhaps as well as any American statesmen has ever understood them. But whoever will read the report of 1846 quoted in this debate will see that Mr. Calhoun was trying to bring the lands in the Mississippi Valley within the reach of private ownership and to enable the men who might acquire them at a quarter of a dollar an acre—for that is the sum he mentioned in his report—to become so rich in the intrinsic value of these lands as that they could afford to put up the money to protect them. He was trying to capitalize the swamps in the Mississippi Valley in order that they might be used by private owners as a fund for the erection of these embankments. The argument was this: the lands are here; they are not useful to the Government of the United States because they are overflowed or swamp lands. "Swamp or overflowed" is the language of that statute. I suppose that every foot of land in the valley of the Mississippi really might have been condemned under this grant to the use of drainage of the land so as to prevent it from overflow. "Swamp and overflowed lands." They were of no use to the Government; they could not be sold, or at least for anything like a fair price.

It was understood then, and believed, that the States would provide with the proceeds for reclaiming them from overflow by levees. I am not a convert to that doctrine. I am merely stating what the people at large seemed to think was the true doctrine on that subject. It was assumed that it was necessary to embank the Mississippi River to keep all those lands from being overflowed, and to enable the States to do it what was done with the lands? They were not sold and the money dedicated to be expended by engineers of the United States Government for the building of levees. The Government of the United States, under the swamp-land grant, never undertook the job of building levees. Who will undertake to say that one dollar of the proceeds of the sales of the swamp lands could be employed by agents or officers of the United States Government in building a dike or a dam or a levee anywhere? Nobody could say it. On the contrary, Mr. Calhoun, following out that doctrine which inspired all of his public conduct, provided in this report and in the bill which followed it that these lands should be granted to the States, and might be sold by the States, that the States might be the better able to employ the proceeds for doing this work. So far from his asserting, therefore, the power of the United States Government to build a levee on the banks of the Mississippi River or anywhere else to protect low lands, he expressly abandoned and disclaimed it by placing these lands in the charge of the States upon a gratuity, without consideration, except that they were intrusted to apply the proceeds of the sales to this purpose. He gave them the lands in order that the States might be enabled to build the walls to protect them against the water; not that we held on to the lands and said we will sell them and put our engineers there to build walls to protect them. There he understood, as with a line of light, the distinction between Federal power and State power, Federal duty and State duty; he drew it as no other man scarcely could draw it in that respect, and there it stands a monument to his fame and to his fidelity to principle. Mr. Calhoun, after having turned these lands over to the States and having allowed them thus to enrich themselves that they might thereby become enabled to build these fences against the overflow of the Mississippi River, did his whole duty. If the States have squandered the grant it is their misfortune. But, sir, we have no right in his name and by his authority to undertake to say that because he was willing to grant lands to the States to enable them to make these dikes, therefore the Government of the United States has any such duty or obligation upon it.

Where was his authority for granting these lands to the States? It is the authority which the Government of the United States, as well announced by the Senator from Missouri, possesses over its own. I concede that doctrine. When the Government of the United States owns a piece of property, it has a perfect right to give it away if it chooses to do so. It may not be right and proper in morals to do it, but as a matter of constitutional power it has the right. The Government of the United States owns the public lands in all the land States; no question of that; and under an express provision of the Constitution directly bearing upon the question it may dispose of the territory. There is no want of power; it is as clear as it can be made by words.

But, sir, that is a different power altogether from taxing the people of Maine or of Alabama or of Oregon or of California to raise money to protect a man's land somewhere in the valley of the Mississippi River, or it may be in the State of Indiana. That is a different power. We may have, and we have, a very clear right over the public domain to dispose of it as we think proper, and we have exercised it freely in various quarters in bounties and bonuses to colleges and public schools and in every other way that we saw proper without stint and without question; but it is a different power altogether, yes, as different as my right hand is from my left hand, from the power to tax the people of the United States to raise money to be expended in the construction of works for the protection of private property against devastation.

That is all I have to say upon that question. I merely desire to say a word further about this measure. I regret that the Senate is in a hurry about passing this bill; really we should not be. We are acting now under the panic produced by this fearful overflow, this extraordinary flood which has poured its waters over the valley of the Mississippi. We are not in a condition to-day in this body for deliberate legislation on this question. We are urged into it by a popular demand which we scarcely have, it seems to me, the courage to withstand. This bill is not a mature bill; it is not a perfect bill. As far as it goes I will go with it, and vote for it, although I must here say, not in the nature of a prophecy but in the nature of a doubt, that I do not believe if you expended $60,000,000 on the Mississippi River you would do much toward improving its navigation or protecting the people against its overflow.

It is a work of ages. God knows how it is to be accomplished, and I think He only knows.

I think the engineering done by the Mississippi River itself when it was left to itself was about the best that was ever done with a view to its own protection, if what the Senator from Mississippi so well remarked yesterday is literally true, as a matter of fact, and and that is that the Mississippi River had by its own action built up walls on either side. He told us that the land, I believe he said within a mile, or some distance back, was fifteen or twenty feet lower than the surface of the water; and yet the banks at its side were on a level with that bed; no human hand touched it; the trees and plants and grass growing on the margin had collected and formed eddies, which deposited the material coming down from above, and the matter thus collected formed banks which overtopped the valley. That is what I understood to be his description of it, and I have heard that from every person I have ever heard speak on the subject from actual knowledge and observation. Therefore, excuse me if I express a doubt whether the tinkering of man with that stream is going to do it any good. I have great doubt about it. Still the judgment of the country is against me; the judgment of scientific men is against me, and, therefore, I am warranted as a Senator in voting $6,000,000 on this experiment.

It is a vast experiment, sir. Six million dollars in one experimental vote is a large sum of money to commence with, and I wish to see a considerable portion of that money spent, and to have a report of some success in the spending of it before I vote any more. I will go the $6,000,000, under the restriction placed by this committee on this bill, that not one dollar of it shall be used for the purpose of leveeing the banks of the Mississippi to protect private property, but use as much of it as you see proper for building levees when you ascertain from your engineers that that is the best way to deepen the channel of the river.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I propose to submit some observations on this bill, but as the hour is late, and I am appealed to to yield, if the Senate has no objection, I will give way, retaining my right to the floor on the unfinished business.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask the Senate to take up a bill to which there will be no opposition.

Mr. KELLOGG. Before the Senate does that let me say a word. I desire to inquire if an arrangement cannot be made by which it will be unanimously understood that a vote shall be taken upon the pending bill some time before we adjourn on Monday. I am advised that there are no Senators who wish to speak, save perhaps two or three on this side who desire each to make a few remarks; and I think as the Senator from California desires to call up the Chinese bill on Tuesday, we can reach an agreement to vote upon this bill on Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are a great many other bills besides the Chinese bill about which notices have been given.

Mr. KELLOGG. I only mentioned that——

Mr. CALL. I want to be heard on this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the suggestion. The Senator from Louisiana wants the Senate to come to an understanding to take a vote upon the pending bill some time during Monday next.

Mr. PENDLETON. I object to any arrangement of that kind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to any arrangement.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope, then, that we shall be able to get a vote on Monday very soon after we take up the bill.

Mr. PENDLETON. That may be done; but I object to any arrangement.

GERMAN PROTESTANT ORPHAN ASYLUM.

Mr. ALDRICH. I appeal to the Senate to let me have taken from the Calendar for present consideration House bill No. 3246.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3246) changing the name of the German Protestant Orphan Asylum Association. It provides that the corporation organized and existing in the District of Columbia, and heretofore known as the German Protestant Orphan Asylum Association, shall hereafter be known by the name and style of the German Orphan Asylum Association of the District of Columbia; and hereafter it shall be lawful to have a board of directors composed of eighteen persons, instead of twelve as provided in the charter of the corporation.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4454) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Keithsburgh, in the State of Illinois, and to establish it as a post-road.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 361) for a public building at Frankfort, Kentucky;

A bill (S. No. 26) to amend section 2326 of the Revised Statutes in regard to mineral lands, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4454) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Keithsburgh, in the State of Illinois, and to establish it as a post-road.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication dated the 15th instant from the Secretary of the Interior with draft of bill and accompanying papers touching the amendment of section 2142 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The subject is presented for the consideration of Congress.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 21, 1882.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 5352) to amend the laws with reference to elections in West Virginia was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The bill (H. R. No. 5541) to extend to sailing-vessels the same privileges in unlading cargo as are now granted to steamships was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being Senate bill No. 1572, upon which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] is entitled to the floor. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 21, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

UNLADING CARGO.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar for immediate consideration the bill (H. R. No. 5541) to extend to sailing-vessels the same privileges in unlading cargo as are now granted to steam-vessels.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let the bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which objections, if any, will be in order.

Mr. DINGLEY. The bill amends sections 2871 and 2966 of the Revised Statutes of the United States by striking out the words

"steamship" and "propelled by steam" where they occur, and inserting instead the word "vessel;" so that the law relating to the unlading of cargo may apply to sailing-vessels as well as to steamships. If consent is given to take up the bill, at the suggestion of the collector of the port of New York I will propose a substitute for the first section of the bill as introduced by myself, which I will send up. The amendment accomplishes the same purpose as the original section, but reaches it by adding a new clause to another section of the statutes, so as to give the collector discretion in granting permits to sailing-vessels to unlade by night on the same conditions as are now granted to steamships. The collector thinks that section 2871 of the Revised Statutes better stand as it is now; and that the amendment which I have sent up to section 2872 will make that section cover the whole ground, and in such a way as to work well in practice.

As the law stands now steamships engaged in the foreign carrying trade can have dispatch in discharging cargo, and can discharge by night as well as by day, thus saving wharfage and many other expenses. Sailing-vessels are denied this privilege. As steamships engaged in this trade mainly carry a foreign flag, and nearly all American vessels engaged in this trade are sailing craft, the law as it exists is practically a discrimination against our own merchant marine.

Mr. McMILLIN. I am willing to take, in lieu of the reading of the bill, the statement of the gentleman from Maine in regard to the change proposed.

Mr. COX, of New York. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 2871 of the Revised Statutes be amended by striking out the word "steamship" wherever it occurs in said section, and substituting therefor the word "vessel," so that said section as amended will read as follows:

"SEC. 2871. The collector of customs, with the concurrence of the naval officer where there is one, of any port at which a vessel from a foreign port or place may arrive, upon or after the issuing of a general order, shall grant, upon proper application therefor, a special license to unlade the cargo of said vessel at night, that is to say, between sunset and sunrise; but before any such special license is granted, the master, agents, or consignees of the vessel shall execute and deliver to the collector a good and sufficient bond, to be approved by him, conditioned to indemnify and save the collector harmless from any and all losses and liabilities which may occur or be occasioned by reason of the granting of such special license; and any liability of the master or owner of any such vessel to the owner or consignee of any merchandise landed from her shall not be affected by the granting of such special license or of any general order, but such liability shall continue until the merchandise is properly removed from the dock whereon the same may be landed. The collector, under such general regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, shall fix a uniform and reasonable rate of compensation for like service, to be paid by the master, owner, or consignee whenever such special license is granted, and shall collect and distribute the same among the inspectors assigned to superintend the unlading of the cargo."

SEC. 2. That section 2966 of the Revised Statutes be amended by striking out the words "propelled in whole or in part by steam," so that said section as amended will read as follows:

"SEC. 2966. When merchandise shall be imported into any port of the United States, from any foreign country, in vessels, and it shall appear by the bills of lading that the merchandise so imported is to be delivered immediately after the entry of the vessel, the collector of such port may take possession of such merchandise and deposit the same in bonded warehouse; and when it does not appear by the bills of lading that the merchandise so imported is to be immediately delivered, the collector of the customs may take possession of the same and deposit it in bonded warehouse, at the request of the owner, master, or consignee of the vessel, on three days' notice to such collector after the entry of the vessel."

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to say one word. I find there is some misapprehension in regard to what I said yesterday as to the granting of unanimous consent. I did not say I intended to oppose an objection to granting unanimous consent, but that I wished the House to adopt this rule, that the privilege of asking that bills be passed by unanimous consent be granted to members in their alphabetical order, so that each and every member may have a like privilege.

Mr. DINGLEY. This is the first time I have asked unanimous consent for anything.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Hereafter we ought to adopt the plan I have indicated.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] and myself might not be reached at all, as we are far down on the alphabet.

The SPEAKER. No objection being made, the bill is before the House for consideration.

Mr. COX, of New York. This bill is a mere matter of convenience to shippers, and there ought to be no objection to it. It involves the expenditure of no money, and simply puts sailing-vessels in the same position that steamships now occupy. Steamships have had this privilege heretofore because of the necessity of getting the mails on shore at night. This bill only extends to our sailing-vessels the same privileges that foreign steamships enjoy to-day.

Now, while bills are being brought in here from the Committee on Commerce with reference to property and to shipping, I invoke the earnest attention of that committee and of this House to the fact that bills are now pending before that committee which concern the preservation of human health and life. This House did a graceful thing last week by passing a bill, at the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. GUENTHER,] for the protection and safety of immigrants coming from abroad. In other words, this House has been generous as to the health and life of persons.

The bill now pending before the Committee on Commerce, and for which I invoke the earnest attention of that committee and of this House, has reference to the inspection of vessels sailing from our ports under foreign flags, which now escape inspection. While our laws command us to inspect our own vessels, vessels under the British and other flags can sail out of New York Harbor for the West India ports without being inspected; vessels which are nothing but rotten hulks, old blockade runners which have been bought up.

Mr. HAZELTON. Is that in this bill?

Mr. COX, of New York. No, sir; but I am calling attention to a matter which is more important. I again ask, in the interest of human life, as I have asked before on other occasions, that the bill providing for the inspection of these British bottoms which are allowed to take our people to the West Indies, the Bermudas, and other places shall have attention in this House. Such a bill was passed at the last session by the House, but failed to receive action in the Senate. Now let the Committee on Commerce bring in that bill, and let us do something for life as well as for property.

I have no objection to this bill, and hope that it will be passed without objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask the Clerk to read the amendment which I have sent up.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the first section of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That section 2872 of the Revised Statutes be amended by adding thereto the following:

"When a license to unload between the setting and rising of the sun is granted to a sailing-vessel under this section, a fixed, uniform and reasonable compensation may be allowed to the inspector or inspectors for services between the setting and rising of the sun under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, to be received by the collector from the master, owner, or assignee of the vessel, and to be paid by him to the inspector or inspectors.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DINGLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MINERAL CLAIMS.

Mr. CASSIDY. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 26, to amend section 2326 of the Revised Statutes, in regard to mineral lands, and for other purposes, be taken from the Speaker's table and considered at this time. It is the same bill which I asked unanimous consent the other day to call up, and it was then objected to. I have since explained to the gentleman making the objection the object of the bill, and he does not now object.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the adverse claim required by section 2326 of the Revised Statutes may be verified by the oath of any duly authorized agent or attorney-in-fact of the adverse claimant cognizant of the facts stated; and the adverse claimant, if residing or at the time being beyond the limits of the district wherein the claim is situated, may make oath to the adverse claim before the clerk of any court of record of the United States or of the State or Territory where the adverse claimant may then be, or before any notary public of such State or Territory.

SEC. 2. That applicants for mineral patents, if residing beyond the limits of the district wherein the claim is situated, may make any oath or affidavit required for proof of citizenship before the clerk of any court of record or before any notary public of any State or Territory.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three several times, and passed.

Mr. CASSIDY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MARSH. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent that the roll of members be now called in alphabetical order, and that each member as called be allowed to present one proposition for consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBESON. I object.

Mr. MILLS. Then I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALDRICH] was necessarily absent from the House on Monday last on business of the House when the States were called for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference. He asks now consent to introduce a bill and a joint resolution. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CHARLES G. EDDY.

Mr. ALDRICH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5904) for the relief of Charles G. Eddy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

HENRY WALKE.

Mr. ALDRICH also, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 198) tendering the thanks of Congress to Rear-Admiral Henry Walke and the officers and men under his command on the United States steamer Carondelet on April 5, 1862; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MARSH. I hope the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] will withdraw his demand for the regular order.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to state to the House, having given notice yesterday that I would to-day call up a contested-election case, that for certain reasons I do not now propose to call up any such case either to-day or to-morrow. I desire, however, to give notice that at the earliest possible moment next week I will call up the first contested-election case on the Calendar and try to have it considered by the House. I give this notice that members may be prepared to consider the case when called up.

Mr. BOWMAN. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

The motion was not agreed to; there being ayes 67, noes 46—less than two-thirds voting in the affirmative.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 197) making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for public printing and binding for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will at this time lay before the House several executive communications.

There was no objection.

FORT MAGINNIS POST.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committeee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a letter from the Secretary of War, of the 18th instant, inclosing plans and estimates for the completion of the post of Fort Maginnis, Montana Territory, and recommending an appropriation for the purpose of $25,000, as called for by the estimates.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 20, 1882.

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a note addressed by the minister plenipotentiary of Mexico to the Secretary of State, proposing the conclusion of a convention between the two countries for defining the boundary between the United States and Mexico from the Rio Grande westward to the Pacific Ocean by the erection of durable monuments. I also lay before Congress a letter on the same subject, with its accompaniment, from the Secretary of War, to whom the proposition was referred by the Secretary of State for the expression of his views thereon.

I deem it important that the boundary line between the two countries, as defined by existing treaties and already once surveyed, should be run anew and defined by suitable permanent monuments. By so doing uncertainty will be prevented as to jurisdiction in criminal and municipal affairs, and questions be averted which may at any time in the near future arise with the growth of population on the border.

Moreover, I conceive that the willing and speedy assent of the Government of the United States to the proposal thus to determine the existing stipulated boundary with permanence and precision will be in some sense an assurance to Mexico that the unauthorized suspicion which of late years seems to have gained some credence in that Republic that the United States covets and seeks to annex neighboring territory is without foundation. That which the United States seeks, and which the definite settlement of the boundary in the proposed manner will promote, is a confiding and friendly feeling between the two nations leading to advantageous commerce and closer commercial relations.

I have to suggest that, in accepting this proposal, suitable provision be made for an adequate military force on the frontier to protect the surveying parties from hostile Indians. The troops so employed will at the same time protect the settlers on the border and help to prevent marauding on both sides by the nomadic Indians.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 18, 1882.

LIGHTS ON BRIDGES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Light-House Board recommending that House bill providing for the extensions of the operations of the board be amended so as to provide for the maintenance of lights on bridges by the owners thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

INVESTIGATION OF CLAIMS BY QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement in response to House resolution of April 14, 1882, relative to agents of the Quartermaster-General's Department now employed in the investigation of claims under the act of July 4, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, and ordered to be printed.

GOVERNMENT DRY-DOCK AT DES MOINES RAPIDS CANAL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting report of Captain A. Mackenzie, Corps of Engineers, in response to House resolution of March 30, 1882, calling for information concerning the building of a Government dry-dock at the Des Moines Rapids Canal, on the Mississippi River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. COBB, by unanimous consent, obtained indefinite leave of absence on account of sickness in his family.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. PAUL, by unanimous consent, obtained leave for the withdrawal from the files of the petition of J. M. Dutrow.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER, KEITHSBURGH, ILLINOIS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] withdraws his call for the regular order as against the application of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSH,] who desires concurrence in Senate amendments to a House bill.

Mr. MARSH. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table, for concurrence in the amendments of the Senate, the bill (H. R. No. 4454) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Keithsburgh, in the State of Illinois, and to establish it as a post-road.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the amendments of the Senate; which were read, as follows:

On page 4 insert, in line 20, after the word "changed," the words "or removed."

After the words "United States," in line 27, strike out the following: "That the said Mercer County Bridge Company, or the said Keithsburgh Company, whichever of them shall construct said bridge, may execute a mortgage or mortgages thereon, and issue bonds, payable, principal and interest, in gold, the payment of which shall be secured by said mortgage."

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. MARSH moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTIONS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. KENNA. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the House Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. No. 5352) to amend the laws with reference to elections in West Virginia. This bill provides for the election of Representatives to the next Congress; and if the matter is understood, I am sure there will be no objection. Under the law as it now stands we must have two elections in West Virginia the coming fall, a State election in October and an election of Congressmen in November. This bill proposes simply to avoid the expense of two elections.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, the right to object being reserved.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That on the second Tuesday of October, 1882, there shall be elected in each Congressional district in the State of West Virginia one Representative to represent said State of West Virginia in the Forty-eighth Congress.

SEC. 2. That said election shall be conducted according to the laws now in force, except so far as the same relate to and fix the time of such election.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the House Calendar, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KENNA moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLERK OF COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. HASKELL, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be, and are hereby, respectfully requested to make provision in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the ensuing fiscal year, for the clerk of the Committee on Indian Affairs as one of the "annual committee clerks" provided for in said bill.

FLORIDA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Mr. Speaker, I present the views of the minority of the Committee on Elections in the Florida contested-election case of Bisbee against Finley, and ask that they be printed with the majority report for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. The request will be granted. It is the gentleman's right.

It was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Speaker, the regular order was called for some time ago.

The SPEAKER. These are privileged matters.

TREATY WITH SPAIN, ETC.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to have printed certain correspondence relating to the treaty of 1819 with Spain; also correspondence as to the payment of consular fees, for the use of Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. That goes to the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. This is a matter of printing for the use of the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. It should go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I have submitted it to the Printing Committee. The matter is before our committee and is mere incidental printing for the use of the committee. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] informed me that he would have no objection to it, and the business of the committee is being somewhat delayed for want of this correspondence.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object, but I think it should go to the Committee on Printing.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXCHANGE OF OFFICIAL DOCUMENTS.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, a communication was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs from the president of the Chamber of Deputies of France in regard to an exchange of official documents, and I am directed to report it back as action is not required further than an acknowledgment by the proper officer of the House of the receipt of the documents. Let it be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The communication will be laid upon the table in accordance with the report of the committee.

It was accordingly laid on the table.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, this being Friday, committees will be called for reports of a private nature.

JANE MULLIGAN.

Mr. DUNNELL, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back adversely the petition of Jane Mulligan; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

NEZ PERCÉ WAR.

Mr. UPSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported, as a substitute for House bills Nos. 1910, 1937, and 2577, a bill (H. R. No. 5905) for the relief of citizens of the State of Oregon and of Idaho and Washington Territories who served with the United States troops in the war with the Nez Percé and Bannock Indians, and for the relief of the heirs of such as were killed in such service; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ROBERT PEYSERT.

Mr. LACEY, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 3083) for the relief of Robert Peysert; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CHARLES F. PARIS.

Mr. MATSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 4268) granting a pension to Charles F. Paris; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ELECTA L. BALDWIN.

Mr. MATSON also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 2104) granting a pension to Mrs. Electa L. Baldwin; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JAMES E. GOTT.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 627) to increase the pension of James E. Gott; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ELIZA J. YARNELL.

Mr. DAWES also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 4535) granting an increase of pension to Eliza J. Yarnell; which was referred, at the request of a member, to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

NANCY LEONARD.

Mr. DAWES also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 5087) restoring to the pension-roll the name of Nancy Leonard; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back adversely the following bills; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 1124) granting a pension to Leonard Weber; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1168) granting a pension to Philip J. Widtmeyer.

EDWARD FARR.

Mr. WADSWORTH also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1154) granting a pension to Edward Farr; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HUGO EICHHOLTZ.

Mr. WADSWORTH also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 5820) granting a pension to Hugo Eichholtz; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

EARL S. RATHBUN.

Mr. JOYCE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back the bill (S. No. 891) granting a pension to Earl S. Rathbun; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM R. PERDUE.

Mr. JOYCE also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1468) granting a pension to William R. Perdue; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

BILLS ALREADY PASSED.

Mr. JOYCE also, from the same committee, moved it be discharged from the further consideration of the following bills, pensions having been granted at the Pension Office:

A bill (H. R. No. 1542) granting a pension to George Taylor; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1546) granting a pension to Andrew J. Horton.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were laid upon the table.

JOHN TAYLOR.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, inasmuch as the call of committees has been concluded, to make a report from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. A bill has passed the House and gone to the Senate for the relief of John Taylor. The Senate has passed a similar bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill be taken from the Speaker's table and passed.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. No. 632) granting a pension to John Taylor.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Taylor, late of Battery M, Third New York Light Artillery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving, from and after the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read by its title a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WADSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BOWMAN. I move to dispense with the regular order, which is the consideration in Committee of the Whole of the Private Calendar, and give notice to the House that my object in doing so is to call up for immediate consideration the special assignment, being the bill for the reference of private claims to the Court of Claims, and therefore is a very appropriate subject for consideration on private bill day instead of the Private Calendar.

Mr. HAZELTON. We have only one day in the week which we devote to the consideration of the Private Calendar, and there are certain bills now confronting the House that can never fall under the provisions of the bill to which he refers. I hope this day will be devoted to the legitimate purposes of the Private Calendar and not be permitted to be devoted to other purposes, as we have done on the last two or three Fridays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to dispense with the order of business for to-day. That requires a two-thirds vote.

Mr. BOWMAN. I would make a parliamentary inquiry, whether it is in order for me, instead of making that motion, to call up for consideration the special assignment, and whether that will not take precedence under the rules of the regular order of business for to-day?

The SPEAKER. Under Rule XXVI it requires a two-thirds vote to dispense with private business on Friday. But the Chair will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that a special order, if made for to-day, or a continuing order which comes over from day to day, might properly be called up on this day.

Mr. BOWMAN. Then I call up the special order.

The SPEAKER. If the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar is voted down, then the special order will be before the House.

Mr. HAZELTON. But the consideration of the Private Calendar is the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration in Committee of the Whole of the Private Calender, but that business can be dispensed with by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Massachusetts can reach his purpose in another way. If he will move to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, a majority may vote that motion down; and when it is voted down public business will be in order. The House may then by a majority vote proceed to consider the special order.

Mr. HOUSE. If a motion is made to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, cannot a majority determine it?

The SPEAKER. The majority can do so; but the Chair will state that if there is private business not requiring consideration in the Committee of the Whole and any gentleman desires to call it up, it would still be in order to-day under the rule in preference to any other business. Private business on the Speaker's table might be in order if the House desired to go there.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to make a parliamentary statement. Of course the regular order cannot be set aside on any day except by a two-thirds vote. That is true, but it is every day, when a member can get a hearing, set aside by a two-thirds vote. Now this proposition by the gentleman from Massachusetts has already had its hearing and has set aside the regular order by a two-thirds vote or by unanimous consent at the time when a special day was assigned for its consideration, with the right to continue from day to day; and that special day, with its continuation, runs over the regular order and can never be antagonized except by some other order which has a higher privilege. Therefore I say that a two-thirds vote setting aside the regular order of this day and the regular order of any other day has been already had on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts and its adoption when his special order was made; so it is clear that that special order or assignment made by a two-thirds vote or by a unanimous vote has the right to all the common time of this House, when higher privileges do not intervene, until it is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to dispense with private business on this day.

Mr. BOWMAN. I withdraw that motion, and move that the special assignment, being the bill providing for the reference of certain claims to the Court of Claims, be taken up. That is the special order, and I call for the special order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the special order assigning the business to which the gentleman from Massachusetts refers.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. No. 684) to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government be taken from the House Calendar and made the special order for Tuesday, March 7, after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, not to antagonize general appropriation and revenue bills; and that all amendments to the bill be in order without regard to clause 4, Rule XXI.

Mr. HAZELTON. Now I desire to raise the question of consideration, and I suppose I can do it by making a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can raise the question of consideration by simply stating it. The question is, Will the House proceed to the consideration of the special order named by the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. SPARKS. As I understand, the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts would be subject to the point of order which I propose to make. This is Friday, and the rules provide that bills upon the Private Calendar shall be considered to-day. That can only be dispensed with by a two-thirds vote, because in doing so you change a rule specifically. Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts makes the motion, this being Friday, to take up a particular bill. He can only do that by first dispensing with the regular order, which is the Private Calendar.

Mr. BOWMAN. It was dispensed with when this special assignment was made.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to reply to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS.] Of course private bills are the regular order on Friday, just as ordinary public business is the regular order on other days. But they are the regular order under the rules, and this special assignment has suspended the rules for the purpose of having this bill considered. That has been done by a two-thirds vote, which has made it the regular order for to-day by a two-thirds vote already passed——

Mr. HAZELTON. I would like to see the record of that.

Mr. ROBESON. Or by unanimous consent. The regular order on Friday is private business; but it is no more the regular order on Friday than public business is the regular order on Thursday. And if this bill would come up on Thursday because the rules are suspended against the regular order, then it will come up on Friday because the rules are suspended against the regular order.

Mr. MILLS. Would it come up on Monday also, against the regular order?

Mr. ROBESON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MILLS. And we would never have any day for introducing bills.

Mr. SPARKS. This question was raised once in a case like this when a bill was set for Friday, and the Speaker ruled on that occasion that the regular order had to be dispensed with even before you could take up a bill set for a special Friday. Now, this bill was set for to-day.

The SPEAKER. That was a different case, as the Chair thinks, if any decision of that kind was made.

Mr. SPARKS. Precisely. It was a stronger case. This bill was not set for to-day but was set for Tuesday. The gentleman from New Jersey insists that as that bill has been set for a particular day, the orders running from day to day, that dispenses with the order of to-day. That will not do under the rule. You must dispense with the consideration of the Private Calendar before you can take up any special order set for any other day, or even for this day.

Mr. ANDERSON. This order dispenses with the regular order on Friday; because while the consideration of the bill was set for a given day, say Tuesday, the order was continuous. Under the order which was adopted by unanimous consent it was to continue Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday, and until disposed of.

Mr. HAZELTON. If I understand the facts, this special order was assigned for Tuesday and was made a continuing order. Am I right about that?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is right about that.

Mr. HAZELTON. Now, Rule XXVI says:

Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private business, unless otherwise determined by a two-thirds vote of the members present and voting.

The very purpose of this rule was that one day in the week, to wit, Friday, should be secured to this House for the consideration of the Private Calendar; and private business can never be set aside without destroying the intent and efficiency of the rule, except when the House determines by a two-thirds vote that that shall be done. As I understand, we have no record that this bill was ever made a special order by any two-thirds vote. The assignment was made originally for a Tuesday. Now it comes over here and these gentlemen confront and strike down this absolute rule which gives us Friday for private business except against a two-thirds vote—strike that down and take away this high privilege under the rule. I say, Mr. Speaker; I defy the gentleman from New Jersey to find an instance or a precedent that will sustain him in striking down this rule in this way.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question. It was competent, was it not, to have assigned Tuesday for the consideration of the bill of the gentleman from Massachusetts by a majority vote?

Mr. HAZELTON. I suppose the House has made assignments by majority votes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not agree with the gentleman in that proposition.

Mr. BOWMAN addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to dispose of this question. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] proposes to call up a special order fixed by a suspension of the rules on February 20 last. This order was made for March 7, and to continue from day to day until disposed of. The Chair has in no instance entertained a motion to fix a day for the special consideration of a bill except when it was done by unanimous consent or under a suspension of the rules. The resolution making this special order, although it named a Tuesday as the day on which the bill might be called up, was a continuing order, and leaves the bill in the same position to-day as though it had been originally assigned by the order of the House for consideration on this day. It is quite true that as against ordinary business under the rules, Rule XXVI gives the prior right to private business over other ordinary business except in cases where it is dispensed with by a two-thirds vote. But the House having made a special order, which is continuing from day to day without any exception save as against general appropriation and revenue bills, the Chair feels bound to hold that this bill may be called up to-day by the gentleman from Massachusetts. But of course, like all other business before the House on any day, it may be antagonized by whatever is proper to be considered. [Mr. HAZELTON rose.] And the gentleman from Wisconsin, the Chair understands, raises the question of consideration.

Mr. HAZELTON. I do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will further state that this order having been made under a suspension of the rules, such suspension included Rule XXVI and all others.

Mr. HAZELTON. The question of consideration is decided by a majority vote.

The SPEAKER. Unquestionably; the House always has the right to refuse to proceed to consider any business that may otherwise be in order.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I have no doubt of the correctness of the ruling of the Chair, but I desire to call attention for future practice to the fact that such ruling will operate of course to set aside even the call of States on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not decide that point now.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I do not ask the Chair to decide it; I only call attention to it so that when any request for such purpose shall be made hereafter the House may understand the effect of it.

The SPEAKER. It is well for the House to understand the operation of its rules and orders, but the decision just made does not necessarily decide that question. The question now is, Will the House now proceed to consider the special order?

The question was taken; and it was agreed to upon a division—ayes 94, noes 55.

REFERENCE OF CLAIMS TO THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER. The House will now proceed to the consideration of the bill which has been made the special order, and which will now be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 684) to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government.

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever a claim or matter is pending before any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives, or before either House of Congress, which involves the investigation and determination of facts, the committee or House may cause the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the Court of Claims of the United States, and the same shall there be proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt. When the facts shall have been found, the court shall not enter judgment thereon, but shall report the same to the committee or to the House by which the case was transmitted for its consideration.

SEC. 2. That when a claim or matter is pending in any of the Executive Departments which may involve controverted questions of fact or law, the head of such Department may transmit the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to said court, and the same shall be there proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt. When the facts and conclusions of law shall have been found, the court shall not enter judgment thereon, but shall report its findings and opinions to the Department by which it was transmitted for its guidance and action.

SEC. 3. That the Attorney-General, or his assistants under his direction, shall appear for the defense and protection of the interests of the United States in all cases which may be transmitted to the Court of Claims under this act, with the same power to interpose counter-claims, offsets, defenses for fraud practiced or attempted to be practiced by claimants, and other defenses in like manner as he is now required to defend the United States in said court.

SEC. 4. That in the trial of such cases no person shall be excluded as a witness because he or she is a party to or interested in the same.

SEC. 5. That reports of the Court of Claims to Congress under this act, if not finally acted upon during the session at which they are reported, shall be continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress until the same shall be finally acted upon.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to suggest that some arrangement be made by which amendments may now be offered so that members can address themselves to the whole subject.

Mr. BOWMAN. I understand that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSE] has a substitute bill, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has an amendment to the original bill to offer. I have no objection to those two amendments coming in now, so that they may be considered together with the bill.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I desire to offer a substitute.

Mr. HOUSE. I desire to offer my amendment as a substitute both for the original bill and the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

The SPEAKER. The question upon the substitute cannot be taken until after the amendments to the original bill have been disposed of.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer an amendment to come in after the first section of the bill.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In any case of a claim for supplies or stores taken by or furnished to any part of the military or naval forces of the United States for their use during the war for the suppression of the rebellion, the petition shall aver that the person who furnished such supplies or stores did not give aid or comfort to said rebellion, and was throughout that war loyal to the Government of the United States; and the fact of such loyalty shall be a jurisdictional fact, and the said court shall first inquire into such fact, and unless it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the court and found by the court, on such preliminary inquiry, that the person who furnished such supplies was throughout said war loyal to the Government of the United States, shall without further proceedings be dismissed. But said court shall not have jurisdiction of any case for the destruction of or damages to property or for the rent or occupation of property used and occupied by the Army during said war in the actual military operations of the Army at the seat of war.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] whether it is his purpose now to allow the presentation of amendments and substitutes regardless of their order, in order that they may be pending? The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] desires to offer a substitute.

Mr. BOWMAN. In order to prevent this bill getting into a state of confusion and complication, I do not want to consent to any more amendments being offered at present than the two to which I have referred. It is my desire that other amendments shall be offered when the time comes for amendments in general. The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSE] is a sleeping amendment, a substitute bill, going to the very merits of the case. I therefore thought it proper that that should come in, in order that we might not have a double discussion, one now and another afterward on that substitute.

The SPEAKER. The substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSE] will now be read.

Mr. HOUSE. I do not care to have it read in full at this time.

The SPEAKER. Then it will be considered as read and pending.

The substitute is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Congress shall not authorize the payment of any private claim not payable under existing laws until the facts on which such claim is based shall have been judicially established and reported as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. Any person having a claim or matter against the United States in respect of which he desires relief by special act of Congress, and of which the Court of Claims could not under existing laws take jurisdiction, may, before applying to Congress for such relief, file a petition in that court stating the facts and grounds on which the relief is sought, and praying the court to find the facts; and the court, under such rules as it may adopt, shall find the facts as established by the evidence, and report the same, with a copy of the petition and answer of the Government, to either House of Congress.

SEC. 3. Whenever a claim or matter is pending before any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives, or before either House of Congress, which involves the investigation and determination of facts, the committee or House may cause the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the Court of Claims, and the same shall be there proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt. When the facts shall have been found, the court shall report the same to the committee or to the House by which the case was transmitted for its consideration.

SEC. 4. In any case of a claim for supplies or stores taken by or furnished to any part of the military or naval forces of the United States for their use during the war for the suppression of the rebellion, or for the destruction of or damage to property by any part of said forces, the petition shall aver that the person who furnished such supplies or stores, or whose property was so taken, destroyed, or damaged, did not give any aid or comfort to said rebellion, but was, throughout that war, loyal to the Government of the United States; which averment shall be investigated, and the facts in relation thereto found and reported by said court.

SEC. 5. All private claims pending in either House of Congress at the final adjournment thereof, involving an investigation or determination of facts shall, with all papers connected therewith, be transferred to the Court of Claims, to be there proceeded with in the manner hereinbefore prescribed.

SEC. 6. No private claim which accrued of the character described in section 2 of this act, prior to the year 1866, and which has not been pending before Congress or some one of the Executive Departments since the year 1860, shall be heard by the Court of Claims, or considered by Congress, or any of the Executive Departments. All other such claims now existing shall be presented to that court, in the manner and for the purpose aforesaid, within two years after the passage of this act, and all claims hereafter accruing shall be so presented within six years after they accrue, in default whereof, in either of said cases, the claims shall be barred: Provided, That the claims of married women, which first accrued during their marriage, and of infants, idiots, insane persons, and persons beyond the seas when the claim accrued, entitled to the claim, shall not be barred if the petition be filed in the court as aforesaid within two years after the disability has ceased; but no other disabilities than those enumerated shall prevent any claim from being barred, nor shall any of the said disabilities operate cumulatively.

SEC. 7. Whenever there shall be pending before the Department of State a claim in behalf of any alien against the United States, founded on or growing out of any treaty with a foreign power or any international obligation, the Secretary of State may, with the consent of the representative of the government of such alien, refer such claim to the Court of Claims; which shall thereupon have jurisdiction to hear and determine the same upon the principles of justice and international law, and to render such judgment as those principles shall require. From any such judgment, when the amount in controversy is $3,000 or more, either party may appeal to the Supreme Court in the manner provided by law in other cases of appeal from the Court of Claims.

SEC. 8. When a claim or matter is pending in any of the Executive Departments which involves controverted questions of fact or law, the head of such Department may transmit the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to said court, and the same shall be there proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt. When the facts and conclusions of law shall have been found, the court shall not enter judgment thereon, but shall report its findings and opinions to the Department by which it was transmitted.

SEC. 9. The Attorney-General, or his assistants under his direction, shall appear for the defense and protection of the interests of the United States in all cases which may be brought in the Court of Claims under this act, with power to interpose counter-claims, offsets, defenses for fraud practiced or attempted to be practiced by claimants, and other defenses, as fully as he is now required or authorized to do in other cases in said court.

SEC. 10. In the trial of such cases no person shall be excluded as a witness because he is a party to or interested in the same; and any claimant or party in interest may be examined as a witness on the part of the Government, and when refusing so to testify, or willfully testifying falsely, shall not be entitled to relief.

SEC. 11. If it shall appear to the court that in any case referred to it under the provisions of this act testimony has been duly taken by either party, the same, so far as relevant and competent, may be used, subject to such rules as the court may see fit to adopt.

SEC. 12. In every case which shall come before the Court of Claims under the provisions of this act, if it shall appear to said court upon the facts established that it has jurisdiction to render judgment thereon under existing laws, it shall proceed to do so, and report its proceedings therein to either House of Congress, or to the Department by which the same was referred to said court.

SEC. 13. Reports of the Court of Claims to Congress under this act, if not finally acted upon during the session at which they are reported, shall be continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress until the same shall be finally acted upon.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I desire to ask the gentleman who has charge of this bill whether or not it is intended to call the previous question and cut off amendments, or will he allow the bill to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole and permit amendments to be offered and discussed under the five-minute rule?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the order of the House making this a special order provides for the introduction of amendments without reference to clause 4 of Rule XXI. How far the gentleman may be willing to extend the matter of amendments before calling the previous question the Chair cannot say.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. Under that order I desire to offer a substitute for the bill and amendments.

The SPEAKER. That would be in order only after disposing of the pending substitute.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I thought that Rule XXI did not apply.

The SPEAKER. That relates only to points of order.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I infer that my colleague, recognizing the importance of this measure, does not expect to have a final vote on the proposition to-day. I therefore suggest that the different propositions to amend may be printed in the RECORD. I do not care about their being offered now, because that would trespass upon the matter of parliamentary practice, but they can be printed for information in the RECORD. This is a complex matter; we want to proceed safely; and I hope that, without any rights being waived, the House may give consent that gentlemen may send up their amendments to be printed, so that we may see them in the morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] asks unanimous consent for the printing in the RECORD of such amendments as gentlemen may propose to offer. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] proposes an amendment——

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. In the nature of a substitute.

The SPEAKER. Which will, under the order, be printed in the RECORD.

The substitute of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, is as follows:

A bill to afford assistance and relief to Congress in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government.

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever a claim or matter is pending before any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives which involves the investigation and determination of facts, the committee may cause the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the Court of Claims of the United States, and the same shall there be proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt. When the facts shall have been found, the court shall not enter judgment thereon, but shall report the same to the committee by which the case was transmitted for its consideration.

SEC. 2. The committee shall thereupon carefully examine such case and report its opinion thereon, with an appropriate bill or resolution, to the House or Senate, as the case may be; and no bill or resolution allowing any such claim shall be considered in either House until some member of such committee shall state on the floor, or in writing, signed by him and filed with the Clerk or Secretary, that he has personally examined such case and recommends its payment.

SEC. 3. That the Attorney-General, or his assistants under his direction, shall appear for the defense and protection of the interests of the United States in all cases which may be transmitted to the Court of Claims under this act, with the same power to interpose counter-claims, offsets, defenses for fraud practiced or attempted to be practiced by claimants, and other defenses in like manner as he is now required to defend the United States in said court.

SEC. 4. That in the examination of such cases no person shall be excluded as a witness because he or she is a party to or interested in the same.

SEC. 5. In all cases arising before the suppression of the rebellion the court shall inquire into, ascertain, and report whether or not the claimant, or the person under whom he claims, gave any aid or comfort to the late rebellion, or was loyal throughout that war to the Government of the United States.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I desire to offer an amendment excepting from the provisions of this bill claims for losses incurred in Indiana and Ohio during the Morgan raid.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Indiana will send up the amendment it will be printed under the order.

The amendment of Mr. STOCKSLAGER is as follows:

Amend section 4 of the substitute offered by Mr. HOUSE, from the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, by adding to the end of said section the following words, to wit:

"Except claims for property taken during the Morgan raid in the States of Indiana and Ohio: And provided, That in said claims thus excepted it shall be the duty of the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department, and they are hereby authorized and directed to receive, pass upon, and settle all claims for property taken and used by the Union forces engaged in opposing or pursuing the rebel forces under General John Morgan while making his raid into the States of Indiana and Ohio, in July, 1863; and said accounting officers are also directed to receive, settle, and pay for all horses taken from citizens of said States by said rebel forces which were afterwards captured, retained, and used by the Union Army; and an appropriation is hereby made, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the same: And provided further, That the said accounting officers of the Treasury shall take and accept as sufficient proof, in all claims so disposed of, the adjudications made by the commissions appointed by said States, respectively, together with the accompanying proofs, which claims, adjudications, and proofs were filed in the offices of the adjutant-generals of said States, respectively: Provided, That all claims not so adjudicated upon may be established as other claims and demands against the United States are now established: And provided further, That upon the finding of said respective commissions, or other sufficient proof of the taking of horses or mules by the said rebel forces, their capture, retention, and use by the Union Army shall be presumed and admitted by said accounting officers, and adjudication and settlement made for the same in the same manner as if said property had been originally taken by the Union forces: And provided further, That the Quartermaster-General is hereby directed, upon the request of claimants or their attorneys, to turn over to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury all claims heretofore filed in his office for property taken from citizens of the States of Indiana and Ohio during the said Morgan raid."

Mr. HOUSE. I wish to make a suggestion. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] has reported a bill from the Committee on Claims. The bill which I offer as a substitute includes several of the sections of the bill of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

A MEMBER. All of them.

Mr. HOUSE. All of them, I believe. The bill I offer as a substitute is reported from the Committee on Civil Service Reform, and includes a good deal which is not embraced in the bill of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Now, I suggest that the adoption or rejection of my substitute will determine the extent to which the House proposes to go in referring these claims to the Court of Claims. I think that a certain period might be allowed for general debate, and then the bill be considered by sections in the House as in Committee of the Whole, allowing such amendments to be offered as any gentleman may propose.

The SPEAKER. That proposition can be agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOUSE. I merely suggest it.

Mr. BOWMAN. I give notice that it is my intention to close this debate to-morrow, if I can, by moving the previous question. I have no objection to amendments coming in and being voted upon at any time, consistently with closing up the subject to-morrow, unless I find that the House is in favor of a further extension of the debate.

Mr. KASSON. If it were possible to close the general debate to-day, and allow the five-minute debate to-morrow in connection with amendments, I believe it would better suit the feeling of the House. There are many of us who have no desire to make speeches, but would like to address the House for five minutes on amendments. I should like to offer and explain an amendment, but I do not care to make a speech.

Mr. BOWMAN. Suppose that the general debate be closed to-morrow at two o'clock, leaving the residue of the day for the offering of amendments and for the five-minute debate. Will that be satisfactory?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to submit that request.

Mr. HOUK. We want more than one day's debate on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the general debate on this bill may be closed at two o'clock to-morrow, and that the bill be then considered by sections as in Committee of the Whole, under the five-minute rule. Is there objection?

Mr. BRAGG and Mr. HOUK objected.

Mr. HUBBELL. It occurs to me that a session could be held this evening and general debate on the bill closed to-day, so that to-morrow we could take up the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CANNON. That is right.

Mr. BOWMAN. If gentlemen want to come here this evening for debate only, and have their speeches go into the RECORD, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. There is a special order for this evening.

Mr. BRAGG. I hope that a measure of this kind, so general and sweeping in its purposes, which may be so dangerous to the public Treasury, as well as obnoxious to the sentiment prevailing in some portions of this country, may not be put through here under whip and spur, without full opportunity for members to examine and discuss it—not to empty benches, but in a full session of the House. This bill proposes to take all claims of every nature and transfer them to the Court of Claims, subject to the determination of that court. Heretofore, in accordance with the sentiment of the people of the United States, as expressed through their representatives in Congressional acts, there has been a restriction upon the claims which could be considered; and if claims are now to be taken from the consideration of the legislative body and sent to the courts I think that the whole subject should be discussed and carefully considered, so as to insure us against making a great mistake, which, after its commission, it may be too late to remedy.

I desire also to offer a substitute for this bill. It is the bill prepared by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] which excludes war claims from consideration, fixes a short limitation as to the bringing of actions, and provides for their trial in the courts of the district in which the cause of action may have arisen.

The substitute of Mr. BRAGG is as follows:

A bill to provide for the bringing of suits by citizens of the United States against the Government thereof in certain cases.

Be it enacted, &c., That any citizen of the United States making a claim against the United States which has become complete within four years next before the passage of this act, or which shall have become complete subsequent to that period, in respect of which he would, under similar circumstances, be entitled to redress against another citizen either in a court of law, equity, or admiralty, may, except in the cases named at the end of this section, apply to the Department of Justice for leave to sue the United States for the enforcement of such claim. Such application shall be by petition in writing, signed either by the petitioner or his lawful attorney duly appointed by instrument in writing, setting forth the full name, usual place of abode, and citizenship of the claimant, and the nature and amount of such claim and the circumstances under which it arose, which petition shall be verified by affidavit. But nothing in this section or in this act shall authorize any such petition or suit for or in respect of any injury to or seizure of person or property, real or personal, or the detention or conversion of the same, or any damages in respect thereof, suffered, done, or committed by or under the authority of the United States, or any Department or officer of the Government thereof, during the late rebellion.

SEC. 2. That on receiving such petition the head of the Department of Justice shall cause the same, with the power of attorney, if there be one, to be recorded, and shall examine the same as soon as may be, and shall grant the same unless he shall be of opinion that such claim is frivolous or has already been passed upon by the two Houses of Congress, or by the Court of Claims, or by some court of justice. If he grant or refuse the leave, he shall make an indorsement accordingly on the petition and sign the same, and deliver the petition back to the petitioner or his attorney, and cause a memorandum of his action to be made at the foot of the record of the petition.

SEC. 3. That if leave to sue be granted as aforesaid, the petitioner may bring a suit, as he shall be advised, in the circuit court of the district in which he resides, and if there be no circuit court in such district, in the district court of the same or in the supreme court of the Territory in which he resides, or if he resides in the Indian country, in the circuit court of any district adjoining the Indian country, or if he resides in any other part of the United States in which there is no circuit or district court, or resides out of the United States, in any circuit court, against the United States for the enforcement of the claim stated in such petition, and he shall file in the clerk's office of such court the before-mentioned petition for leave to sue. He shall give reasonable security, to the satisfaction of a justice or judge of such court, for costs, in case he shall fail in his suit.

SEC. 4. That notice of the commencement of any such suit shall be served on the United States by the marshal of the district in which it is commenced, by leaving a copy of the petition for leave to sue, with its indorsements, and of the declaration, bill, or other pleading, as the case may be, together with a summons to appear at the next regular term of such court, with the district attorney of the United States of the district in which the suit is commenced, which service shall not be less than thirty days before such term.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of any district attorney upon whom such service shall be made to report forthwith to the head of the Department of Justice the fact of the commencement of such suit, and he shall appear in such suit for the United States, and, under the direction of the Department of Justice, shall defend the same; and special counsel for the United States may be employed to assist in such defense in the same manner as is now or may be hereafter provided by law in other cases.

SEC. 6. That after such service and appearance the case shall proceed as nearly as may be like other civil cases in which the United States are a party, and such court shall proceed to hear, try, and determine such case according to the principles of law and justice. In every such suit it shall be lawful for the United States to make and have the benefit of equitable defenses, set-offs, and recoupments, as well as other defenses, and to file and have the benefit of cross-bills, bills of interpleader, and every other species of negative or affirmative answer to such suit, according to the nature of the case.

SEC. 7. That interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, in the nature of damages for delay, may be allowed, as in civil cases between citizens, if the plaintiff shall be found entitled to recover, from the day when payment was finally refused by the executive department of the Government of the United States having cognizance of such claims; and costs in such case may be allowed the plaintiff as in cases between citizens in the courts of the United States.

SEC. 8. That writs of error or appeals, according to the nature of the case, shall be allowed in cases brought under this act to the Supreme Court of the United States, under the same conditions and limitations as are now allowed by law in the case of appeals from the Court of Claims.

SEC. 9. That if final judgment shall be rendered against the United States in any such case the amount of such judgment shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, unless Congress, or either House thereof, shall by resolution direct the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend the payment thereof, in which case payment shall not be made while such resolution shall continue in force. The money necessary for such payments is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 10. That when final judgment in favor of the United States shall be rendered in any such case, costs shall be taxed against the plaintiff and collected as in the case of suits between citizens in the courts of the United States, and every such claim shall be deemed and held to be finally barred.

SEC. 11. That every claim against the United States capable of being prosecuted under this act which has become completed at the day of the passage hereof shall be deemed and held to be finally barred unless the claimant shall present his petition for leave to sue the same, as provided in this act, within three years next after the passage hereof; and every other claim capable of being prosecuted under this act shall be deemed and held to be finally barred unless the claimant shall present his petition for leave to sue the same, as provided in this act, within four years next after the right to so petition shall accrue.

SEC. 12. That the Supreme Court of the United States shall make all such general rules and regulations relating to procedure in cases provided for in this act as may be necessary from time to time to carry its provisions into effect; and the courts of the United States having jurisdiction of cases under this act shall also have power to make such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with any rules and regulations established by the Supreme Court, or with this act, as may be necessary to the ends of justice in the premises.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin may be printed under the general order on the subject. The pending question is to determine the limit of general debate.

Mr. REED. I suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin we shall be likely to have a better attendance if the debate be comparatively a short one. If we allow it to drag day by day then we shall have empty benches. If we close it up in two days we shall have members present and intelligent action on this matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again submit the proposition.

Mr. HUBBELL. We want to close general debate to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again submit the proposition, which is, by unanimous consent general debate be closed to-morrow at two o'clock, and that then the bill shall be considered as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union under the five-minute rule. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. I object. I desire general debate to be closed to-day.

Mr. BOWMAN. I ask that general debate be closed to-day at or before six o'clock.

Mr. BRAGG. I object to that.

Mr. CANNON. Say twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. That will give an hour to-morrow for debate.

Mr. BOWMAN. I will agree to one o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BRAGG. I will object to that. We must spend an hour in the morning on miscellaneous business.

Mr. HOLMAN. Say two o'clock.

Mr. BRAGG. I object to two, but will consent to four.

Mr. BOWMAN. I give notice I will call for the previous question to-morrow at two o'clock.

Mr. BUCK. I offer the following amendment, by direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs:

Amend House bill No. 684 by adding to seventh section:

The Court of Claims is hereby vested with legal and equitable jurisdiction to try, determine, and render judgment on all unsettled or unadjusted claims against the United States of all Indian tribes or nations having treaty relations with the United States, or of individual members of such Indian tribes, or of other persons, growing out of or arising under such treaties, or any law pertaining thereto. And in all actions brought by Indian tribes or nations, or individual members of such tribes or nations, or other persons, in respect of claims growing out of or arising under treaty stipulations or laws relative thereto, the testimony of the individual members of such tribe or nation shall be competent evidence, but the same shall be received subject to such regulations as the said court may prescribe. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, or other officer having custody thereof, upon the order of said court, to transmit to the court the originals, or, in his discretion, certified copies of the originals, of all papers that have been filed in his Department, or any bureau or office thereof, in any case, and all proofs, affidavits, reports, exhibits, or other records or documents which have been or may be filed in his Department, or bureau or office thereof, touching or in any way affecting such case: Provided, That such action shall be commenced by petition either by the claimant, or by delegates or attorneys duly authorized thereto, stating the facts, and under what treaty stipulation or provision of law such Indian tribe or nation, or individual member thereof, or other person, claims to recover, and the amount of such claim: And provided further, That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to appear in behalf of the United States in all actions brought under this section, and from any judgment rendered, when the amount in controversy is $3,000 or more, either party may, within thirty days from the rendition of judgment, appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States in the manner provided by law in other cases of appeal from the Court of Claims. And when legal judgments have been rendered in the Court of Claims, and not appealed from within the time prescribed in this section, or when judgment shall have been rendered in the Supreme Court, the same shall be certified by the court rendering the same to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall transmit the same, with estimates for the payment thereof, to Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose at the present moment to discuss the need of a bill of this kind. Everybody in this House and out of this House at all familiar with this troublesome subject of private claims admits the necessity of some bill to sweep out of Congress this vast mass of business and send it to some tribunal which can treat these questions in a proper and legal manner.

The only question before us is whether or not there shall be some bill for the reference of these claims and what kind of a bill it shall be; not whether we shall accomplish this object, but how we shall accomplish it, and I assume there is not a member in this House who is not in favor of some kind of a bill to get rid of these troublesome questions of private claims, questions which block up the business of the House, which crowd our Calendar, and which come into Congress after Congress, and, except in a very few cases, never reach final determination.

I ask the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker, to this bill reported by the Committee on Claims, which I believe to be the only one at present which can be safely passed. The object in presenting this bill is a simple one. We did not try to do all that we might wish to do. Some of our committee thought that the Court of Claims should have final jurisdiction, so that we should have no trouble with these cases. This committee, in this bill, only reported that which they felt sure would pass. We tried to avoid points and objections made against previous bills, and the one upon which most of the previous bills have been shipwrecked was the objection which had always arisen of leaving matters of pure discretion to the Court of Claims.

It has always been said, and very properly, that Congress could not afford to give up this question of discretion and of pure judgment, where there was no legal measure of damages, where the damages were not liquidated, and those questions which sometimes might be regarded as almost of mere benevolence, to another tribunal; that there should rest in Congress alone this great power of the bestowal of public money, unless there was some legal measure of damages and where damages had not been liquidated by contract or otherwise.

This was the snag on which these bills, many of them, for this purpose were shipwrecked, and we desire here only to report a bill which will avoid the objections, and which can be received and meet the favorable attention of the House, leaving to members who desire a broader bill to try the temper of the House themselves, and not endanger this one, which all, I am sure, will desire to have immediately passed, so as to get relief, if possible, in this Congress.

Now, what does this bill provide? It is a simple, short, compact bill, which I find that most members of the House have not studied, and few seem to fully understand. This bill gives no jurisdiction to the Court of Claims to try cases. Gentlemen have asked me the question, and it has been discussed, I imagine, generally, whether the court shall decide certain classes of claims, and whether it shall have jurisdiction extending over those coming from particular sections, or in regard to particular subjects. I desire to state in this connection the true intent and purpose of the bill. It has no reference, as far as the creation of jurisdiction is concerned, to Northern or Southern claims, Eastern or Western. This bill gives the court jurisdiction to decide nothing.

The House bill, I believe, does the same thing; it gives no power whatever to the court, and I need not waste any time in discussing here whether any power shall be parted with by this Congress and given to the Court of Claims. In one sentence I can tell the whole effect of this bill as to the Court of Claims. It merely says, and there is nothing else essential in it, that either House of Congress, or any committee, or any Department of the Government, may (not must or shall, but may) send any claim to the Court of Claims in order that it may not enter judgment, not send a warrant for payment, not send an appropriation bill here for the payment of their judgment, but find the facts simply and report them to the body which sent the case to them. That is all it does. The Court of Claims may do this, and may, as it finds any other fact in any other case before it, decide these cases so far as the finding of fact alone is concerned. You will see at once the only object of the bill. Congress, or a committee of either House of Congress, may transmit such claims with the vouchers to the Court of Claims and ascertain the facts. We cannot find facts in our legislation here; we cannot examine ex parte evidence in all the cases, and it is worthless if we do. We cannot sit as a court, and therefore we will delegate these duties to a tribunal having all the machinery of a law court and which can find the facts in a particular way, and with all the safeguards on the part of claimants, and on the part of the United States of cross-examination and otherwise, and with the same power to summon witnesses and obtain evidence that any law court possesses.

That is all there is in this bill, and I think there is not a man on this floor that will oppose it; in fact I am sure there is not, because the Committee on Civil Service Reform, who reported a substitute bill, have adopted the bill of my committee verbatim et literatim from beginning to end, and then attached it to several additional provisions which they think ought to pass. So I think I may dismiss the discussion of the bill reported by the Committee on Claims, because the gentleman from Tennessee, if I understand him, and all other gentlemen in this House, with amendments or substitutes, admit that this bill is correct, and they propose only an enlargement of its provisions. Therefore, until I have notice that this bill is attacked in any way, I do not propose to say a word more in its defense.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it may be ahead of time for me to criticise the House bill as I will term it for convenience, rather than to call it the bill reported from the Committee on Civil Service Reform, as it is generally known by the term the House bill, I say it may be ahead of time to criticise that before the arguments in its favor are made. But to avoid claiming the floor again, I will as briefly as possible state my objections to the bill.

This bill of the Committee on Claims has been carefully drawn, has been examined by the judges of the Court of Claims, and satisfies them, and I think is perfect so far as it goes.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Before the gentleman from Massachusetts draws away from his own bill, permit me to ask him whether according to its provisions this does not open the Court of Claims to all claims and to all claimants? They first are required to file their claims in any department, and thereafter, the claims being pending in the Departments, they have a right to go into the Court of Claims.

Mr. BOWMAN. Not at all, sir.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I see no restriction in the language here.

Mr. BOWMAN. I think it does restrict, if the gentleman will observe, by the first section. It provides that whenever a claim is pending before any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives, or before either House of Congress, it may be transmitted to the Court of Claims. This is one of the great merits of the bill as contradistinguished from the House bill, because Congress has said as to certain classes of cases that we exclude them on principle and we do not care what the evidence is.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The second section of the bill is the one I refer to, and that certainly does not bear out the conclusion reached by the gentleman from Massachusetts, unless possibly I hold the wrong bill in my hand. The number of the bill which has been handed me is 4467.

Mr. BOWMAN. That is the wrong bill; that is the House bill which you have; the number of the bill to which I am referring is 684.

This is the great difference of principle between the two bills; because you rightly say that under that bill, no matter though Congress in regard to certain classes of claims which might be enumerated, but which I do not care to enumerate now, says that they are not to be paid on principle, nevertheless those claims could go into the Court of Claims for an adjudication of the facts.

Now, my objections to the House bill are as follows. I will ask the Clerk to read the first section of the House bill—the bill No. 4467.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Congress shall not authorize the payment of any private claim not payable under existing laws until the facts on which such claim is based shall have been judicially established and reported as hereinafter provided.

Mr. BOWMAN. The House will notice that under this clause the bill cuts off all cases where facts may have been already found by another tribunal. It obliges a retrial of the case. No claim can be paid until under this law it shall have gone to the Court of Claims. For example, the State of Massachusetts had a claim against the United States. By act of Congress a judicial commission heard the parties, represented by eminent counsel, decided the case and entered up their judgment, which judgment has never been paid. That case must be tried again in the Court of Claims under this bill. Witnesses may have died; evidence may have been lost or destroyed; and yet in all cases claimants must go to the Court of Claims and try their cases over again—cases where claims are admitted and proved by the Departments, if you please; where the Departments may have given certificates that the claims are due; where the Government has not denied the justice of the claims, and does not wish to contest them. All of these under the law, if this substitute bill becomes a law, must go into the Court of Claims.

I think this is a great objection to that clause. It is contrary to the principles of law or justice to make a man try his case twice over. If he has been once to a tribunal and all his facts are adjudicated, he has a right to destroy his evidence if he pleases, to be careless of it, and let it go, to say he has once tried the case and does not expect to be called on to try it again.

There may be in Congress perfectly plain and simple cases; there may be a case of a man who holds a bond, for example, of the United States, or holds an agreement under seal where there is no doubt about the evidence and no question about the propriety of payment; and that man should not be compelled to go to the Court of Claims.

Now I will ask the Clerk to read the second section, and I ask the attention of the House to that section as it is read, because I can make no better argument against that clause than to have it read, provided it is listened to. I think it will refute itself.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Any person having a claim or matter against the United States in respect of which he desires relief by special act of Congress, and of which the Court of Claims could not under existing laws take jurisdiction, may, before applying to Congress for such relief, file a petition in that court stating the facts and grounds on which the relief is sought, and praying the court to find the facts; and the court, under such rules as it may adopt, shall find the facts as established by the evidence, and report the same, with a copy of the petition and answer of the Government, to either House of Congress.

Mr. BOWMAN. Now, as was suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, we come to the objectionable feature, the great objectionable feature in the substitute bill, which I think should prevent its passage.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If my friend will allow me, I want to call his attention to the second section, the second section of his own bill; I have already called attention to it. He will observe under its operation every conceivable character of claim, however founded, however it may have originated, may be filed with the several Departments and by those Departments referred to the Court of Claims.

Mr. BOWMAN. May be.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. "May be," certainly; they probably would be. There is no limitation at all in that as to the character of the claim. Now, it seems to me some limitation should be provided; some jurisdictional limitation for the government of the court in the considering of claims; otherwise the very claims to which my friend would object I am sure would pour into the Departments by the hundred. Some limitation of time or some other should be fixed.

Mr. BOWMAN. We ought to have a protection somewhere, and the only protection I can think of is in the discretion of the Departments. And secondly, if the Departments do as we think they ought not to do, namely, send improper claims to the Court of Claims, which it is not to be supposed they will venture to do in great classes of objectionable cases, then the Court of Claims only finds the facts and sends them back. Now under this clause of the substitute bill which I object to any person whatever, without any preliminary examination by Congress, by the Attorney-General according to the Edmunds bill, or any other restriction, can open the doors of the Court of Claims, and go right in with his case. Speculative cases, cases which may have no foundation, and where the man thinks he will go a fishing to see if he cannot hunt up something, and possibly get a favorable report—claims barred by limitation, claims barred by the policy of the law, and of the statute, claims barred by the custom of Congress, or of committee, Northern claims, Southern claims, Eastern claims, Western claims—all can go right into the Court of Claims and obtain from that court an adjudication of the facts.

I call to the attention of the House that all other bills have had a safeguard. The bill which I believe is pending in the Senate, known as the Senator Edmunds bill, provides, if I remember, that claims can go into the Court of Claims provided they have the consent of the Attorney-General. That certainly strikes me as an extraordinary provision to say that a plaintiff may sue a defendant in a court provided the defendant first files his consent that he may be sued; that a claimant may sue the United States provided the United States consents. Such a bill is blank paper, or hardly worth the expenditure of the ink and the paper-pulp or wood-pulp used in producing it.

Now, there are certain classes of cases, as we all know, which are barred on principle; Congress does not care to investigate them. When they come before a committee of Congress the committee says, "We do not care what are the facts; we find as a matter of national policy, or of law, or in following precedents, that they are within prohibited classes."

For example, there are many claims pending at this time on account of losses occasioned by battle or the necessary results of the war while the Army was in active operation and where the Army was in active operation. Gentlemen on both sides of the House will say that they do not want such claims considered or paid; that they will not allow the claimant to go into a court and obtain a judicial report on the facts and then by working up sympathy with newspapers or with the people try to build up a case here, and when he gets it into Congress says, "You see, I have a report of the Court of Claims judicially saying that this is a case of terrible hardship; all the facts found judicially, and now I call upon you to pay the claim on those facts."

There are certain other claims barred by customs of committees. For example, the Committee on Claims of the present House early decided that all claims of the following character should not receive a favorable report: of officers or employés of the Army or Navy who have lost personal goods by the sinking of a ship, for example, or other casualties. The question was presented to us whether such a claimant was entitled, besides the pay and emoluments of the service, to insurance on his watch and all other personal property. There are hundreds of such cases here; and as a matter of policy it was determined by us that the United States ought not to insure such claims, and we did not care what were the facts.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOWMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BRAGG. Is it not a fact that heretofore at nearly every session of Congress some committee or other of this House has passed just such claims?

Mr. BOWMAN. Yes; but you will not find that our committee has done it.

Mr. BRAGG. Will not other committees do it?

Mr. BOWMAN. We established the principle that such claims should not be allowed, and I believe we have followed out that rule faithfully.

Mr. BRAGG. But your committee is not a committee in perpetuity.

Mr. BOWMAN. No, sir; fortunately not.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. You hope to be.

Mr. BOWMAN. No, sir; we do not hope to be. We have had enough of it, and that is why we want this bill to go through.

Other claims will suggest themselves to members as barred by policy, by law, or by precedent. For example, the claims under the Southern claims commission, improperly so called, for it was really a general claims commission. Do gentlemen know what that Southern claims commission bill was? Do gentlemen think that that was a bill for the payment of Southern claims? It was not. That bill did not provide for the payment of a single Southern claim of any kind or nature. That bill provided that a certain tribunal called the claims commission should sit—and do what? Do exactly what the Court of Claims will do under this bill; find the facts, adjudicate them, and report them to Congress for its action. This substitute bill is the Southern claims bill almost verbatim et literatim. Do I misstate it?

Mr. HOUSE. You do not state it exactly.

Mr. BOWMAN. Let me send up to the Clerk's desk and have read the second section of the bill known as the Southern claims commission bill.

Mr. HOUSE. The portion of that bill relating to war claims is similar to my substitute, I will admit.

Mr. BOWMAN. While the Clerk is reading section 2 of that bill, I ask members of the House to run along in their minds in parallel lines, following, if they choose, with their eyes, the second section of the substitute bill.

Mr. HOUSE. The gentleman perhaps misunderstood me. I said that my bill was similar to the Southern claims commission bill in reference to war claims alone. I understood the gentleman to say that the whole of my substitute was similar to the Southern claims bill.

Mr. BOWMAN. No; I only meant that section 2.

Mr. HOUSE. I do not controvert that. You must necessarily have some such provision.

Mr. BOWMAN. I call the attention of the House, while the Clerk is reading that section, to the fact that this substitute is substantially a re-enactment of the Southern claims commission bill, which I think expired in 1874.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint a board of commissioners, to be designated as commissioners of claims, to consist of three commissioners, who shall be commissioned for two years, and whose duty it shall be to receive, examine, and consider the justice and validity of such claims as shall be brought before them, of those citizens who remained loyal adherents to the cause and the Government of the United States during the war, for stores or supplies taken or furnished during the rebellion for the use of the Army of the United States in States proclaimed as in insurrection against the United States, including the use and loss of vessels or boats while employed in the military service of the United States. And the said commissioners in considering said claims shall be satisfied from the testimony of witnesses under oath, or from other sufficient evidence, which shall accompany each claim, taken under such rules and regulations as the commissioners may adopt, of the loyalty and adherence of the claimant to the cause and the Government of the United States before and at the time of the taking or furnishing of the property for which any claim shall be made, and of the quantity, quality, and value of the property alleged to have been taken or furnished, and the time, place, and material circumstances of the taking or furnishing of the same. And, upon satisfactory evidence of the justice and validity of any claim, the commissioners shall report their opinion in writing in each case, and shall certify the nature, amount, and value of the property taken, furnished, or used as aforesaid. And each claim which shall be considered, and rejected as unjust and invalid, shall likewise be reported, with the reasons therefor; and no claimant shall withdraw any material evidence submitted in support of any claim.

Mr. TYLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOWMAN. Certainly.

Mr. TYLER. In the law establishing the commissioners of claims, what was known as the Southern claims commission, there is a provision that that commission shall examine only the claims of such persons as maintained their loyalty to the Government of the United States during the war. I inquire of the gentleman if he does not think some such provision is required in his bill referring claims to the Court of Claims? I do not see any such provision in his bill.

Mr. BOWMAN. Because these claims cannot go to the Court of Claims at all under my bill unless Congress or a committee of Congress shall send them there by special vote. This Court of Claims commission bill was passed March 3, 1871, expired in two years, and was subsequently prolonged for two years more, I think.

Mr. TYLER. I think it was still further extended, so that the duties of the commissioners as to the adjudication of claims did not expire until 1879.

Mr. BOWMAN. It was extended four years longer instead of two, I believe.

Mr. TYLER. It was extended as to the time during which the commissioners might receive claims; and they adjudicated them long after they had ceased to receive them. Now, as I understand the gentleman, if Congress, or a committee of Congress, or a Department should elect to send a disloyal claim to the Court of Claims, it could do so under this bill.

Mr. BOWMAN. That could be done under the present bill; but I do not see how it is possible to put into a bill the barred classes of cases. We must leave something to the discretion of Congress or the committees of Congress; and it must be remembered that whatever act may be passed, Congress without regard to it can send claims or not to the court as it may prefer. This is simply a measure to point out a road to Congress or a committee of Congress toward getting cases into the Court of Claims if that be desired.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Congress can refuse to pay the claims.

Mr. BOWMAN. Congress can always refuse to pay; and Congress may provide payment by a bill whenever it pleases, no matter what sort of a measure we may now adopt. This substitute bill, as gentlemen must admit, is in this clause a re-enactment of the bill for the establishment of the Southern claims commission.

Mr. TYLER. I desire the gentleman's view on another point.

Mr. BOWMAN. I am glad to hear any question.

Mr. TYLER. I want to inquire whether in the gentleman's judgment the examination of these claims by the Court of Claims would not be practically an adjudication in the same way as when claims were examined by the commissioners of claims? I do not understand that the adjudication of those commissioners upon questions of fact was ever reviewed even by a committee of Congress; certainly not by the House. The same is true of claims that come up here from the Quartermaster of the Army.

Mr. BOWMAN. I am glad the gentleman asked that question. It reminds me of a point which I might have forgotten. The action of the court in these cases does not amount to a final adjudication. The position of Congress under this bill will be precisely that of the Supreme Court in regard to legal cases coming before the Court of Claims. Cases may be considered as legal or equitable. All legal cases in which damages are due under existing contract go now to the Court of Claims, and may be taken on appeal to the Supreme Court. When the law was first passed the Court of Claims sent up their cases in bulk—evidence, depositions, and all—to the Supreme Court. That court said:

If we undertake to re-examine all the points of these cases we shall be swamped; we can do no other business. We refuse to consider in that way cases coming up from the Court of Claims.

The Supreme Court adopted a rule to that effect; so that the Court of Claims now makes a finding of fact alone, which generally does not cover more than two or three or half a dozen pages of printed matter of the size of our reports; and this finding goes up to the Supreme Court.

Now, as legal cases go up in that way to the Supreme Court from the Court of Claims, so under this bill equitable cases will come up to Congress as a supreme court of claims in regard to such cases. The position is exactly parallel.

Mr. PEELLE. In regard to the reference of claims of persons who are disloyal to the Court of Claims, I wish to say, in answer to the gentleman, that the question of loyalty is also a question of fact to be ascertained by the court.

Mr. BOWMAN. I am glad the gentleman has referred to that; for it brings up one of the features of the law in connection with this bill which demands the very careful and perhaps the prayerful consideration of this House. Let me suppose that a Southern claimant under this substitute prepared by the Committee on Civil Service Reform goes to the Court of Claims. There is no need of mincing matters; we may as well look these things right in the face. A Southern claimant goes to the Court of Claims; that court reports the facts in his case to Congress, showing perhaps a case of peculiar hardship, appealing strongly to our sympathy, and also reports that the question of loyalty under the law or under the decisions of the court was not one of the material facts, although reported on, or was not one on which the court deemed it necessary to make a finding; that loyalty is of no importance as affecting the case. I believe that ground has sometimes been taken by some courts. I am very much misinformed if it has not been.

Mr. HOUSE. That could not possibly be so under our bill, I think.

Mr. BRIGGS. Suppose the court makes the same report upon a claim under the bill of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BOWMAN. Ah, but we have the safeguards beforehand.

Mr. BRIGGS. I do not see them.

Mr. BOWMAN. We provide the same safeguards, I submit to the gentleman, that are now provided. No man can claim that this bill of mine diminishes the safeguards. A committee of the House to-day can report on the question of loyalty; but under this substitute bill the Court of Claims, under the decisions of the Supreme Court, may, if they choose, in their finding report as follows, for example, concerning a Southern claim: "We find the facts concerning this claim to be so and so, and although we are required by the law to find also as one of the facts the question of loyalty, we are satisfied, under the decisions of the court in regard to the amnesty proclamation, that that is an entirely immaterial fact."

When we find the fact we find it so and so, and it is immaterial and cannot lawfully bar a claim, and therefore we so report as a fact on that question."

Mr. TYLER. I hope the gentleman will bear with me for one moment.

Mr. BOWMAN. The gentleman says it is a question of law, but cannot the Court of Claims say they are required to find the question of loyalty as a question of fact, and it having been decided that it is an immaterial fact, they do not deem it necessary to report it? We are making a law for future and unknown judges to act under, as well as the present ones.

Mr. BRAGG. Permit me to ask what will become of such a claim when reported back to Congress? Must not the entire contest be gone over again in this House?

Mr. BOWMAN. Let me ask the gentleman whether he wants to go over that contest in this House when he can stop it?

Mr. BRAGG. Let me inquire of the gentleman again. There never yet was a claim in which the claimant filed a statement of his personal disloyalty in support of it. I doubt whether you ever saw one where the claimant did not file an affidavit of loyalty in support of his claim.

Mr. BOWMAN. That is so.

Mr. BRAGG. If he filed an affidavit from some one that he was loyal during the war, the committee will send it to the Court of Claims and the Court of Claims will have jurisdiction of it. You make it all depend on the statement filed with the claim whether the claimant be loyal or not, and according to that standard there was never a disloyal claimant.

Mr. BOWMAN. I assume in most of the cases the House intends to abide by the Southern claims commission bill, and to regard that as a limitation in all cases.

Mr. BRAGG. Let me inform the gentleman that this House has violated that rule frequently; that this House has reported bills to pay balances rejected by the Southern claims commission.

Mr. BOWMAN. To attempt to bring up isolated or not isolated cases or whole classes of wrong legislation is no answer when we are trying to put additional safeguards in the way; to put additional adjudication by the Court of Claims in the way, when we have nothing to-day but a one-sided ex parte adjudication by a committee of Congress which cannot examine the evidence. And when we propose to put up additional bars, to say that beside doing what you have done before you must go to the Court of Claims and obtain a legal adjudication, it is no answer to say that under an inferior mode of proceeding like the present bad cases have received payment.

Mr. TYLER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts bear with me?

Mr. BOWMAN. I am glad to have gentlemen ask me questions.

Mr. TYLER. I cannot see any objection to having the same safeguard thrown around the Court of Claims in examining these cases that was thrown around the Southern claims commission, so called.

Mr. BOWMAN. Perhaps the gentleman knows what weight is attached to that in the Court of Claims.

Mr. TYLER. That the Court of Claims should first ascertain the loyalty or disloyalty of the claimant, and if disloyal the report should be adverse. Under this bill they are to go on and find the facts.

Mr. BOWMAN. You mean my bill and not the House bill.

Mr. TYLER. They would find whether the claimant was loyal or disloyal, and if disloyal the report should be adverse. They might proceed to examine so as to report the whole case back to Congress. We had an example of that a week ago to-day, where the Committee on Claims reported back a bill where they found the claimant was disloyal but still recommended the passage of the bill. I say there should be a provision which should bar out a disloyal claimant. The first thing which should be examined and adjudicated by the Court of Claims should be whether the claimant was loyal or disloyal, and if disloyal that should be the end of that claim.

Mr. BOWMAN. I do not object to any amendment of that sort, but desire to adopt all of the safeguards, for they will do no harm.

Mr. TYLER. It did no harm in the Southern claims commission to establish just such safeguard.

Mr. BOWMAN. I find I must hurry over the different clauses, as my time has nearly expired.

Now, the fourth section of the substitute bill attempts to set up a protection against this kind of facts or state of law by providing that the court shall find the question of loyalty, but that does not prevent the court finding all the facts and reporting them. Loyalty is one of the facts. In regard to Southern claims, claims for losses which were the necessary result of battle or war; claims for losses by stealing by soldiers; claims for the destruction of buildings or supplies to prevent them falling into the hands of the enemy; in all these cases the court under this substitute bill finds all the facts and reports all the facts which may be established as a foundation for working up sympathy in the newspapers among the people or in Congress, and makes this fact one isolated fact, the question of loyalty. It does not say that the court shall not find and report the facts until it has first found that the claimant is loyal, but it allows the court to find all the facts, one of which is the question of loyalty, and precisely as was provided in the case of the Southern claims commission; and if I am wrong in that statement I would like to be corrected now.

The fifth clause of the bill provides that all claims now pending in either House of Congress at the final adjournment thereof, petitions, bills, resolutions, and memorials, the whole mass pending in Congress, is to be put into carts and teamed down to the Court of Claims and dumped bodily into that court—thousands upon thousands of cases—I think in the last Congress there were about twenty-four thousand of them; I do not mean of the private claims merely, but of all matters before Congress, and of these I do not know how many were private claims, but probably a large majority were. This whole mass is all to be dumped down into the Court of Claims.

Now, I do not know what the court will do, or what provision they will make for taking care of them. The mere indexing, assorting, them, putting them away, docketing the cases, calling them for default or otherwise, would require the service of a largely increased clerical force. Thousands of these claims are utterly worthless. Claims that the claimants themselves never thought worthy of pressing, where the claimants in many cases did not appear before the committees even to press their claims; claims, which have no evidence to substantiate them; worthless speculative cases, fictitious cases, all must go, and notwithstanding this and no matter what their character may be, the whole mass of rubbish must go down bodily to the Court of Claims and impose additional labor and expense upon that body.

The sixth clause is an absolute bar to all claims occurring prior to 1866, and not pending since 1860 in Congress. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say here that I have no sympathy whatever for the defense of a claim being stale, which is a favorite defense here, especially on the part of those who may be desirous of having the reputation of being the watch-dogs of the Treasury. I have not the slightest sympathy with that defense, and it weighs very little with me in the consideration of any question. I shall never be satisfied to take the position of an advocate for the refusal of the Government of the United States to pay its honest debts. Many of these claims are barred by the statute of limitations in this bill when the fault is not with the claimant. They have been coming here year after year with their claims, many of which should have been paid years ago. I have no sympathy therefore with the defense that a case is stale, or that a man who has grown old in prosecuting it has abandoned it. Perhaps he was not able longer to prosecute it, and would not or could not come to Congress after useless trials, and for years perhaps had necessarily allowed the claim to slumber. Newly-discovered evidence may be found in support of claims.

The gentleman opposite me brought such a case before our committee within the last few days, a perfectly just claim supported by evidence which had been voted upon in the Continental Congress, a revolutionary claim, and the heirs had just discovered it. There was no possible doubt about the fact that every single cent was due just as claimed. The defense of limitation by the United States where the debt is honest and justly due, (let me assume that always—where it is honestly due, where the evidence shows it to be due,) I say this defense is often a cruel one on the part of a great government, and it is often unjust to set up a plea in defense that the claim has expired by limitation and should not be paid. I do not believe in the justice of such a plea. Let me send to the Clerk's desk and have read an article which I saw the other day in reference to the effect which this statute or doctrine of limitations has had in the case of one of the honest creditors of the United States; in a case where the money was due, where the United States admitted the justice of the claim, and where this claim was barred by this statute of limitations. I ask the Clerk to read the extract which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

One could wish, for the honor of our country, that this were the end of the story of the life of Arthur St. Clair. But the saddest tale remains to be told. When he returned from his long service in the Northwest Territory, almost penniless, he endeavored to save something from the wreck of his affairs to support his few remaining years. In the dark days of the Revolution he had advanced from his own means, and at Washington's request, $1,800 for the recruiting service, which helped to save to the Army the Pennsylvania Line, which was its flower; and now, in his great need, and with orphan grandchildren dependent upon him, he asked Congress to repay him that sum. A committee reported that the money had been furnished and expended for the benefit of the United States, but that it was barred by the statute of limitations, and recommended the denial of his petition. Again, in the management of the Indian affairs of the Territory, and to carry out the orders of the Secretary of War, he became responsible for $9,000 of supplies furnished to the Government. He had the assurance of Alexander Hamilton, as Secretary of the Treasury, that this claim should be paid with interest; but when he applied to Congress payment of this just debt was refused, and again because of the statute of limitations.

An English gentleman who chanced to be in Washington during the discussion upon General St. Clair's claim thus described his appearance: "This aged patriot, with clothes which might seem, from their appearance, to have felt the effects of all the seasons for the last ten years, with flaxen hair, tottering limbs, a care-worn countenance, deeply dejected from supposing his country ungrateful, and with one foot in the grave, is now a petitioner to that people in whose service he spent his youth, his treasure, and his blood, aiding them in their emancipation from external dominion, and in raising them into a great and an independent nation." Mr. Smith says Henry Clay was among those who befriended St. Clair on this occasion; but this traveler says the prominent leader against St. Clair's claim was Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, whose argument he listened to. However this may be, all that Congress would do was to allow him a pitiful pension, which an unfeeling creditor seized upon at the very door of the Treasury. He returned to Western Pennsylvania, where all that remained of his property had been swept away by the debt contracted for the Indian supplies, and he went forth, in extreme old age, to dwell in a log cabin, in great privation, until the summer of 1818, when death came to his relief. His remains rest beneath a simple memorial, the inscription on which truly recites that it is "an humble monument erected to supply the place of a nobler one due from his country."

Mr. BOWMAN. There is an example of the effect of this beautiful statute of limitations. Allowing that the money was due, it being admitted by a report of a committee of Congress that the debt was justly due, an old soldier who had fought through the war of the Revolution was allowed to die in his log cabin, in great penury and suffering. There are other cases, many of them. I will only refer to the somewhat romantic case of General Sutter, that old gray-haired gentleman from California who came before our committee in the last Congress—a man who had lived like a prince in his own dominions, who received and cared for General Frémont and his hardy pioneers and our bands of soldiers on their exploring expeditions to the great West and across the continent; who, with his fort mounted with cannon, with his hundreds of horses and cattle, and his great fields of grain, was independent and prosperous, and a great part of whose province was taken from him and sold by the United States. I might picture this old man, gray-haired and feeble, sinking into his grave, dying as he did last year in disappointment and want, and unable to get a dollar of his money out of the United States Treasury, money that was justly his due. I do not like this statute of limitations against honest claims. The statutes of repose assume that the creditor has failed to recover, and that if he does not it is his own fault or negligence; but no such presumption arises here. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio.) The gentleman has five minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. BOWMAN. There is no such presumption here for a statute of repose. A man can come here on his knees and humbly beg that Congress will give him his money, but he cannot sue or compel, and in nine cases out of ten Congress never will give him his money.

The seventh clause of the House bill is a good amendment. I will offer it if no one else does as an amendment to the bill of the committee of which I have charge. It did not occur to us; but the judges of the Court of Claims and others say that it is a good thing that these international disputes between the United States and foreign governments may be sent to this Court of Claims for the finding of the facts.

I will occupy only a few moments more. Here is the great difference between the two bills. The one a permissive bill; a simple, compact bill allowing claims to be sent by committee or by Congress to the Court of Claims; the other a broad, sweeping, open bill, sweeping in all classes of claims without any discrimination and without any bar. All claimants whatever, whether they are going afishing to see what they can get; whether they have speculative claims; whether they have claims barred by principle or by statute or by precedent, all of them can go right into the Court of Claims with their cases, no matter what they are.

I only want to say a word, Mr. Speaker, concerning the absolute need in the interest of justice and in the interest of fair dealing of some bill of this sort passing. I cannot delay long upon this subject. In the first place, as regards the United States, some bill of this sort is necessary. How are cases tried here to-day? There is no security against fraud. The evidence is all taken by ex parte affidavits or mere letters; no opportunity to see a witness; no opportunity to confront him; no opportunity to meet him even by a written question; no opportunity to examine him in any way; no examinations for the defense, and no evidence for the United States, unless it is to be found among the records of the different Departments. A good honest deposition looks no better, is written on no whiter paper, has no better penmanship than a fraudulent deposition, and the United States is absolutely without any guard or any security against fraud. But, Mr. Speaker, grievous as are the wrongs and possible injustice toward the United States, they bear no comparison with the wrongs of the creditors of the Government. Every member of this House knows that a private claim against the Government requiring the interposition of Congress is almost worthless; I venture to say that no gentleman of experience upon this floor, if a man came to him and said "I have a contract of the United States; I have an agreement acknowledging in the most solemn terms that they owe me a certain sum of money; all the Departments say and every one acknowledges that the money is due, but I need the interposition of Congress," I say (I think without exaggeration) that, as a purely mercantile transaction, there is no man on this floor that would give ten cents on the dollar for any such clain.

Mr. BRIGGS. Would not that claim go to the Court of Claims now?

Mr. BOWMAN. Not unless it was a legal claim under the law.

Mr. BRIGGS. All claims founded on a contract may go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. BOWMAN. It may be a claim barred by limitations, or there may be other defenses.

Mr. BRIGGS. Then do I understand the effect of your bill to be to remove the limitations?

Mr. BOWMAN. No, sir; not at all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. My colleague from Massachusetts has given a great deal of time to this matter, and the House wants instruction on it. If my colleague wishes to have ten or fifteen minutes more, I think the House will readily grant him that time.

Mr. BOWMAN. I only wish about ten minutes more.

There was no objection, and Mr. BOWMAN's time was extended for ten minutes.

Mr. BOWMAN. I am obliged to the House for its courtesy.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can exaggerate the wrongs of claimants. What is the reputation of an individual, rich and able to pay his debts, who refuses to pay them? We say that that individual swindles. That is what we call it; and I say (and I do not believe the expression is exaggerated) that notwithstanding the talk I hear on this floor and elsewhere of the swindles on the Government, I venture this assertion that the Government every year swindles people out of more money than it is swindled out of. I use that expression, offensive as it is, because it is a strong term and may sink into people's minds; and seeing the grievances of claimants, how they come up here year after year, I desire to arouse a public sentiment here at least which will somehow compel these United States to pay their honest debts to honest claimants. I say that the refusal, or rather the neglect, or rather by reason of the amount of business in our hands the impossibility of securing payment for honest creditors, is a public disgrace. Claimants come here year after year. They grow old and gray in the service. When they are once bitten with the tarantula of thinking they can recover a claim here, they will not abandon it and their children will come after them.

The case of Jarndyce vs. Jarndyce, dragging along in English courts, is nothing to cases which come up here at every session. Revolutionary claims come before us frequently, honest, just claims, and claims of the war of 1812. Claimants come to us and their heirs and descendants for all the years from the beginning of the Government to the present time. And do they get their pay? Not in one case out of ten. The cases serve as foot-balls between the two Houses of Congress. In one Congress the case goes through the Senate; in the next Congress it goes through the House; in the next Congress, through the Senate; and in the next Congress, through the House; and so for generations cases act as foot-balls and are kicked back and forth between the two branches.

It is absolutely impossible for cases to be properly considered and acted on here in Congress. I call the attention of the House and of the country to the immense mass of business in the Forty-fifth Congress, for example. In that Congress the total number of House bills and joint resolutions were 7,676; of Senate bills and joint resolutions, 2,391; of petitions, about 14,000. The total of matters in the Forty-sixth Congress amounted to the enormous number of 24,067.

Look at this book, [holding it up in his hand,] the Calendar of this House, a veritable tomb of the Capulets, a grave of dead hopes. There are more tragedies bound up within the covers of this book than in any novel or set of novels ever written. That book represents money due to poor widows and children and heirs of revolutionary soldiers, or of other worthy and suffering claimants. It represent hopes that have been abandoned. It represents claimants who have come here year after year praying the United States to pay its honest debts, and it represents the disgrace of the United States in not paying its just dues to honest men and women and children, and to soldiers, and sailors, and to many a one who has deserved better treatment at his country's hands.

The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union has on its Calendar 179 cases; it is the Calendar of last Monday. The House Calendar contains 87 cases; the Private Calendar, 324 cases; of special orders, 8 cases; of unfinished business, 14 cases; of Senate bills on the Speaker's table, 170; a total of 782 cases.

We have sat here month after month, and have reached the House Calendar but once during this whole session, and we probably will never reach it again. There are pages on pages of the House Calendar, and we never see it, and probably shall see it but once during this whole Congress. There is the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union which we almost never get to. I believe we have not been to it more than two or three times during this whole session.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. BOWMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. As we are looking for relief, I would like to inquire of my colleague concerning the result of the work of Congress on the reports of the Court of Claims; whether he expects that Congress after receiving such reports will proceed to act upon individual and separate claims; whether such claims will go upon the Calendar separately, or whether they will come before us in bulk, like the quartermasters' claims bill which we passed one day not long ago? If that is to be the result of the operation of this bill, then such claims will receive no consideration hereafter. If we do not pass them in bulk but take them up individually and consider them, will we not have just as large a Calendar as we now have? I do not ask this in opposition to the bill, but in order to get at the facts.

Mr. BOWMAN. I am glad my colleague has asked me the question; though to tell the truth I did not venture or wish to take up this subject in the bill, because I wanted a plain, simple bill that would go through, and which might be improved afterward, if it was found necessary. I will tell the gentleman in a moment what my idea is and what I think should be done.

Taking this bill as it stands, I assume that when the facts, in short printed statements of not more than two pages each in a majority of cases, shall come before Congress or a committee of Congress under the authority of the Court of Claims and after a judicial examination, the committee and the House will adopt such statements of facts and come very speedily to a conclusion; certainly as speedily as we now do in pension cases, which do not materially delay the House or clog the Calendar at the present session.

Now, what possibly may be done, as the gentleman suggests, is this: when this system shall go into working operation and we shall see, as I anticipate we shall, the good results flowing from it, and we find our committees spend no time in examining evidence in claims; that short and simple reports coming from the Court of Claims are adopted as a sound basis for our action; when this experiment has been so fully tried as to satisfy the House that it is the honest and just and proper mode of disposing of these claims, then it may be that the Committee on Claims under new laws or rules, as the Committee on Appropriations now do, may report a general claims appropriation bill. Some method, if thought advisable, might be adopted by which the Committee on Claims could report a general claims appropriation bill, giving in the report accompanying it a short résumé of the facts, in a shape, perhaps, like the ordinary head-notes in our legal reports.

A general claims appropriation bill might be brought in with an accompanying report, stating in a few lines under each claimant's name the gist of his case and what points are involved in it. The whole bill can be taken up and considered as we now consider an appropriation bill for the Army or for the Navy, or for the improvement of rivers and harbors; but all that has nothing to do with this bill.

I do not want that to enter into this discussion, because I do not want gentlemen to say that this is intended as an entering-wedge for the other; that it is intended that all these claims shall be lumped together and passed in that way. All I want this bill to do is to demonstrate to the House that this is the honest and just way to decide claims, both in the interest of the United States and in the interest of honest claimants.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSE] will be recognized as entitled to the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I desire to make a single statement, but if the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE,] who is entitled to the floor, wishes to go on now I will not take up any time at present.

Mr. HOUSE. If the statement is brief it will make no difference.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I only want to say a word or two in the line of what my colleague [Mr. BOWMAN] has said, in order that we may look through to the end of this thing, as we ought to do in all matters of legislation. It seems to me that we should endeavor as far as possible to anticipate somewhat the result of the proposed legislation.

Under any of these different projects a great body of claims will be sent to the Court of Claims for a report upon the facts. They will come back here in a budget; and we may well contemplate that the amount will run up to a great number of millions—perhaps ten, perhaps fifty—nobody can now tell the amount of money which these claims may involve. Now, I submit for the consideration of every member whether we are likely to get such a safe and careful examination of these claims as we ought to have if they are embraced in bulk in a single bill, different Representatives in the House combining perhaps in support of that bill covering possibly $50,000,000 to be paid in different parts of the country. I question very much whether we shall be able to consider as we ought such a bill. It is not without our experience to see gentlemen on even such a matter as the erection of a public building remaining here until the close of a long day's session in order that one gentleman may support the other, and a third the two, and a fourth the three, so as to have a two-thirds vote to get certain bills through. I will not give such a proceeding its ordinary name. We know what it is. We know how members in that way remain here at the cost of personal discomfort in order to accomplish something that they desire.

Mr. BOWMAN. I hope the gentleman will not discuss that. I avoided striking that snag in the bill——

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I noticed that you did.

Mr. BOWMAN. Because I did not want to have that point raised in connection with this bill.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. It is the very "snag" that is in the stream; it is the first "snag" we see; and I am in favor of knocking it out of the way; or if it is one that we cannot get over or around, let us back water a little and take our bearings.

I only throw out this suggestion in order that gentlemen in discussing this question may come right up to the magnitude of the issue and meet it distinctly.

Mr. BOWMAN. Only one word. The point suggested by the gentleman is not contemplated by the bill. This bill no more contemplates putting all claims together in a single measure than putting all other subjects together. If the House should consider this experiment a good one, it may avoid the possibility which the gentleman speaks of by adopting a new rule. That is the real size of the "snag;" it has no substantial existence.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. But we cannot shut our eyes to results of that kind. The gentleman says that his bill does not approach this question. But I want to meet it. I say that we are called upon to meet it at once here and now. We want to pay honest claims; but let us determine whether we are in danger of doing any thing more.

Mr. HOUSE. Mr. Speaker, all the objections raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts last on the floor, [Mr. ROBINSON,] can, I think, be much better considered when we come to take up this bill by sections for amendment. Whether Congress shall consider these claims in one bill or a hundred bills is a matter for Congress itself to determine. It does not, in my opinion, touch the merits of the proposition to refer these claims to the Court of Claims.

In reference to the objections which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] has raised to the substitute presented by me, I propose to defer a reply to those objections until we come to consider in their order the several sections to which he objects. I think I shall then be able to show—I hope to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Massachusetts himself—that many, if not all, of his objections are without foundation. I regret very much that he has felt constrained to object to the substitute that has been offered for his bill. As he has stated, the entire bill which he reported from the Committee on Claims is incorporated in the substitute which I had the honor to report from the Committee on Civil Service Reform. But the substitute which I propose has much more extended range than his bill, and I think a range that is necessary in order to accomplish what this House wants to accomplish; that is, to give honest claimants a chance to have their claims heard, and to relieve Congress from the burden of their consideration.

But, as I have said, Mr. Speaker, when the substitute is reached, when it is being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, section by section, I shall then take occasion to reply to the several objections which the gentleman from Massachusetts has urged against it. For the present I desire to place before the House the provisions of my substitute and the reasons for its adoption.

Mr. Speaker, the subject of the investigation by Congress of the private claims of citizens against the Government has been for a long time a vexatious and troublesome question and a source of much censure and dissatisfaction on the part of claimants who have been doomed to await for years the action of Congress in their cases until their patience has been exhausted and their lives perhaps worn out in the vain effort to recover what they regard as an honest claim against their Government. From time to time efforts have been made by Congress to relieve itself of the perplexity and burden of the vast mass of these claims that have accumulated upon its hands from session to session and from term to term. But they have increased and multiplied and assumed proportions which dispel all hope that, with its unsuitable and cumbrous methods of dealing with such matters, Congress will ever be able to free itself of the thousands of claims that crowd its committee-rooms and calendars, consuming the time of members that ought to be given to the consideration of questions of public importance and general interest. A just government owes something to its citizens upon whose strong arms and brave hearts it leans for protection in the hour of danger, and upon whose industry, energy, and enterprise it depends for its prosperity. The situation demands that something should be done for the relief both of Congress and the claimant. I am much gratified to be able to state that I believe there is a very general desire in the House to do all in its power at this session of Congress to afford the needed relief, or at least to make an earnest effort to accomplish that object.

It is much easier to see and feel the evil complained of than to devise a remedy. But we can take a step in that direction and, guided by the light of experience hereafter, correct whatever defects and imperfections may be found to exist in any plan which we may now adopt to relieve the situation. A brief glance at past legislation upon this subject may enable us to avoid the mistakes that have marked former efforts and afford us some aid in the task now before us.

In the year 1855 Congress passed an act establishing the Court of Claims. This court was invested with jurisdiction of all claims founded upon a law of Congress or upon any regulation of an Executive Department, or upon any contract, express or implied, with the Government of the United States, and all claims which might be referred to it by either House of Congress. The court was to consist of three judges, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. This act seems to have been very carefully prepared by some of the most distinguished lawyers in Congress, and but little doubt was entertained by its authors that it would give Congress relief from what was thought even at that day to be a great annoyance and a serious obstruction to the consideration of matters of public and national concern.

But this well-considered and deliberately devised plan, when reduced to practice, fell below the expectations of its friends, and failed to produce the desired results. The act contained provisions which caused considerable friction in its practical operations. It required the court at the beginning of each month during the session to report to Congress the cases on which they had acted, stating the facts of the case, and the reasons therefor, and to transmit with their reports the briefs of counsel and the testimony in each case. Congress was thus made a court of appeals, to review the law as established by the court, and to pass upon all the facts of each particular case, so that when a case was investigated by the court and reported to Congress it imposed upon Congress all the labor which was necessary to be performed before it went to the court. This, of course, was not intended, but when the act required a complete record of all the proceedings in the court to be returned to Congress, members felt that a duty was imposed on them to examine the record before granting relief. The consequence was that committees were again crowded with the same business from which they had endeavored to escape, and the claimant was compelled to go from Congress to the court, and to follow his claim from the court to Congress again, only to find Congress as helpless to relieve him as before, on account of a want of time to investigate his case.

If Congress had determined to accept the facts as found and the law as settled by the court, its labors would have been so abridged and simplified that speedy relief to the claimant would have followed the report of his case to Congress. Considering the nature of the jurisdiction conferred upon the court, there was really no necessity for any report to Congress at all in the premises. The court was empowered to render judgment, and the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction ought to have ended the matter and left nothing to Congress but an appropriation of the money to discharge the judgment, and Congress finally came to that conclusion. This but adds another illustration of the difficulty of being able to foresee, in framing a measure, all the imperfections which may be developed in its practical workings, and to provide against them. But a beginning had been made—a court had been established, a tribunal provided to take charge of a large class of cases that had troubled claimants and impeded the legislation of Congress, and it only remained to rectify the mistakes that experience had pointed out to make the machinery provided fulfill the object of its creation.

An amendatory act was therefore passed in 1863. By this act two additional judges were added to the court, making five in all, of which number the court now consists, and an appeal was allowed to the Supreme Court by either the claimant or the Government when the sum in controversy amounted to $3,000. The requirement contained in the former act creating the court, that the records, evidence, briefs of counsel, &c., should be reported to Congress, was repealed, and thus the whole class of cases embraced in the act was eliminated from Congress and their final determination remanded to the courts. After these and such other amendments as the practical workings of the court had shown to be necessary, the Court of Claims moved on in its appointed sphere without difficulty, filling the idea and meeting the expectations of its authors in relieving Congress of thousands of claims which before its establishment had found their way here, because there was no other place to which the claimant could go to obtain relief.

Judge Richardson, of the Court of Claims, in a very interesting article in the Southern Law Review, on the history, practice, and jurisdiction of the court, makes the statement that 12,815 cases against the United States and three hundred and forty-two cases against the District of Columbia had been disposed of by the court from the time of its organization to 31st December, 1881. We might well pause here to inquire how long it would take Congress with its cumbrous and dilatory methods of procedure to dispose of that number of cases. The result has fully vindicated the wisdom of Congress in establishing the court.

But, notwithstanding the large number of cases of which this court has permanently relieved Congress, we still find ourselves so crowded with private claims that Congress calls for relief with a voice as earnest as that of any claimant that knocks at its doors. The question may arise in the minds of some why it is that after Congress has established a tribunal for the trial of private claims all these claims do not seek or are not sent to that court for final adjudication. It must be borne in mind that that court has jurisdiction only of that class of claims founded on a law of Congress, the regulation of an Executive Department, or on contracts express or implied with the Government, and which can therefore be finally disposed of by the judgment of a court, whereas the great mass of claims that are now before Congress are of a character to which the fixed rules of law are inapplicable, and which, therefore, no court can well decide. They are cases founded upon no legal right, but upon what the parties claim is simple justice on the part of the Government toward its citizens. They are therefore addressed to the sense of justice, the generosity, if you please, and the discretion of Congress. Each claimant asks relief upon the peculiar facts and circumstances of his individual case.

It would be impossible to frame a general law which would embrace such cases. They must, therefore, rest for their solution to a great extent upon the discretion or liberality of Congress as applied to each particular case. And unless a court should be clothed with the power to exercise this liberality and discretion, it would lack the jurisdiction necessary to a proper disposition of the case. When the rights of parties are defined by the established rules of law the courts are the proper and only tribunals to which they should be referred. But when cases are presented which lie outside of the rules of law, in the broad and undefined fields of generosity and discretion, Congress alone should judge of the propriety and measure of the relief sought. Of course, Congress would not be willing to confer upon any tribunal, however pure and able, the exercise of a discretion in which millions might be involved. It would be a surrender to another of that guardianship of the Treasury which the people expect their Representatives to exercise themselves. And besides, the Constitution gives to the citizen the right to petition Congress for a redress of grievances.

If this right means anything, Congress must be the final judge of the measure of relief, and cannot properly delegate the right of ultimate determination to any other tribunal. When a legal right exists against the Government, the claimant must go to the forum provided by law for its adjudication, and the right of petition preserved to the citizen in the Constitution must of course relate to those grievances for which no remedy has been provided in the courts of the country. The claims which now fill our committee-rooms and clog the wheels of legislation are cases of which the Court of Claims has not jurisdiction under existing laws. They have been greatly increased and multiplied by causes originating during the war and growing out of that great struggle, until to-day Congress stands appalled at their number and magnitude, and all admit the utter impossibility of ever being able to dispose of them by Congressional action alone. But the vast number of those claims, fearful and disheartening as the array is, does not constitute the only obstacle to Congress in disposing of them. They come before us based on a character of evidence which Congress does not feel willing to accept as conclusive of the facts embraced in their determination. As a general thing they stand on the simple statement of the claimant himself, supported by the ex parte affidavits of persons of the claimant's own selection of whose character Congress can know nothing, whose statements have never been tested by a cross-examination, and with no opportunity afforded the Government to introduce any opposing testimony whatever.

All must feel and have felt the unsatisfactory nature of such a presentation of claims for relief and of the danger of acting upon such testimony. Under such proof no means are afforded to sift the false from the true. Congress must necessarily feel, when called to pass upon a case thus authenticated, that it is making a leap in the dark, that its decision, at best, is but a guess which may or may not be correct. This embarrassment has been all along felt to be a very serious one, and various efforts have been made from time to time by committees of Congress to relieve the situation of the difficulty. With this object in view the act of February 3, 1879, was passed. That act authorized any committee of Congress to have depositions taken to evolve the real facts in the cases pending before them, and to have books and papers examined and copies thereof proved before any standing master in chancery of any circuit court of the United States within the judicial district where such testimony or evidence was to be taken. The master in chancery was empowered to issue subpœnas and attachments to compel the attendance of witnesses on behalf of either the claimant or the Government, and provision was made to have the Government properly represented in the taking of such proof. After the depositions were thus taken, it was made the duty of the master to properly certify and seal the same and transmit them to the chairman of the committee under whose order the proof was taken. The authors of this act seem to have fully realized the embarrassment and danger of being compelled to rely on ex-parte testimony, and they sought a way out of the trouble by clothing the committees of Congress with the powers of a court in having testimony taken.

But this failed to remove the difficulty or to afford any practical remedy. Committees of Congress of course had not the time to exercise the functions of a court to have testimony taken all over the United States in the thousands of cases before them. The statute proved a dead letter. But its authors were right in one respect; they had discovered the real thing wanted—that is, a judicial investigation of the facts in the cases on which they were called to pass. They made a mistake in imposing the duty of having this done by Congressional committees, incapacitated for other reasons besides a want of time for performing this labor. What the act of 1879 proposed to have done by committees of Congress the bill now under consideration imposes upon the Court of Claims, a tribunal, as I hope to show hereafter, admirably adapted for the cheap and expeditious performance of the work. I feel it altogether unnecessary to attempt any argument to prove the absolute necessity of some measure to accomplish the object proposed by this bill. The treatment which the honest claimant now receives at the hands of the Government would be a disgrace to the civilization of the age if it arose from a deliberate intention to wrong him. But such is not the case.

The number of cases that have found their way to Congress, because they could go nowhere else, together with the character of testimony by which they are supported, have constituted and must continue to present the great barriers to a speedy hearing. Men come here from session to session and from Congress to Congress and importune us for relief. Constituents press their Representatives by letter and otherwise for action in their cases, and without understanding the situation often censure their immediate Representative for inattention to their interests when no censure is deserved. A very few cases, by striking a breeze of good luck, sail through and reach the port of final action. Some succeed in getting their cases on the Calendar, there to sleep until the resurrection trump of a new Congress calls them from their repose to revisit again the scenes of their early life in the committee-room. Others, seemingly more fortunate, survive the malarial atmosphere of the Calendar and run the gauntlet of the House only to find "an illustrious epitaph and a marble tomb" in the Senate. But by far the largest number sleep, like Egyptian mummies, in the dust and silence of the committee-rooms, unvisited by a ray of sunshine or the breath of Heaven.

Thus one class of claimants are doomed to roll the stone of Sisyphus; another to gaze with longing eyes and thirsty lips upon the unattainable fruit and water of Tantalus, while still another are broken on the cruel wheel of Ixion. Thus from year to year these claims drag their slow lengths along and the claimant finds no relief unless the friendly hand of death, which puts an end to all earthly cares, grants him a sweet oblivion of all anxiety for his claim before Congress. It is no honor to any government to thus treat its honest citizens. If they have meritorious claims they ought to be paid, and the claimant ought to be vouchsafed a fair and respectful hearing; but so many fraudulent claims have slipped through Congress disguised in ex parte affidavits that many members have come to regard a man with a claim as prima facie a scoundrel who is seeking to swindle the Government, and really regard it as their duty to throw every obstacle in the way of his success.

Such is briefly the situation, and although it may seem a hardship to require an honest claimant who has been praying Congress for relief for many weary years now to go to the Court of Claims to have the facts in his case investigated, he may console himself with the reflection that although it may appear a long road to travel, it is really the shortest way out of his difficulties. He may set it down as a fixed fact that if his claim remains in Congress to be disposed of here on ex parte affidavits he will leave whatever interest he may have in such claim to his heirs or personal representative. He may think that Congress ought long before this to have provided a tribunal into which he could go and have his case investigated, and in this opinion I fully agree with him. But the fact that it has not been done heretofore does not and cannot relieve the necessity of doing it now. And as I have before stated, Congress has been making efforts to relieve itself of these claims and to relieve the claimants.

Hon. Clarkson N. Potter, of New York, whose recent death was a national loss, introduced a bill in the Forty-fifth Congress somewhat similar in its provisions to the bill now under consideration, which was known as the Potter bill. This bill passed the House in the closing days of the Forty-fifth Congress, but failed to pass the Senate. In the Forty-sixth Congress, the late lamented Michael P. O'Connor, of South Carolina, to whose memory fitting tribute was so recently paid in this House, introduced a bill similar in its provisions to the Potter bill, but it failed to become a law, as I now remember, for want of an opportunity to have it considered by Congress. This leads me to a more detailed consideration of what is proposed to be done by the measure now before the House. The leading idea of the bill, as its title imports, is to have the facts in cases of private claims judicially ascertained and reported to Congress by a competent court, and to lay it down as the settled policy of Congress to authorize the payment of no money on a claim supported by ex parte testimony. It is not proposed to deny to any citizen the right to present any grievance to Congress that he may desire, but he must understand that Congress is under no obligation to grant him relief in a case where the Government has had no opportunity to cross-examine his witnesses or to introduce its own.

We say to the claimant: "If the facts you state are true, your case is worthy of consideration. We propose simply to ascertain whether the facts are as you state them. Your witnesses can tell the truth as well in the form of a deposition and under a cross-examination as they can in the form of an ex parte affidavit if they are honest men. And, besides, the Government from whom you seek money has as much right to present its side of the case as you have to present yours, and certainly as much right to protect itself against the perpetration of a fraud as any citizen can possibly have to commit a fraud upon it. When both you and the Government have produced your witnesses and subjected them to the test of a cross-examination, the facts thus established will afford satisfactory ground on which Congress can stand and declare whether you are entitled to relief. But Congress must first learn the facts before it can intelligently pass upon the merits of your case, and those facts it proposes to obtain not from one side, but from both, with the witnesses of both subjected to such tests, as experience has proven to be efficacious in developing truth and exposing falsehood and fraud."

I see no good reason for an honest claimant to object to this; it is fair and just to him and to the Government. Every person who has a claim against the Government of which the Court of Claims has not jurisdiction under existing laws and in respect to which he desires relief by special act is authorized before coming to Congress to file his petition in that court, stating the facts and grounds on which relief is sought, and praying the court to find the facts, and the court is directed to ascertain the facts as established by the evidence, and report the same, with a copy of the petition, to either House of Congress. The party under this provision may in the first instance make his application to the court, and the facts having been ascertained in a manner to elicit the truth and to guard against fraud, the claimant will enter Congress with his case ready for trial.

In reference to claims now pending before Congress it is provided that all such as remain undisposed of at the termination of this (the Forty-seventh) Congress in which an investigation or determination of facts is involved shall, with all papers connected therewith, be transferred to the court to have the facts in like manner investigated and reported to Congress. Should parties still elect for the future to come to Congress with their claims in the first instance before going to the Court of Claims (and under their constitutional right of petition it is not denied they may do this) the bill gives to any committee of Congress to which such claim may be referred, if it involves an investigation and determination of facts, the power to send the claim to the Court of Claims to have the facts judicially ascertained and reported to Congress. It may be said that these provisions of the bill will entail some expense upon the claimant. This may be true, but the expense will be far less than many claimants now incur who, in hundreds of instances put their claims into the hands of claim agents who agree to collect one-half for the other.

It is true the contract generally stipulates that if nothing is collected nothing is to be paid by the claimant. But if the claimant has an honest claim which will stand the test of judicial investigation he can much better afford to incur the small expense of having his proof taken, than to agree to give a claim agent half of it to collect it. If his claim is not a meritorious one, of course he could better afford to employ a claim agent on the terms named, and take his chances to elude the vigilance of Congress under cover of ex parte affidavits. The Court of Claims is the cheapest tribunal to which a claimant could be sent, and affords him all the conveniences possible in the nature of the case. In that court there are no costs or fees taxed or allowed, and parties have no bills of cost to pay whether they are successful or unsuccessful. Of course parties will have to pay the costs of taking the depositions of their own witnesses and this is all the expense they need incur. When their depositions are taken they are printed at the Government Printing Office and at the Government's expense. Under the practice of the court, parties living at a distance from the city of Washington can prosecute their claims as well as if they lived in the city where the court holds its sessions. Upon this point I beg leave to again quote from the article of Judge Richardson in the Southern Law Review. He says:

> When a claimant has filed his petition, which he may do by sending it to the clerk of the court by mail or otherwise, he may at his leisure and convenience go on taking the depositions of his witnesses whenever and wherever he can find them, first giving notice to the Attorney-General, that he may be present by himself or by an assistant to cross-examine them.

It seems to me that it would be impossible to furnish the claimant with a less expensive or more convenient tribunal in which to have the facts which support his claim established. And there can certainly be no complaint on the part of the Government on the ground of expense, for the claims go before a court already established, and the Government will not be out a dollar additional in the way of providing this tribunal to relieve Congress of the burden that now rests upon it. But while the method proposed is just to both the claimant and the Government, will it have the effect to relieve Congress? Upon this point I have no doubt whatever. In the first place the number of claimants will diminish marvelously. The fraudulent claimant will

> Fold his tents, like the Arabs,
> And as silently steal away.

He will never ask or permit the light of a judicial investigation to be turned upon the affidavits which have been concocted and cooked in the back room of a claim agent's office. He will shun the exposure and the penalty of detected fraud. His witnesses will respectfully decline to face the music when they reflect that an indictment may follow the crime of perjury. I beg leave to call the attention of the House to a statement of Chief-Justice Drake of the Court of Claims, who appeared before the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service at their request during the investigation of this subject. It was thought doubtful whether that court would be able to dispose of the large number of cases that would be precipitated upon it by this bill, and the Chief-Justice was interrogated upon this point as follows:

> The CHAIRMAN. Will you state to the committee the ability and capacity of the Court of Claims to take charge of all these matters that may be thrown upon it? We have now pending before Congress 3,763 private claims. Suppose we were to throw that avalanche of claims into your court, what would be the effect on the business of the court?
> Chief-Justice DRAKE. When the Court of Claims was established very much such an avalanche as that came down from the two Houses of Congress. I was not then a member of the court, but I have been told that when we speak of the quantities of papers that came there by any enumeration of bushels it would convey an inadequate idea of the amount of business that was precipitated on the court. And yet, if you were to go back and examine the amount of business which the court transacted from that great avalanche in the first five years, you would see that in some way or other the avalanche was most tremendously diminished. The number of cases sent down to the court was in some peculiar way enormously diminished, and most of them were never tried. The same thing would be the case now. I have no doubt myself that for a year or two after the passage of such an act (particularly if you should send all the pending claims to the Court of Claims) there would be pretty hard work for the court, but at the end of two years or less we should sift out from all this mass the only claims that the parties were willing to attempt to prosecute in the court. It would be pretty hard work for a year or two to operate on that portion of the great mass, but still we could get through with it.

In the further prosecution of the inquiry upon this subject the following took place:

> Mr. HOUSE. If we were to send 2,500 claims to the Court of Claims and require parties to file their petitions there, do you think that out of that number 500 petitions would ever be filed?
> Chief-Justice DRAKE. I do not. I do not believe that more than one claimant in twenty would ever file a petition in the Court of Claims.

But not only would the number of claims be thus greatly diminished under the provisions of this bill but the labors of Congress would be greatly simplified and abridged in reference to those that remained. The court will find all the facts of each case and report their findings in the nature of a special verdict to Congress. Congress will thus be relieved of all the labor of investigating and reporting upon the facts of each case. All that will be done and embodied in the report of the court. The whole case will thus be presented in a brief and succinct form—the whole matter will be in a nutshell, and there will be but little trouble on the part of Congress in determining the question of what, if any, relief should be granted. For it will be observed that this bill avoids the mistake made in the act establishing the Court of Claims, which required all the evidence, brief of counsel, opinions of the court, &c., to be reported to Congress by the court, thus entailing upon Congress the labor of a thorough examination of all the facts of each case, as well as the correctness of the opinion of the court. The report of the court as to what facts are established by the evidence Congress accepts as conclusive. The court is required to give no opinion on the merits of the case; for when the facts are settled and laid before Congress it does not desire the opinion of any court as to how it should exercise its discretion in the premises. That is a matter which Congress will take care of itself, and the opinion of any court in the premises would be manifestly indelicate, if not improper.

There is a provision in the bill to the effect that if the court should find among the cases referred to it any of a nature of which under existing laws they have jurisdiction to render judgment, they are authorized to do so, and thus dispose of such cases without troubling Congress with them any further.

There is also a provision with respect to what are known as war claims. In all cases of a claim for supplies or stores taken by or furnished to any part of the military or naval forces of the United States for their use during the war, or for the destruction of or damage to property by any of said forces, the petition must allege the loyalty of the claimant to the Government of the United States, and the fact of loyalty is required to be found by the court together with the other facts in the case. It has been the settled policy of Congress to pay none but loyal men for such losses, and this provision of the bill is intended to preserve that policy. In reference to these war claims, I desire from the stand-point of a Southern man to say a word.

There is no subject that ever came before Congress with respect to which there seems to have been a more widespread and general misapprehension among the Northern people than this matter of the payment of war claims by Congress. Southern Representatives have been held up before the Northern people as eager to make raids upon the Treasury to pay this class of claimants amounts equal to, if not exceeding, the national debt. This absurd and unfounded charge has been made to do duty in more than one political campaign, and has been freely made by men to whose intelligence and information I feel I would be paying a poor compliment if I were to say they really believed what they asserted. I have seen my own name paraded in campaign literature, together with the names of other Southern Representatives, with the bills and memorials which we had severally introduced into Congress, with the amounts claimed, and the aggregate held up before the people as the measure of the inroads they might expect upon the Treasury from this direction in case the Democratic party should come into power. Now, what are the plain and simple facts in reference to this matter?

I will take my own case, not because I wish to talk about myself, but because my case represents cases of other Southern members. When I entered Congress I found a great many war claims pending from my district; all, or the most of them having been introduced by Republican members from my State. My constituents applied to me to reintroduce their bills or petitions and have them referred to the proper committee. They claimed to have meritorious cases. All they asked of me as their Representative was to see that their cases got before the committee, where they could be investigated. Of course I knew nothing of the merits of their cases. That was the business of the committee to whom they were referred to ascertain and determine. No member of Congress could be justified in denying a constituent a request so reasonable and proper in itself. For if he should refuse to perform such a service as this he would deny to his constituent the right to have his claim investigated at all.

Of course I never read or undertook to read the voluminous papers that frequently accompanied those claims, and certainly never addressed a committee of this House urging a favorable report on such claims, as it would have been improper for me to do so. I have at times, on receiving letters from my constituents, gone to the chairman of the committee having charge of the claims and requested him to have the same investigated and reported to the House. Whether that report would be favorable or adverse, of course I did not and could not know. Now, this is the whole of the wild and extravagant charges that have caused so many well-meaning people of the North to be troubled in their dreams. The idea that there ever was among the masses of the Southern people any general anxiety or concern about the payment of such claims which constituted a public opinion on the subject is so thoroughly absurd as to banish all respect for the mind that could conceive it or entertain it seriously. It requires but a moment's reflection to expose the silliness and absurdity of such a fancy. Not one in ten thousand of the people of the South ever applied to Congress for the payment of war losses.

Now, why the other nine thousand nine hundred and ninety-nine who have never asked Congress for a dollar, but who lost as much by the war perhaps as the one who has applied, should suffer themselves to be broken of their rest by anxious solicitude to see that solitary claimant succeed, especially when he fought on the other side, is just one of those things, as Lord Dundreary would say, which "no fellah can find out." I know there are those who believe that there are no loyal claimants south of the Ohio River. This is a mistake. There are men in the South—not a great many, it is true, comparatively speaking, but still quite a number—who were as loyal as any man in the North, and perhaps more so, as their surroundings required an exhibition of moral courage in adhering to their convictions which the Northern man was not called upon to display. But I dismiss this subject of Southern war claims with the hope that hereafter a claimant's geographical locality will be no bar to a just and impartial hearing before the American Congress, and that the campaign material on the subject of these claims be allowed to decay amid the débris and rubbish of past political conflicts.

The Executive Departments of the Government are also greatly crowded with private claims, and are calling on Congress for relief from the pressure upon them.

In his report to Congress made at the session commencing on the first Monday of December, 1877, the Secretary of the Treasury used upon this subject the following language:

> The attention of Congress is called to the laws imposing upon this Department the adjudication of a multitude of claims. Its organization is admirably adapted for the investigation and statement of accounts accruing in the ordinary course of current business, but it is not adapted to the investigation of claims long since accrued, and supported in most cases by ex parte affidavits. The Department has no authority to cross-examine witnesses, no agents to send to examine into alleged facts, and no facilities, such as are in common use by courts, to ascertain truth and expose falsehood. It is respectfully suggested that this class of claims, not already acted upon, be transferred from the Treasury Department, and its business of accounting be confined to current accounts, payable from appropriations made within a short period of time.

In his report made in December, 1878, the Secretary of the Treasury again calls the attention of Congress to this important subject in the following language:

> The attention of Congress is again called to the necessity of some legislation as to the adjudication of claims which are now within the jurisdiction of this Department.
> While the Department is well organized for the investigation of accounts accruing in the ordinary course of current business, it is not adapted to the examination of old and disputed claims of a different character.
> For the proper investigation of such claims the methods adopted in all our courts for ascertaining the truth are undoubtedly the best. For this purpose a tribunal which will require the best evidence of which the nature of the case will admit, the production of original papers rather than pretended copies, the sworn statement of the witness himself to facts in his own knowledge, and not the hearsay of third parties, the examination and cross-examination of the witness, not his ex parte statement privately taken, a public hearing, and a public record of proceedings open to inspection, is essential.
> These are some of the safeguards which the experience of the wisest legislators has placed around the judicial investigation of questions of law and fact.
> It is evident that this Department cannot furnish these safeguards; and a provision of law which will relieve the Department of all important disputed questions of law and fact is recommended. The Court of Claims is a tribunal well qualified for such jurisdiction. It has the prestige of a court of justice; its judges are appointed for life, and transact their business deliberately, systematically, and publicly. They are governed by the ordinary rules of law, and their decisions are of record, with an appeal in proper cases to the Supreme Court of the United States.

In his report made to the Forty-sixth Congress the attention of Congress is again invited to this subject in the following language:

> The need of some legislation for the adjudication of claims which are now within the jurisdiction of this Department has been called in former reports to the attention of Congress. Proper methods for investigating claims such as are used in courts of justice are not within the power of the Department. A tribunal which may require the best evidence which the nature of the case admits, the cross-examination of witnesses instead of ex parte statements, a public hearing and a public record of proceedings, is essential for the proper adjustment of such claims.
> Section 1063 of the Revised Statutes contains a provision for sending to the Court of Claims certain disputed cases arising in the Departments. A general provision of law by which all important disputed questions of law or fact might be remitted to that tribunal for trial would greatly relieve the officers of this Department and tend to promote the ends of justice. It may be assumed that the methods adopted by all courts of justice for ascertaining the truth best subserve that purpose.

The present Secretary of the Treasury, in his report to this Congress, uses the following language on this subject:

> The claims against the Government presented to this Department often involve important disputed questions of law or fact, which require for their correct decision the taking of depositions and the cross-examination of witnesses, and sometimes of the parties themselves. For this no provision is made by law. Authority from Congress to refer any such claims as the Secretary may think proper to the Court of Claims would give to the claimants and to the Government a proper judicial trial and judgment; which would not only do justice to the parties but prevent re-examinations which are now urged upon every change of departmental officers.

There is a provision in the bill intended to relieve this pressure upon the Departments by enabling them to send cases before them to the Court of Claims for investigation, which it is believed will in a great measure remove the embarrassment under which they now labor.

Another important provision in the bill relates to the claims of aliens against our Government. It authorizes the Secretary of State, with the consent of the representative of the Government of the alien, to refer all such claims, founded on treaties or other international obligation, to the Court of Claims, to be heard upon the principles of justice and international law, and the court is authorized to render judgment in accordance with those principles. Either party is allowed an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States when the amount in controversy is three thousand dollars or more. The propriety of giving this jurisdiction to some court cannot, I think, be seriously questioned when such a method of disposing of cases of this character is compared with the slow, tedious, troublesome, and expensive procedure of mixed commissions to adjudicate them.

These temporary commissions cannot be conveniently appointed until a sufficient amount of claims has accumulated to justify it, thus entailing upon the claimant a long and perhaps ruinous delay. Composed as they are of different individuals selected here and there for the special occasion, they cannot of course be expected by their decisions to build up any uniform system or rules of international law. But the Court of Claims, invested with authority to try all these questions of international law arising out of the claims of aliens, with an appeal allowed to the Supreme Court from their decisions in all important cases, would insure uniformity of decision, and in the course of time a very valuable and important system of international law would be established. This plan would be far more economical than a mixed commission could possibly be. And another consideration to which we cannot be insensible consists in the fact that most if not all the governments with which we have commercial relations have tribunals before which our citizens are allowed to adjudicate their claims against those governments.

There are other minor provisions of the bill under consideration to which I desired to call attention, but deem it not important to do so, as I have already occupied sufficient time upon the subject. Of course I am not sanguine enough to believe that this bill will prove to be perfect in its operation and that no defects will be developed calling for amendment in the future; but I have but little doubt, if it is adopted by Congress and becomes a law, it will result in greatly relieving the present embarrassing situation to both Congress and the claimants before it, corrected and perfected as it may hereafter be in such particulars as experience may show to be necessary.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Speaker, no more important matter can be brought to the attention of Congress than the question of providing some means of adjusting claims against the United States. It has been assumed by law writers that wherever a right of any kind exists there is a remedy to be found; that wherever a wrong has been committed there is a means of redressing that wrong. But it has occurred to me that these writers had but little conception of the genius and impulse of an American Congress. If they had known a little of the history and character of the American Congress for the last twenty years they would have written their law very differently. They would have said that Governments should provide remedies against itself as well as against individuals. But such has not been the case in this country. If they had been informed in regard to the present condition of things confronting the authorities of this Government and touching the rights of the people, they would have made many important exceptions to the rule thus laid down. Look at the condition of the business of this House. Look at the thousands of claims pending here against the United States. All manner of private claims are being presented for the consideration of Congress. And this body has neither given relief through special legislation nor provided for the adjustment of these claims by a general law conferring jurisdiction on some tribunal or Department of the Government to hear and determine them. Indeed it is almost universally admitted that nothing is more impossible in all the scope of legislation than for Congress to resolve itself into a kind of court to adjudicate the private rights of individuals, and to permit the existing state of things to continue virtually and practically amounts to a policy, on the part of Congress, of an absolute denial of justice to many citizens of the Republic. There are several thousand bills for the relief of individuals now before the several committees of the two Houses of Congress. Some of these are just beyond all doubt. Perhaps many are unjust. But can the great Government of the United States afford to deny its citizens the same redress against itself that it provides by its Constitution and laws one citizen shall have against another citizen?

If one citizen infringes on the rights of another the courts of the country are open to redress the wrong. If a contract exists between two or more citizens, by either express stipulation or implication of law, the Government, State or national, furnishes a tribunal to enforce the rights of the parties; and I believe the Government of the United States enjoys singular distinction in denying the right of its citizens to enforce the collection of an honest debt against itself.

Whatever may have been the ancient law of nations on this subject, the modern rule, certainly in free countries, has been established to give the citizen every right against the government which they have against each other. And this brings us to discuss the right of the Government to refuse to permit itself to be sued in its own courts. That it has the power to say it will not be sued I will not deny, but I affirm that the assertion of that power is wrong. This idea that the Government cannot be sued does not belong to free America; it does not belong to any free government; it has no place in a government where all of its citizens are equal among themselves and where the government has no rights not conferred through the action of its citizens. The ancient doctrine that the government could not be sued was born of kingcraft and personal government; it originated from the so-called divine right of kings. It was founded in the fallacy that the king could do no wrong, and it is now exploded everywhere except in free America and a few of the unenlightened governments of the Old World. This political paradox, this paradox in modern government, should no longer exist in a country like this. The modern practice is to open the courts of the government to the citizen, especially in a representative republic like ours, where it simply amounts to the individual citizen seeking justice against the aggregated citizenship of the state.

But we are told that very many of these claims, provision to adjust and pay which is now asked, are "war claims;" that they originated during the war to suppress the rebellion, and that many of them are unjust, fraudulent, and exaggerated. There are many answers to this assumption, each of them conclusive in their character. For because some man presents a fraudulant claim, possibly backed by perjury, is that any reason why the man who presents his claim, established beyond doubt, and admitted so on the part of the Government itself, should not be paid. I insist it is not.

Let us look this subject squarely in the face. And in order to get at the real issue involved in the discussion of "war claims" let us examine the matter in its true light and bearing on the obligations of the Government. What does it take to constitute "a war claim?" And how many kinds of "war claims" exist? Without stopping to define these questions with legal nicety and technical distinction, and without essaying to enumerate and classify each case in its separate character and outlines, I must be permitted to call attention to the fact that there are now, and have been from time to time, a variety of "war claims" which have been recognized in the most solemn manner, and none of them are any more founded in legal principles and moral right than are those claims which are now sought to be outlawed by the use of a prefix and the exclamation of "war claims," as though that carried with it the blast of death.

When citizens enter into contracts the courts invariably enforce them; but when claims, and especially of that class which I may more particularly refer to hereafter, are presented, then every conceivable objection is presented to them. If they are legal on one point, then there is something urged against them on another. If it is all right here, then we are told there is some error somewhere else. I think, for one, the time has come when this quibbling by a great Government should stop, and especially when it is quibbling against the poverty-stricken, loyal citizens of the country. Instead of oppressing, the Government ought to be prompt to do justice, and should come to the relief of these people, not only in the spirit of justice, but in the spirit of charity.

We are told that these war claims cannot be paid, that it was in the time of war, and whatever was done by the Army for the use of the Government, no matter by whom taken or when taken or under what circumstances taken, they are all war claims, and that war claims cannot be paid under the laws of war. Such doctrine does not belong to this Government. The doctrine that the Government is not bound to reimburse every one of its loyal citizens never was conceived as attached to this Government until recently. Such a doctrine cannot be found in any law-book by any law-writer who had ability enough to conduct an ordinary case in a police court. [Laughter.]

Whatever may have been said and whatever may have been the rule under the ancient law of nations on the subject, the modern rule certainly is, and has been in all free countries, that the citizen shall be given the right to pursue his claim against the Government for any obligation it is under to him. This, I say, is the modern rule which now obtains almost everywhere except in this country, and the modern practice has been consistent with the modern rule, that the citizen shall be reimbursed for whatever has been taken from him. With few exceptions there has been provision made for paying this character of claims.

There is another thought I wish to express. The idea of this great Government providing that it may despoil its citizen, seize his property, and use it, probably that which is absolutely necessary to provide for his wife and children, and there is no power by which he can go into the court and seek redress and be paid is one opposed to the civilization of the age. The idea that in time of war the laws are silent and the Government is entitled to take for its own particular use whatever it pleases without payment, the idea that the Government shall not be sued in connection with the other idea, to which I have just called your attention, that the Government has the right to take whatever it may need from its citizens without payment because it is done in time of war, these doctrines come from that same old claim of the divine right of kings, that everything belongs to him and not to the people. This same idea that the Government cannot be sued grows out of this same kingcraft, that the king can do no wrong and that this Government is the king.

What sort of application can you make of any such doctrine as that in this country? Who is king here? The supreme sovereign power is in the people. What, then, is the suit of a citizen against his Government to redress a wrong inflicted upon him? It is simply one citizen suing the aggregate citizenship of the country in order that a citizen who is equal to every other citizen of the country shall receive his rights and have redress of his wrong. We are told that very many of these claims are war claims, that they originated during the war to suppress the rebellion, and that many of them are unjust.

Here I would stop to inquire what is a war claim? And to this I desire the attention of the House. I ask every lawyer, every member of this body, what is a war claim? Is it confined to the claims of those poor people who are presenting their demands now to the Government for redress? Not at all. Every claim, the great majority of the obligations of the Government now outstanding are as much war claims as those of the poor man who asks to be paid for a horse taken from his farm for the use of the Army.

Gentlemen should remember that the bonds of the Government, which are acknowledged to be legal and just obligations, and to pay which to the uttermost farthing the honor of the Government is pledged, are but the outstanding evidences of a part of the war debt, and, in the fullest and largest sense, nothing more nor less than "war claims."

How did these "war claims" originate, and I will add by way of inquiry, what is the difference between these and the "war claims" which seem to have such a horrifying effect on certain politicians of the country? If I may be indulged to contrast these different kinds of "war claims," I will suggest this difference growing out of their sectional origin.

Whenever a citizen of a so-called loyal State—and I will discuss State loyalty in contradistinction to individual loyalty a little further along—whenever a citizen of the North had supplies for sale—and mark you, unlike in the case of the Southern and border States they were never forced to give up their property for the use of the Army—whenever they had supplies for sale they contracted them to a quartermaster, followed them to the depot, and received their vouchers, which they cashed, and immediately invested the proceeds in United States gold-bearing bonds, and he has been drawing his gold interest ever since. They received war prices for their supplies, and bought Government bonds with the money, receiving a bond equal to gold for a depreciated currency, thus securing anywhere from 150 to 275 per cent. for every 100 per cent. of actual outlay. While the soldier fought for a greenback dollar worth less than half for which it called, the Northern man who furnished supplies to the Army had the good fortune to turn his property into a bond worth more than twice the amount realized by the soldier for his money.

And so of the Union people of the South. They were unfortunate. I would not make odious comparisons, nor would I indulge in invidious distinctions, but I know I will be pardoned for reminding the House of the ill fortune of "Poor Tray," who was found in bad company. And such was the fate of the Union people of the South. The United States Army was ordered by the national authorities to forage upon and live off the country as it moved South, and it was impossible for its officers to discriminate at the time between the loyal and disloyal whose property was taken and used, and the result was that the loyal whose property was thus taken were told to wait and thereafter present their claims, prove their loyalty, and be paid.

While the "war claim" of the Northern man was thus put in the shape of a bond, the "war claim" of the Southern Unionist remained as an unwritten but equally just obligation against the Government. And now, notwithstanding the Union men of the South were promised payment on proof of loyalty, when they ask the Government to give them their just compensation for their property which was taken from them and used they are met with the cry of "War claim!" "War claim!"

The unwritten debt of the war to suppress the rebellion is not only as binding on the Government as that part of the war debt which is evidenced by United States bonds, but it is as well founded in law as if each claimant held a written promise to pay, and is as sacred an obligation as any resting on the nation, unless it may be the pension of the widow and orphan, which is planted in the grave of the dead husband and father.

But who are these border-State Union men now asking for justice at the hands of their Government? It is useless for me to repeat here what is so well known and has been so often much better expressed than I can possibly hope to express it, that the Union men of the South are equally deserving with the men of the North who stood by the Union; yet I must say that this truth has not heretofore, but as I think should hereafter, receive peculiar emphasis in dealing with them. It was an easy thing to be loyal in the North. It was quite another thing to be loyal in the South. And yet the South gave three-quarters of a million of white soldiers to the Union Army. And it is said that, counting both white and colored, the Southern States gave more men to the Federal than to the confederate army. I notice objection has been made in some of the newspapers that Tennessee has a large number of "war claims," and I saw one complaint that my State had a large number in the bill reported by me from the Committee on War Claims. And such an objection was made on the floor of the House when the bill finally passed without even a division.

The statement of fact has some foundation, but the implication of wrong is wholly causeless.

And right here let me say to my Northern friends that if the South had been solid there would have been two governments in this country instead of one. The part of the country which is attempted to be outlawed by the assumed principle that because a man happened to live in an insurrectionary country he shall not be paid at all gave to the Union Army three-fourths of a million of white soldiers. I have the facts here somewhere which I can show. In addition to that let me call attention to another fact, that the South gave to the Union Army more soldiers to fight under the Union flag than it gave to the confederacy to fight under the confederate flag. We cannot have a war claim paid if it is down South. Just raise the question of a claim, and the very first thing you hear is this cry of war claim; it is the first question that is asked; it is the only argument that is offered.

On this question of disloyal States I want to make some remarks. I do not know that they have any practical applicability to this bill, but I want to call attention to the fallacy—the legal fallacy—of talking about disloyal States. There is no such thing as a disloyal State. There never has been any such thing as a disloyal State of the Union under our form of government.

The individual citizens of the States may become disloyal, but the States in their organic capacity cannot become disloyal. It is an impossibility for them to do so; it is an unmeaning term and has no significance whatever. You may overthrow a State government for a time, its functions with reference to the Federal Government may be temporarily suspended, but the moment it is rehabilitated with its powers of a State it becomes loyal. It can have no effect upon the State as a State. It can have an effect upon the individuals who have temporarily overthrown it, but it has no effect, so far as citizenship under the Government is concerned, when it is rehabilitated with its full powers as a State, because the State assumes the same position it held before it fell and becomes at once ipso facto under the Constitution a State neither loyal nor disloyal but simply a State under the Federal Government belonging to the Federal power.

And there may have been, and doubtless are, many principles of international law from which precedents may be drawn on which to found this absurd doctrine of the "loyalty" and "disloyalty" of States. I scout the idea of anything of the kind under the structure of our Government. A State could not become "disloyal." The people of a State could become disloyal, in whole or in part. But the disloyalty attaches to the individuals who committed the crime, and not to the State or community as a whole, unless the whole body of the people by their individual acts perpetrated distinctive offenses. International law, which is applicable to foreign states and wholly independent governments, has no place under our Federal system. The powers of government here are vested in the nation and not in the State.

Suppose there could be such a thing as this. I will only argue this for a moment. Suppose it were possible, and suppose it were legal, for those assuming to represent a State—a Legislature is not the State; the governor is not the State; the President of the United States is not the Government; Congress is not the Government; the great power of the people behind them is the Government. Now, suppose the agents whom the people for the time being have selected to represent them—suppose they convene, pass laws, and provide—to do what? provide to make their State disloyal. Can it be done? Can the vote of the people make it disloyal? It can make those who voted for disloyalty traitors to their State and their country, but it can no more affect the nature of the government, that intangible something that none of us can see, that intangible something which exists by virtue of the power of the people and not by virtue of the power of any constitution of a State, only as the people have granted the temporary power to organize for the purpose of adding an additional power to its own government. But suppose that might be true; suppose the law was that a State could vote itself out of the Union, how could you declare my State disloyal? Where would you find a court within the limits of the United States that would declare the State of Tennessee a disloyal State if the issue was properly made? Even if this—I was about to say law—even if this position was law, a court in finding whether the State of Tennessee was loyal or disloyal would have to go back and inquire the status of her people, would it not?

Now, what was that status? I say Tennessee never was a rebel State. I say a majority of its citizens never breathed a disloyal breath in their lives; and why do I say so? In 1860 Lincoln was elected, and certain parties said that the election of a black Republican was sufficient cause for going out of the Union. South Carolina, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, and other States all around us voted and said they were out of the Union. They sent emissaries among us for the purpose of dragging Tennessee after them into the condition that they called being out of the Union. On the 9th day of February, 1861, the vote was taken. This question was discussed from one end of the State to the other. It was the ablest canvass—gentlemen on the other side of the House will bear witness to what I say—it was the ablest campaign ever conducted in the State of Tennessee. Everybody was heard. Everybody then was free. The whole question of the rights of the Federal Government, and the propriety of secession because of Mr. Lincoln's election, and all these questions that have been so long agitated since, were discussed with an ability that I never expect to live to see again, because some of our great men, and most of them, have fallen.

What was the result? The people went to the ballot-box and with cool deliberation, without coercion, voted to remain in the Union by over 61,500 votes. What next? The gentleman who was then governor of Tennessee saw proper to convene the Legislature in extraordinary session. Emissaries and ministers plenipotentiary were immediately sent to negotiate with our State administration, with the State as they called it. The State had acted in February. The people were the State. Their agents were false. They sent, as I have said, emissaries to negotiate, and finally finding it would not do to trust to another vote of the people, the then governor of the State appointed a military board to negotiate with Henry W. Hilliard, who was the rebel emissary sent by the so-called confederate government at Montgomery, Alabama. Perhaps some of you remember his name, Henry W. Hilliard, who has recently come home. I hope no more of the same kind will be sent back to represent the United States.

Through Henry W. Hilliard and this military board a league was entered into. They called it the military league. This military board was appointed by the governor, who at that hour was being denounced everywhere for what he was doing. They entered into some sort of a league with Mr. Henry W. Hilliard, which, by some mysterious process that I never understood, was supposed to lash Tennessee on to the Southern confederacy.

What else? The people were still loyal; the people were still true; the people would have voted on that day as readily for the Union as they had done on the 9th day of February. But, under authority of the "league" the governor and this military board—the State was not out of the Union—as they called it, they could not call troops out as confederate troops, but they organized 55,000 troops under the direction of this military board and loaned them to the Southern confederacy for temporary service. The use they were put to was that they should go up into East Tennessee, where there were a great many Union people, to be camped out in the gaps of the mountains, where nobody had ever made a camp before in the world except to hunt deer or wild turkeys. What was this done for? Why, because the Union people of East Tennessee had then seen that their hopes were gone for the time being, so far as their opposition to the establishment of the Southern confederacy existed; that they could no longer live in Tennessee as peaceable citizens. And these camps were placed there to prevent their exit to the State of my friend across the aisle, old Kentucky. And I may say I think the gentleman across the aisle [Mr. CARLISLE] was about the first Kentuckian I became acquainted with.

What else? There were these 55,000 troops put to this use. Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Georgia, and other States sent troops into East Tennessee—for what? I do not remember why they then said they sent them there, but they were sent from Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Georgia. I do not know whether there were any from South Carolina or not. But they were from five or six Southern States. Their troops were sent into East Tennessee and they were scattered along the mountain passes and in the neighborhoods throughout East Tennessee, where lived the largest number of Union men, for the purpose of seeing that every man who wished to vote to go out of the Union should vote with perfect freedom, and that every Union man who came to the polls should vote according to indications or command of the soldiers, who, as a rule, were little less than a mob.

After all this was done, and I am detailing these things because I want to put this history on the record here. I know you can find it, or much of it, in the Congressional Library, if you will only hunt it up. After all these means had been taken "to have a fair election," what was done? You know that they were always opposed to troops at the polls. And these means were resorted to in order that the Union majority of 61,500 should not be overriden by any wrongful process, but that there should be absolute protection given to every man who wanted to vote.

After these troops were scattered all around in convenient localities where they would do the most good, another election was ordered. We were solemnly told under these circumstances to go to the polls on the 8th day of June and exercise our right of suffrage as freemen, and say whether we were still willing to remain in the Union. Of course under the circumstances that was "a free election."

Now, I say, put all these facts before a court, the fact of the majority that was given for the Union in February, every fact which I have stated—put all those facts in evidence before a court and authorize it to say whether Tennessee ever was out of the Union or ever did anything which would place it in the category of disloyal States, and I say that the court upon its conscience and upon the law of the land would declare that Tennessee never was a rebel State. Therefore I insist that if there ever was any plausibility in the doctrine that a State could become disloyal, Tennessee never became so, and always was in law and fact, and upon every principle that can be adduced, a loyal State to all intents and purposes.

This was the position originally taken by the leaders of the Republican party. But afterward there was some sort of a decision which I shall not characterize, some political excitement that came up, some fear that there would be a war debt settled on the Government; politics intervened in the mean time, and the result was that the decree went forth that the head of the Union men in the South had to fall in order to save somebody in the North.

Before leaving this question I wish to add a word or two; it may hit somewhere; if it does I cannot help it. There is a very great difference shown when you mention a claim as to whether it originated down South or not. The question of loyalty is not the question that first comes up. That is not the first question. It is, Where does the claimant live? Well, up in Maine. Did he really have this property, and what was the value of it? Let us talk about this thing, and see how it looks, and see if there is any foundation for the claim.

Another case comes along. Where is this claimant from? Who owns this claim? It is a man down in Tennessee. Was he loyal? That is the first question. Now I do not believe, and I say it here before God, I do not believe in this method and manner of investigating claims. I do not think many who have had jurisdiction here in Washington for the investigation of these claims have been just and fair. I do not believe the same justice has been meted out to the Union men of the South that has been meted out to the Union men of the North. All the records look the other way.

You bring up a claim here and say, here is a war claim. You are asked, how old is it? Well, it is a pretty old claim; it arose during the war, and cannot help being old. Has it ever been before any Department? Yes, it has been before a Department and been rejected. What for? Now I tell you that in very many cases claims before the Departments have been rejected on some purely technical point. And we are told, if this matter has once been rejected, that the man has had his day in court and ought not to have another.

I have heard something here this afternoon about the Southern claims commission and the law establishing that commission. Now I have as much respect for the personnel of that commission as I have for any three men who ever lived. But I know that hundreds of unjust judgments were rendered by that commission; I state it here upon my responsibility. I say to any gentleman on this floor who may join issue with me as a lawyer, that he may take the cases miscellaneously and look over them, and he will find that in a great majority of them they were imperfectly made out and were rejected on some little informal point and the claimant impoverished. There was a case rejected by that tribunal for disloyalty where the man had lost his eyesight while scouting for the Federal Army. When he comes here to Congress he is told, "Oh, you had your day in court; the commissioners were just men, and they rejected your claim." I could enumerate many other cases.

Without pursuing further the thought I was pursuing I will devote the remainder of my time to the consideration of the bill before the House. I want to say that so far as I am concerned I will vote for no bill that opens the door for the payment of any claimant who was disloyal. Many of my best friends took the other side, but they took the risk. It was a question whether they would destroy the Government or lose what they had.

At the end of the war the Government had the undoubted right, as I believe, to have confiscated every dollar's worth of property belonging to the belligerents, to the disloyal people of the South. It elected not to do so, and I am glad of it. But that which the rebel lost during this struggle is gone, and I am unwilling now to turn around and restore that which they lost themselves while they were engaged in an effort to destroy the Union.

In my country, when your armies started in there, they were ordered to forage on the people. And our Union people down there in East Tennessee actually believed that the Government would rather give them something than take away from them what little they had. So they were willing to give up to the Army everything they had to spare, as the word goes, and more, too.

General Burnside, who was in command of the Army, soon organized a commission, by which, if he had remained there, probably all of these men would have been paid. But General Burnside was soon withdrawn from there and the commission was disbanded. The papers in the cases of the claimants became scattered about among claim agents, and not long after our State, through its Legislature, passed a law creating a board of commissioners to examine these claims with a view to the State itself paying them and then applying to Congress for reimbursement. They all filed their claims again. They went first before the Burnside commission, then before the so-called Brownlow commission. About the time the State would have been ready to take action and pay these claimants, with the expectation of seeking reimbursement from Congress, our friends on the other side came into power. The Democratic party coming into power, enacted a law that the secretary of state should send these claims back to the clerk of the county court in each county from which they originated, the claims having been first investigated in the counties. Many of the claimants had to pay for the return claims, although no law on the statute-book authorized the payment of such a fee. Many of these people had spent money in preparing their cases before the Burnside commission and before the Brownlow commission. After that some of them commenced filing their claims in the Quartermaster-General's Department; some went before the Southern claims commission; but the great body of these claimants had become too poor to put in their claims asking payment for a horse or a hog or a few bushels of corn that had been taken from them. Many of them perhaps would be unable to-day to pay the fee of $5 if the successful prosecution of their claims depended upon it. But if a law were passed in which they could have confidence, they could find friends and neighbors who would again help them.

But many of these claimants, after they had failed the second time, became disheartened. And let me mention one reason for this dis couragement. The demagogues of the Democratic party were going about over the country saying to Union people, "Why are you voting the Republican ticket? That party does not think any more of you than they do of us; you have claims against the Government, but they will never pay you a dollar; have they not fooled you twice already?" In a great many instances such arguments were successful; in many instances perhaps the Democratic party gained converts to their cause. I say to-day that if the Republican party expects to make gains and build itself up in the border States the best, the highest, the noblest thing it can do is to provide through the action of a Republican Congress the means by which these poor men of the border States may receive the few dollars due them for property taken from them, due them as justly as your money would be due you if I should borrow a dollar from you to-day.

Talk about these claims not being just! I know how things were done. There is not an Army officer in the land who does not know, there is not a man who traversed Kentucky, Tennessee, and that southern country who does not know precisely how things went on. We know that the Army was in absolute need of the very things which it received from these people and used. I do not ask pay for pillage; I do not ask pay for what the soldiers stole if anything; but I do ask that the Government shall pay for what it received and enjoyed—for what aided it in putting down the rebellion.

I want to say another word to my Republican friends. I carried my district by over 8,000 votes; but if all my constituents could be in this gallery and hear the debates when some little claim comes up for some poor man who is perhaps in need, it is very doubtful whether that district could be carried; it would certainly lessen the ardor of that patriotic people and render it uncertain for the Republican party. Not that we vote for money; not that we vote for a consideration; but the people of my country vote for that which they believe to be justice, and they think manifest injustice is being done to them by withholding payment of the sums that are due to them.

Mr. Speaker, one further remark and I shall soon conclude. The policy of the United States Government for the past twenty years has been a policy of absolute, unconditional denial of justice to a very large number of its citizens. I appeal to gentlemen on this side of the House. Let us perfect these bills. Both of them are imperfect. Let us frame such a measure as will do justice to every one to whom justice is due. I believe the House will vote for just such a bill. I do not believe that anybody here desires the passage of a bill by which injustice shall be done to any class. The only trouble is that, through prejudice, some gentlemen have the notion that a just claim cannot come from the South.

But the claims of the Union people of the South are founded upon the rock of the Constitution itself. The fifth article of amendment declares that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. And the Supreme Court of the United States has interpreted and applied this clause in such an apt manner that there is no ground for mistake or misconstruction so as to avoid its authority or dodge the responsibility it imposes. And such is the view taken by the leaders of the Republican party.

It was never dreamed by the statesmen at the head of affairs during the war but that all the just claims founded in its prosecution would be speedily paid. And such was the view of the wisest and best men of the Republic following the close of the war. Under the leadership of Republican statesmen Congress inaugurated a policy, both humane and just, at the close of the war, and a long line of special legislation followed, doing justice to the Union people of the South. Many acts of Congress were passed for the benefit of loyal persons living in the seceded States. And I desire in this connection to call attention to the views of some of the most distinguished Republicans on this subject. The present Postmaster-General, Howe, then a United States Senator from Wisconsin, on February 7, 1873, submitted a report to the Senate on the subject of claims, in which he reviews this whole subject and discusses the liability of the Government to its citizens for property taken and used in time of war, with great ability. He presents many authorities to sustain his position, and I do not see how the force of his arguments can be successfully met. I submit the following arguments and analysis of authorities from that report:

Whatever property the Government takes from its own obedient subjects for the more efficient prosecution of the war should be compensated for, no matter whether it be forage fed to the cavalry horses, powder burned, timber used on fortifications, houses removed to make way for such fortifications, or houses destroyed to make them more secure.

Grotius asserts the same doctrine. He says:

"The king may in two ways deprive his subjects of their right, either by way of punishment or by virtue of his eminent power. But if he do so in the last way, it must be for some public advantage and then the subject ought to receive, if possible, a just satisfaction for the loss he suffers out of the common stock."

Again he says:

"The state has an eminent right of property over the goods of the subjects, so that the state or those that represent it may make use of them, and even destroy and alienate them, not only in extreme necessity, but for the public benefit, to which we must add that the state is obliged to repair the damages suffered by any subject on that account out of the public stock."

Mr. William Whiting has discussed the subject of war claims with direct reference to the liabilities of the United States growing out of the late war. He writes with extreme caution, but even he asserts that—

"If the private property of loyal citizens is appropriated by our military forces for the purpose of supplying our armies and to aid in prosecuting hostilities against a public enemy, the Government is bound to give a reasonable compensation therefor to the owner."

Again he says:

"When individuals are called upon to give up what is their own for the advantage of the community, justice requires that they should be fairly compensated for it. Otherwise public burdens would be shared unequally."

Again he says:

"Public use does not require that the property taken shall be actually used. It may be disused, removed, or destroyed, and destruction of private property may be the best public use it can be put to. Suppose a bridge owned by a private corporation to be so located as to endanger our forts upon the banks of a river. To demolish that bridge for military purposes would be to appropriate it to public use."

Speaking again in another part of this report Mr. Howe asserts that the Government is bound to the citizens for property appropriated by the Army, and declares—

The Constitution imperatively requires that the public shall make compensation for it. Judicial authority is not less explicit than that of the text-writers.

In Grant vs. the United States, 1 N. & H. Reports, the court says:

"It may safely be assumed as the settled and fundamental law of Christian and civilized states that governments are bound to make just indemnity to the citizen or subject whenever private property is taken for the public good, convenience, or safety."

In that case the United States was held to pay for the property destroyed in Arizona, merely to prevent it from falling into the hands of the enemy.

In the case of Mitchell vs. Harmony, reported in 13 Howard, 115, Chief-Justice Taney, delivering the opinion of the court, says:

"There are, without doubt, occasions in which private property may occasionally be taken possession of or destroyed to prevent it from falling into the hands of the public enemy; and also where a military officer charged with a particular duty may impress private property into the public service or take it for public use. Unquestionably, in such cases, the Government is bound to make full compensation to the owner."

Such were the expressions of views and citation of authorities by the present Postmaster-General.

But now let me turn from the living and recall the voice of the dead—the great Indiana statesman, the late Senator Morton. On the 12th day of January, 1869, when this question was under consideration in the Senate, he made the following remarks:

Mr. President, from the beginning of this war we did all in our power to encourage the people of the South to be loyal and to stand by the Government. We promised them protection for life and property so far as it might be in our power. What kind of protection did we promise to accord to them? I take it, the same kind of protection that we would accord to a loyal man living in the North. If it did not mean that it did not mean anything. We promised them that they should have the same sort of protection for life and property if they would remain loyal and stand by the Government that we would give to the loyal man living in a loyal State. What kind of protection is that to a loyal man in the South, where you take his property upon the same terms and conditions that you take the property of a rebel? It is a direct violation of that promise; it is a violation of our whole policy to the loyal men of the South from the beginning of the war.

Why, sir, we have encouraged them by proclamations; we have encouraged them by acts of Congress; we have encouraged them by the general orders of the generals of the Army; we have encouraged them by the very policy mentioned by the Senator from Nebraska, that wherever our officers took property in the South for military purposes they should give a voucher for it conditioned for payment upon the proof of the loyalty of the claimant, and we thereby, at the time our armies were there, encouraged the loyal men of the South to stand by us, by our generals, saying to them, in the form of vouchers: "You shall be paid for this property if you can prove your loyalty when the war is over."

That was the promise we made to the loyal men of the South, in every possible form and from day to day. Our solemn faith as a nation is pledged on this subject, and we cannot adopt the policy that has been advocated upon the floor of the Senate without compromising and violating that faith. Why, Mr. President, have we not pledged this protection to the Union men of the South in every possible form? Have we not obtained political power upon it? Did we not go before the people of this country last year and rehearse the story of their wrongs? Did we not appeal to the people, to their hearts as well as their heads, when we portrayed to them the sufferings and the wrongs endured by the loyal men of the South, how they were plundered of their property, how their lives were made insecure, how they had spent their days in imprisonment or exile? All of these things we have done, and we have acquired political power partly in consequence of it. We have called them friends from the beginning, we have built upon their friendship, we are their friends in every particular until they come to us with a bill for payment, which a northern man would receive payment for under precisely the same circumstances, and when they come to us with such a claim we tell them, "We cannot pay you; we must regard you as public enemies; you had the misfortune to live in a rebel State, and must therefore be regarded as public enemies." Sir, I cannot find language that I am willing to employ with which to describe this proposition.

Sir, it is not for the Republican party to take this ground. Let us leave it to the Democratic party. But to their honor be it said their Representatives on this floor have repudiated it. If this deed is to be done, let it be left to that other party who have not been the friends of the Union men throughout the struggle, whose sympathies were not with them. Let it not be said that that party which has claimed to be the protector of loyalty both North and South, which has appealed to the people for the protection of the Union men of the South, which has excited the sympathy of the nation by the story of their wrongs, have at last played false to those same men and, when peace has come, turned upon them coldly with this old metaphysical doctrine of international-law writers, that they are to be regarded as public enemies.

* * * * * * *

Now, Mr. President, the reason given in answer to my question is, that the property of the man that was taken in New York was under the protection of the Constitution and laws of the United States; but the property of the loyal man in Alabama was not under the protection of the Constitution of the United States. I deny that proposition. It is at variance with the whole theory upon which we prosecuted this war. If that proposition is true, then a large part of our legislation in regard to the war is false, unfounded, and unconstitutional. We proceeded upon the theory that the Constitution and laws should protect the life and property of every loyal man in this country wherever he might be found. We proceeded at the same time upon the theory that the property and the lives of the rebels could not be protected, or they could not claim protection under the Constitution that they were fighting against and were laboring to overthrow. Why, sir, the idea that because of a rebellion on the part of a portion of the people of the State of Alabama the protection of the Constitution was withheld from the loyal men of that State, has not got a single leg to stand upon. It has neither authority nor has it reason; but it is in conflict with every proclamation, with every statute, and with every step that we took to put down that rebellion, from beginning to end.

Again says the honorable Senator:

> But when property was taken in the State of Alabama, a State at war with the Federal Government, no such legal liability attached.
> Are we prepared now to recognize the doctrine that the State of Alabama, as a State, was at war with the Federal Government? No, sir; never. We did not proceed upon that theory. When we were told at the beginning of the war that we had no authority to coerce a State we said, "We have nothing to do with States, we will coerce the rebel people of that State; with the State as such we have nothing to do." If it shall now be recognized that the State of Alabama, as a State, in her municipal character was carrying on a war with us by means of which the loyal men of that State were deprived of their protection under the Constitution, there are many other consequences which will follow that doctrine which we dare not admit. Sir, that doctrine is heretical. We dare not, we cannot maintain it without overturning the whole theory upon which we have put down this rebellion.—Congressional Globe, second session Fortieth Congress, page 358.

Never did any man speak more truth with greater precision and stronger logic than thus spake the noble Morton.

Again, in replying to the fallacy of "disloyal States" working corruption of political faith, and thus making the citizens of such States disloyal in contemplation of law, the great Morton said:

> But, Mr. President, let me take the case of a Union man in the South who has borne the heat and burden of this civil war, who has been persecuted, and who has sustained all those hardships that we know were incident to a Union man in the South during the war. To say that we will treat him as a public enemy, and that we will refuse to pay him for his property deliberately taken by the Government, where under the same circumstances we would pay a man living in the North for his property taken by the Government, is revolting to the plainest principles of justice. I cannot subscribe to any such doctrine. Why, sir, I know that where a camp was organized in the State of Indiana, or Ohio, or Pennsylvania, for the purpose of collecting and preparing troops, the owner of the property was indemnified by the Government for the damage done to it, or where forage and provisions were taken for the purpose of subsisting those troops the parties were indemnified for their property. To say that we will not pay a Union man in the South where his property has been taken under the same circumstances is revolting to the common principles of justice. I would throw to the winds all these technical rules by which the Union man of the South is to be treated as a public enemy, and by which we shall refuse to do him that justice which we would do to a man in the North, of doubtful loyalty, who was living in peace, comfort, and safety.
> Mr. President, there was one authority referred to, I believe, by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WILLEY] which perhaps might even cover all the cases, and I think that was in Vattel. He can correct me if I state it incorrectly. That authority was that even, for example, in a loyal State, or in a part of the country where the insurrection did not prevail, if the Government deliberately took property, as a house or garden, to make a rampart or fortification, or if it took forage or subsistence deliberately, the Government was not bound to make payment. According to that authority, as I understand it, when General Lee invaded the State of Pennsylvania and the army of General Meade was falling back, if in the course of a march or a battle they destroyed the property of loyal men, that would be an act of war for which the Government would not be liable even in a loyal State.
> And, sir, applying that principle to the Southern States where General Sherman on his march, or in the course of a battle, passed over and destroyed the property of Union men the Government is not liable; but if General Meade in the course of expelling Lee deliberately destroyed property which became necessary for a fortification, or seized the forage and provisions of loyal men around him there, the parties would be paid, and under the same circumstances they should be paid in the South, always upon the condition that they are true and loyal men.
> Then, does not the rule reduce itself down to simply this, that wherever a loyal man in the North would be paid for his property which was deliberately appropriated by the Government, a loyal man in the South should be paid for his property deliberately appropriated by the Government; and where in the North a loyal man would not be paid for property destroyed in the course of a march, or of a battle, so in the South a loyal man should not be paid for his property destroyed in the same way.
> Can we afford to make any other rule on this subject? We might save some money by making another rule; but it would in the end be penny-wise and pound-foolish economy. After having expended some $5,000,000,000 to keep the South in the Union, and after all our labors to build up a loyal party down there, shall we come here making shipwreck in the end by declaring upon the floor of the Senate that the loyal men whose hardships and sufferings we can never estimate shall be treated as public enemies, and that we will not pay them under the same circumstances under which we would pay a man for the taking of like property in the North? I can never consent to it.—Congressional Globe, volume 71, page 308.

Perhaps the best possible conclusion of what I wish to say on this particular point will be found in the language of our present honored Speaker, who on the 10th day of May, 1878, declared that—

> Whatever others may do, or believe, I shall advocate on the floor of this House as I have advocated in the committee, and gentlemen of the committee will corroborate me in this statement, a liberal rule as to the payment of claims of loyal men living in the South. I am not to be classed among those opposed to paying claims of this character.

Mr. Speaker, I might continue to quote from the statesmen and jurists of both political parties in support of the position that it is the duty of the Government to pay its loyal citizens for their property which was taken and used by the United States Army. But I turn to another feature of this question, of the payment of "war claims."

We hear a great deal said in these days in regard to repudiation. One set of politicians are denounced, or were a few years ago, when they startled the country and shocked the public conscience by proposing to inaugurate a sugar-coated policy of repudiation by paying off the bonded debt of the Government with fiat money—greenbacks.

Another set of political speculators are charged, and perhaps justly, with desiring to repudiate the pensions provided for the ex-Union soldiers of the country. And still another class have to bear the odium of trying to repudiate the indebtedness of their respective States. Tennessee is just now under fire on account of the repudiating tendencies of some of her political leaders. Shall the Greenbacker be discountenanced for proposing to pay the bondholders in greenbacks and the men honored who refuse to pay the Union men of the South even by a promise? Shall those who would destroy our beneficent system of pensions to our citizen soldiers be denounced for their repudiating ingratitude, while those who refuse to pay for the rations on which the soldiers subsisted during the war receive commendation and praise? Shall Tennessee be dishonored because the leaders of one wing of the Democracy in that State seek to repudiate her bonds, and the Congress of the United States held blameless when it refuses to provide a means of settlement with those to whom it is honestly indebted, as in very many cases in the border States of the South?

If certain States of the Union are to be dishonored for refusing to meet their just obligations to their creditors, what shall be said of the United States for setting the dishonest example? If Tennessee and her people are to be reproached for becoming involved in a large State debt, and then refusing to provide a court in which to enforce payment, what is to be said of the Government of the United States for taking the last horse, the last cow, the last hog, the last bushel of corn, and the last pound of bacon to be found in the smoke-house of her loyal citizens in the South, and then refusing to let its own courts consider the legal liability involved? If one of the things I have mentioned is repudiation, is dishonesty, so is each of the others. If any one act of repudiation is more dishonest and degrading than another, it would be that of the great Government of the United States refusing to pay the debts created to save the Union. And I say here and now that the great Government of the United States cannot afford to repudiate the just claims of its loyal citizens.

But it has got to be a common thing for a certain class of politicians to declare that there was very little loyalty in the South. All I have to say to this is, that there were more unconditional Union men in Eastern Tennessee according to population than in any part of the United States, and I to-day represent more ex-Federal soldiers according to the number of voters in my district than any member on this floor.

No man who is not himself false to patriotism and all its impulses will call the loyalty of a very large Union element of the South in question.

But as a last refuge of those who are determined to force the Government to repudiate the claims growing out of the war due to Union men in the South, we are constantly told that these claimants have had their day in court. We are reminded that the act of July 4, 1864, has been applied to all of the State of Tennessee and two counties in West Virginia; and that the Southern claims commission was organized expressly for the benefit of the Union men of the South. "True, O king"—all of it!

But the act of the 4th of July, 1864, was and has been hedged about with so much cumbersome machinery and so many "red-tape" processes and conditions originating in the peculiar systems of West Point and the regular Army, that it amounted in many respects to an obstruction to instead of the means of reaching justice. And as to the Southern claims commission, the very law creating it was of such a slip-shod character that it put three otherwise dignified jurists to work with about the same system that would characterize the locomotion of a rickety old cart drawn by a blind and balky horse on a stumpy hillside in the midst of a snow-storm.

For any man familiar with the proceedings of that tribunal to call that "a day in court" places himself at once in the front rank of American jokers, where he becomes the rival of Eli Perkins.

To be serious, while I have very great respect for the gentlemen who composed this commission, I do not believe any well-informed person will stake his reputation on an effort to sustain their findings on any known principle of jurisprudence applicable to courts of law or equity. And the delays and clogs connected with the proceedings in the Quartermaster-General's Office, under the act of July 4, 1864, and before the southern claims commission, were such as to permit the bar of the statute to intervene before very many of those interested knew that such means for their relief had been provided.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I will repeat what I said in the beginning, that no more important matter can arrest the attention of Congress than that of providing for the adjustment of claims against the United States, for, in addition to the right and wrong involved in the question, the transfer of these claims from Congress to some other department of the Government will be a real and advancing step in the direction of "civil-service reform." It will lessen the expenses of legislation and permit Congress to pursue its legitimate work as designed by the founders of the Government and expressed in the letter of the Constitution.

These claims ought to be paid, and one of two things ought to be done: the Court of Claims ought to be given jurisdiction over them, or the powers of the Quartermaster-General should be enlarged and the time extended in which to file them, so that justice may be meted out to the people.

And it will not be out of place to add, as a last word, that France, yes, "bloody France," at the conclusion of her late war with Prussia not only paid her citizens for the property taken and used by government, but paid them, as I understand the fact, for all the losses inflicted upon them by the public enemy. If France can thus set so good and generous an example, cannot the United States be as just as France is generous and pay her loyal people for property of which the Government received the benefit? In the name of right and justice, I say the United States should pay all just and loyal claims.

Such was the original purpose of Congress. Such was the intention of all parties, until political leaders conceived the idea of making political capital out of the subject by crying, "War claims." The time has come to rebuke this demagogism by the adoption of some just measure for the relief of the people.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed the bill (H. R. No. 5801) to provide a deficiency for the subsistence of the Arapahoe, Cheyenne, Kiowa, Comanche, Apache, and Wichita Indians.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 447) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to the United Peorias and Miamies of the Indian Territory, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 596) for the relief of Edgar Huson; and

A bill (S. No. 1071) for the manufacture of salt in the Indian Territory.

REFERENCE OF CLAIMS TO THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. TYLER. I send to the desk an amendment, which I desire to offer when in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment will be printed in the RECORD under the order of the House.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the third section of the pending bill add:

"Provided, That in the examination of claims referred to the Court of Claims by virtue of this act, the court shall first examine the question of the claimant's loyalty, and if in its opinion any claimant did not remain a loyal adherent to the cause of the Government of the United States during the war of the rebellion, the court shall proceed no further in the examination of his or her claim, but shall report that opinion to Congress or to the Department of the Government from which the claim was referred to said court."

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the bill reported from the Committee on Civil-Service Reform by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE,] and now offered as a substitute for the bill reported from the Committee on Claims, with some amendments thereto. I am very glad that the subject of referring private claims now pending or which hereafter may be brought against the Government to some court for the ascertainment of the facts has at last obtained a hearing in Congress. We have had bills of this kind pending heretofore, but scarcely a moment's discussion has been given to them. The question of considering private claims has become so serious that we are compelled to do something in order to relieve our calendars from the pressure now upon them.

All abuses in Government must be remedied sooner or later by the prominence which those abuses obtain. The evils connected with special and private legislation have become so great that Congress cannot longer shut its eyes to their existence, but must meet and provide for them in some way. It is proposed in this bill to do this by an act of Congress. I have submitted heretofore a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution denying to Congress the power to pass any private law. I am not particular what remedy shall be adopted, whether a constitutional amendment or an act of Congress. I should hope that an act of Congress would be passed, because we can accomplish that more easily than we can secure the ratification of a constitutional amendment.

The bill now pending provides in the first section that Congress shall not authorize the payment of any private claim not payable under existing laws until the facts upon which such claim is based shall have been judicially established and reported, as provided in the other sections of the bill. What objection can there be to this proposition? What wrong can result from this enactment? It simply provides that Congress shall not pass a private claim until the facts shall have been judicially ascertained.

Gentlemen have said that this will open the door for the allowance of fraudulent claims, rebel claims, disloyal claims, and all sorts of schemes and jobs can be gotten through under such a provision. I cannot see it in that light. On the contrary, this is putting up the barriers and preventing any claim being passed by Congress until after a full knowledge of all the facts upon which it rests.

How are the facts to be ascertained? This bill says judicially, and judicially has a technical signification in this case. The facts are to be ascertained by a court in the ordinary way of ascertaining facts in a court of justice. How do we ascertain them now? Every gentleman is familiar with the practice in Congress of considering private claims. A bill is introduced; it goes to a committee; is referred to one member; sometimes to two, and sometimes to three, as a sub-committee. That sub-committee has placed in its hands certain ex parte evidence taken by the party in interest, and that sub-committee considers this evidence in its own way, evidence taken without any judicial investigation whatever. Upon this ex parte evidence Congress is called upon to pass bills involving large sums of money.

Now, this bill provides that we shall not hereafter pass upon facts in this way, but that we shall only pass upon claims where the facts have been judicially ascertained, and that after we have judicially ascertained the facts as courts of justice ascertain facts, then we can proceed to determine whether we will grant the relief provided in the bill or not. The other provisions of the bill simply point out the mode of proceeding by the Court of Claims.

I need not refer to the various provisions herein set forth. The honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSE] who has reported this bill very clearly and forcibly presented the provisions of the various sections of the bill, and I will not recapitulate what he has already so well stated.

There is one section, section 4, to which I do ask the attention of the House at this time. That provides that in case of a claim for supplies or stores taken by or furnished to any part of the military or naval forces of the United States for their use during the war for the suppression of the rebellion, or for the destruction of or damage to property by any part of said forces, the petition shall aver the person furnishing said supplies or stores or whose property was so damaged, destroyed, or taken, did not give aid or comfort to said rebellion, but was through that war loyal to the Government of the United States, which averment shall be investigated and the facts in relation thereto found and reported by the court.

Now, in the face of this very positive provision it has been asserted on this floor by gentlemen that the court will not do what is directed to be done, that we cannot require a court to do what is provided in this section. That seems to be a strange doctrine that the court created by act of Congress, clothed with special, not general, jurisdiction, will refuse to exercise the jurisdiction conferred on it in the manner and under the restriction required by the law-making power which gives it existence.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me ask the gentleman a question in reference to the section which he is now considering. Is it good policy to confer upon the Court of Claims power to hear cases growing out of spoliations of war? Does the gentleman think that is good policy?

Mr. SPRINGER. So far as I am concerned I shall vote against the payment of all claims, whether of loyal or disloyal persons, which originated in the war, for the destruction of or damage to property by any part of the forces of the United States or confederate governments.

Mr. HOLMAN. That section gives the court jurisdiction of that class of claims.

Mr. SPRINGER. It gives the court jurisdiction to ascertain the facts and report to Congress, and Congress will be clothed with no greater power to grant relief hereafter than it has now.

Mr. HOLMAN. It confers jurisdiction on the Court of Claims as to all matters of damage in the destruction of property, all kinds of military spoliations, rents for the use and occupation of property, &c.

Mr. SPRINGER. The provision of the bill is this:

The petition shall aver that the person who furnished such supplies or stores, or whose property was so taken, destroyed, or damaged, did not give any aid or comfort to said rebellion, but was throughout that war loyal to the Government of the United States.

Mr. BRAGG. What bill is that?

Mr. SPRINGER. The bill reported by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE.]

Which averment shall be investigated and the facts in relation thereto found and reported by said court.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the fact in reference to the question of loyalty.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is the jurisdictional fact. The petition shall aver that the claimant was loyal. A petition which is presented and which does not aver this is not brought within the jurisdiction of the court to hear it; it would be excluded under this provision of the bill. It shall aver that the person who furnished the supplies was loyal to the Government of the United States throughout the war.

Now, I repeat, if a petition shall be filed which does not aver that the claimant was loyal the court can dismiss such petition for want of that jurisdictional fact being stated; and the court will be compelled to investigate the question unless I am greatly in error as to the practice established under such a provision. This is an affirmative fact to be found not only to give the claimant standing in court but also the provision, "which averment shall be investigated and the facts in relation thereto found and reported by said court."

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly that would have to be investigated and the facts in the case reported to Congress. But there is another question which I desire to ask the gentleman. There is a large body of claims which have been pending and considered in various ways, which have been barred in various forms. In a great many cases claims have been allowed in whole or in part, while others have been rejected wholly. Now, does the gentleman propose to reopen all of the cases which were barred and throw them all upon the court again for investigation?

Mr. SPRINGER. This section 6 provides that—

No private claim of the character described in section 2 of this act, which accrued prior to the year 1866, and which has not been pending before Congress or some one of the Executive Departments since the year 1860, shall be heard by the Court of Claims or considered by Congress or any of the Executive Departments.

Here is a bar to all claims wherein the claimant has not presented the claim within the limit prescribed by law.

Mr. HOLMAN. There were some fifty-three—I believe sixty thousand of these claims before the Southern claims commission. They were all acted upon in some form or other. They were allowed in part in some cases or rejected as a whole. Now, there is nothing here to prevent the reconsideration of all the claims which were rejected entirely or rejected only in part by that commission.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will move an amendment to that effect. I shall vote for it. I shall vote for a provision that this court shall consider no claim rejected by either House of Congress or by a Department of the Government or by the Court of Claims itself or the Southern claims commission.

Mr. HOLMAN. Would my friend from Illinois not go a little further? The law touching the adjustment of claims before the Quartermaster-General's Department or the Commissary-General's Department provided that only such claims should be considered as were presented prior to the date mentioned in the law; and unless they were filed before that date the claim was barred. Now, does my friend propose to reopen all claims which were barred by the act of 1871, and the claims which were rejected by those departments?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will vote for an amendment to the bill to bar all claims which are barred by the act of July 4, 1864. That, I believe, was the date of the act.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; that was the date.

Mr. SPRINGER. I should vote to bar all such claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. And give effect to the other bars now existing by law?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir; I would. I should be very much opposed to opening any of the avenues for the allowance of claims against the Government which are now closed.

But the gentleman from Indiana must understand me. The act of July 4, 1864, had reference to a general class of claims therein indicated; but all other claims barred by the statute of limitations, because the Court of Claims has not jurisdiction to hear them, which are meritorious, I should think ought to have a hearing before that court. I think there should be a hearing upon the question as to whether the party has allowed his right to lapse in such cases through no fault of his own.

I voted in one session of Congress here, I am not certain which one, for a constitutional amendment to bar all war claims, on the general idea that after the war had been closed for so many years it was too late to consider claims which originated during the war. I am not certain whether I was right or not; but I have seen nothing since that time to cause me to regret that I had voted for such an amendment.

I do not desire to open up any facilities for the allowance of claims that grew out of the late war, and generally of claims which have not been in good faith presented to the Court of Claims or to some of the Departments of the Government or to Congress for relief in the only way pointed out to them to seek relief. The Government should endeavor to do justice to its citizens, and that is the reason why I favor some means by which persons having claims against the United States can be heard upon the facts. There is no forum now open for such people except for claims arising upon contracts expressed or implied, which may be sued in the Court of Claims under its general jurisdiction if suit is begun within the time prescribed.

There are many equitable cases arising against the Government that ought to be heard in a judicial way by some tribunal. Gentlemen must reflect that this country is getting to be a very large one. We have mail contracts in every school district of the United States; we have contracts with every railroad company in the United States; we have persons engaged in carrying the mail in every locality throughout the land; we have foreign relations in which the rights of citizens of this Government may be involved. In all the departments and under all the laws of Congress cases may arise where the party ought to have a hearing. Now, he is remitted to Congress, which is worse than no tribunal at all.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will allow me I will say, not in those cases of mail contracts. I suppose in those cases the party has his remedy now in the Court of Claims.

Mr. SPRINGER. Of course, in all claims growing out of contracts he would have the right to go to the Court of Claims. But there are many questions arising between contractors and the Government, not directly resting on the contracts but growing out of circumstances, too numerous to mention here. There can be no better illustration of the injustice to claimants and the outrage perpetrated by the Government upon claimants than was exhibited by this House on Monday last. A claim was passed allowing about $70,000 to be paid to persons who were engaged on the private-armed brig General Armstrong, a claim which originated in 1814, sixty-eight years ago. The parties interested in that case, or their heirs, have been seeking relief, have been trying to have justice done to them, for sixty-eight long years—more than two generations of the average age of men.

Mr. BRAGG. Was that case ever considered by any tribunal?

Mr. SPRINGER. It has been considered by Congress.

Mr. BRAGG. By Congresses previous to this one. But has it been considered by any other tribunal?

Mr. SPRINGER. I am not advised as to that.

Mr. BRAGG. I think it has.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am not advised as to that. It has been pending for that length of time and was not allowed till last Monday by this House. And the vote passing it by tellers was 136 ayes to 36 who voted against it. I voted against that claim on account of its old age, I am ashamed to admit. I think if it is a just claim it should have been paid by our predecessors more than fifty years ago. They have certainly neglected their duty in the most grievous manner, or else these claimants have at last succeeded in mulcting the Government in a large sum of money which ought not to have been paid.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Did you refuse to do your duty because your ancestors did not do theirs?

Mr. SPRINGER. I refused to vote for this claim simply because I thought a claim sixty-eight years of age ought to be barred on general principles.

Mr. HOLMAN. And you made no mistake there.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think I made no mistake. I was ashamed to admit by a favorable vote that my Government had refused to pay an honest claim for half a century.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend from Illinois allow me to ask him if the limitations I wish to submit to him cover the ground he has mentioned?

Mr. SPRINGER. If the limitations are not as great upon this bill as the gentleman from Indiana desires them to be, I hope he will move amendments making the limitations as great as he sees fit. I shall certainly co-operate with him in placing in this bill as many restrictions as possible, so as to make it effective for the object we have in view.

The object I have in view in this bill is to remove from the consideration of Congress claims that are now crowding our calendars and are carried over from Congress to Congress, to the annoyance of the members of this House and of the Senate and to the encumbering of us with matters which Congress ought not to be called upon to consider, namely, private claims against the Government of the United States.

I have stated heretofore that I did not believe it was within the power of Congress under the Constitution to adjudicate private claims. I have taken that position from the fact that all legislative power was vested in Congress and all judicial power was vested in the courts. Whether the Government of the United States owes an individual is a fact which ought to be ascertained in a judicial way. There is no opportunity offered to us to consider these cases. They have become so numerous that we are absolutely met with a blockade, and we must do something to relieve it.

Mr. Speaker, I have asked the Librarian of this House, Mr. Smith, to prepare a statement of bills and joint resolutions introduced in each Congress from 1861 to 1881 inclusive, a period of twenty years. I will have this table printed in my remarks. Gentlemen will observe on examination of it that there have been introduced during the last twenty years in Congress 52,164 bills. Most of these were private bills, and they have been printed by Congress at an enormous expense. The table is as follows:

A statement of bills and joint resolutions introduced in each Congress from 1861 to 1881, inclusive.

Very respectfully, yours,

W. H. SMITH.
Librarian House of Representatives.

I have also obtained from the Public Printer a statement of the cost of the printing of these bills from 1862 down to and including the year 1881. The cost for each year is stated in a table which I hold in my hand, together with the letter of the chief clerk of the Printing Bureau. I will have the table and letter printed as part of my remarks, only calling the attention of the House to the aggregate, which was for these twenty years of printing of bills, $459,740. Nearly half a million of dollars have been expended by Congress in the last twenty years in the printing of bills; and the clerk furnishing me with this table says that a large portion of these were private bills.

The letter and table are as follows:

OFFICE OF PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, D. C., March 9, 1882.

SIR: I send herewith a statement showing the cost of printing bills and joint resolutions for the House and Senate, respectively, from 1862 to 1881, both inclusive.

We do not keep the cost of bills of a public and private nature separate, but the latter comprises about two-thirds of the whole number printed.

Very respectfully,

A. F. CHILDS, Chief Clerk,
For the Public Printer.

Hon. WILLIAM M. SPRINGER,
House of Representatives.

Statement showing the cost of printing the bills and joint resolutions of both Houses of Congress for the years 1862 to 1881, inclusive.

Year.	House.	Senate.
1862	$2,583 62	$2,718 55
1863	924 62	1,620 78
1864	2,429 03	3,999 95
1865	802 62	1,572 58
1866	8,777 70	15,101 36
1867	7,985 17	8,575 42
1868	7,474 62	9,902 53
1869	7,291 09	9,693 00
1870	14,006 05	18,939 28
1871	9,715 77	11,164 64
1872	18,882 32	18,108 49
1873	8,776 86	9,262 96
1874	29,335 34	15,862 86
1875	9,793 60	9,686 26
1876	28,873 98	14,634 01
1877	4,990 61	4,095 66
1878	32,519 90	17,462 40
1879	20,901 66	18,334 30
1880	23,861 30	14,048 18
1881	7,482 40	7,548 64
Total	247,408 26	212,331 85
		247,408 26
Grand total		459,740 11

It will be seen by this table that during the Forty-fifth Congress the cost of the printing of bills amounted to $73,116; and during the Forty-sixth Congress the cost of the printing of bills amounted to $69,000. Members will discover that the cost of printing bills was less in the Forty-sixth Congress than in the Forty-fifth Congress. That was owing to the fact that a new rule, which I had the honor to submit, was adopted on April 9, 1879, which provided that private bills heretofore printed by Congress should not be reprinted until they had been favorably reported from some committee. That little rule, which was enforced during a part of last Congress, saved the Government a very large sum of money in the printing of private bills, the saving amounting to over $8,000.

There were introduced in the last Congress 10,000 bills. There have been introduced during this Congress up to this time in the House 6,103 bills and joint resolutions, and in the Senate 1,818; making a total of 7,921 bills and joint resolutions now pending before this Congress; and we have been in session but a little over four months.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BRAGG. I would inquire of the gentleman if the bill which he favors places any restriction upon any one sending all these bills back here and having them printed?

Mr. SPRINGER. It will prevent those bills from being introduced hereafter and printed at the expense of the Government.

Mr. BRAGG. Where is that clause?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will read it:

Congress shall not authorize the payment of any private claim not payable under existing laws until the facts on which such claim is based shall have been judicially established and reported as hereinafter provided.

The party must go by petition to the Court of Claims and there set up his claim against the Government, and then the court will proceed judicially to consider it.

Mr. BRAGG. Will that prevent any succeeding Congress from passing any claim it may see proper?

Mr. SPRINGER. It does not; and that is the weak place in all this legislation.

Mr. BRAGG. Exactly.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will come to that after awhile.

Mr. BRIGGS. I was about to propound to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] the same inquiry which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] has propounded, as to whether this first section is binding on any future Congress.

Mr. SPRINGER. Of course not.

Mr. BRIGGS. Or on the present Congress, after this bill shall have been passed.

Mr. SPRINGER. Of course not. Nothing short of a constitutional amendment will abolish this private legislation entirely. But I think the rule hereafter will be, when a private claim is introduced in Congress, if this bill shall become a law, that such private bill must provide upon its face for the repeal of this law, in so far as that particular claim is concerned. And as it will propose a repeal of the law it will of course be in order for Congress to consider it.

That is the weak place of all legislation of this kind. Future Congresses must be relied upon to protect themselves against the introduction and printing of these bills at the expense of the Government. That might be done by the adoption of some rule upon the subject. If you should provide that such claims shall come in only through the petition-box, and that when introduced here in that way they shall be referred to the Court of Claims for the ascertainment of the facts stated in the petition, we will in that way remove from the presence of Congress the consideration of private bills and the printing of private bills which now obstruct nearly all other legislation, and compel the party first to establish his loyalty and the facts of his claim in the Court of Claims before he can appeal to us for the payment of what he alleges the Government owes him.

Now, the honorable gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] and the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIGGS] have referred to the fact that future Congresses may repeal this legislation. I regret that such power still exists and will continue to exist until a constitutional amendment upon this subject shall have been passed. I hope that before this Congress adjourns it will adopt and cause to be submitted to the several State Legislatures for ratification a constitutional amendment on the subject of private claims which will in substance provide that no case of a private claim shall ever be adjudicated by Congress.

Mr. BOWMAN. I wish to suggest to the gentleman that the objection which is made to this bill applies to every law passed by Congress, from a tariff bill up or down.

Mr. SPRINGER. Of course. I will ask the Clerk now to read a constitutional amendment which I have introduced into this House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting special legislation.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as a part of the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE —.

SECTION 1. The legislative power of the United States is limited to the enactment of laws general in their application and effect to all sections and persons within the jurisdiction of this Constitution. All local, private, or special enactments, hereby prohibited, shall be null and void.

SEC. 2. All claims against the United States shall be adjudicated and determined by such tribunal or tribunals as Congress may establish for that purpose.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask gentlemen to give attention to that amendment, or to some other which will effectually put a stop to the adjudication of private claims by Congress.

Gentlemen need not be reminded of the fact that of all places under the sun in which a case should be adjudicated, Congress or a Congressional committee is the worst, not only for the claimants but for the Government itself. The Government is entitled to have all claims established against it in some open tribunal, where witnesses can be cross-examined and where the Government will have an opportunity of producing witnesses to disprove the claim set up by the claimant.

Give the Government this opportunity, and this great mass of claims which was represented in the last Congress by ten thousand bills, nearly all of them pending when that Congress adjourned, and which is represented in this Congress by seven thousand bills already introduced—give the Government the right to be heard against these claimants by witnesses, and they will disappear from these halls, at least a great many of them, never to return again.

I am not afraid, Mr. Speaker, to trust our successors in the House and in the Senate to pass upon the questions of fact which may be submitted by the Court of Claims under this bill. I shall assume that our successors will have as much probity, as much regard for the rights of claimants and the interests of the Government as we have exhibited on these subjects, and that when the Court of Claims shall send in their report upon the cases submitted to them under this law our successors will do justice to the claimants and to the Government; and if the facts show that the Government is in honor bound to pay a given sum of money, I cannot see any reason why it should not be paid.

Mr. ATKINS. Does this bill contemplate increasing the number of judges of the Court of Claims?

Mr. SPRINGER. It does not.

Mr. ATKINS. Then how does the gentleman expect the Court of Claims to perform this work?

Mr. SPRINGER. I think that the Court of Claims can in a reasonable time discharge the duties proposed to be imposed upon them by this measure.

Mr. ATKINS. Has not that court now as much business as it can do?

Mr. SPRINGER. I am not certain whether the members of the court are engaged all the time or not. But I understand they have reported to a committee of this House that they can take charge of this business, and will perform it in good faith.

Mr. ATKINS. Would there be a restriction in this bill forbidding Congress to act upon these matters hereafter? I presume of course we could not do that.

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; not without constitutional amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. It is very probable that many cases which now come to Congress would never go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. SPRINGER. As the gentleman from Texas well remarks, there are many claims coming now to Congress, because the parties hope to have the investigation take place on ex parte testimony, which would not go to the Court of Claims where representatives of the Government would be ready to cross-examine witnesses and to introduce evidence opposed to the claim. Many of these claims, as the honorable gentleman from Michigan suggests, would never see daylight if the facts were required to be exhibited in the light of day before an honest court.

Mr. Speaker, there seems to be an idea prevailing in the minds of some gentlemen that there is but one class of obligations that the Government of the United States should pay—United States bonds. Whenever a man has a bond of the United States we all stop and say, "Yes, the interest and principal must be paid according to the contract." That is right. But some gentlemen seem to stop there. Individuals under our laws are required to pay just claims, even when they have not given their bonds or their notes. Wherever a court hearing a case between man and man finds that one is indebted to the other, no matter whether there be a bond, or note, or anything of the kind, the court enforces payment. I believe the Government should be placed upon the same plane on which its citizens are placed in regard to these matters. If the Government of the United States justly and honestly owes a claim, it is dishonest for it to refuse payment.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMP]—and I am sorry he is not now in his seat—referred on Friday last to the fact that there were certain disloyal claims pending before Congress. I desire to call attention to his language. He said:

> The people of this nation are apprehensive on the question of paying rebel claims. Why, sir, they have been told, and there are many reasons why they should believe, that there are about this Capitol nearly $3,000,000,000 of such claims in committee rooms, in pigeon-holes, and elsewhere, waiting but the advent of the Democratic party to power for their liquidation and payment. Whether this be true or not I am not here now to discuss.

Of course he was not. The honorable gentleman very timidly made the remark that he was not here to say whether the statement was true or not. But why did he not say that it was not true? He left the impression that there was some foundation for the statement. How many claims did he say there were? Three billion dollars of "rebel claims." Where?

> In committee-rooms, in pigeon-holes, and elsewhere, waiting but the advent of the Democratic party to power for their liquidation and payment.

I am sorry the honorable gentleman is not in his seat. I wanted to characterize that statement differently from what I shall now do. But I can say in his absence, and in a parliamentary way, that there is not a particle of foundation for that statement. Mr. Speaker, I have been in Congress nearly eight years, and I have never known a claimant to come to this House and ask to be paid any war claim without basing his petition or claim upon the fact that he was loyal during the war. I have never known a committee to consider such a claim that did not reject it if the disloyalty of the claimant appeared. I do not know any party or any set of gentlemen in this House who are in favor of paying to disloyal persons claims growing out of the war.

There are claims that originated before the war; there are claims with regard to pensions to Mexican soldiers; there are cases that have no reference to damages during the war, or supplies furnished at that time where the question of the loyalty of claimants has been discussed; but I do assert that so far as regards the class of claims embraced within the provisions of section 4 of this bill, for "supplies furnished to the military or naval forces of the United States, or for the destruction of property by said forces," there has been no claim pressed here, so far as I know, on behalf of any person who was disloyal during the war.

Mr. DWIGHT. The gentleman will allow me to ask him whether the statement of my colleague [Mr. CAMP] was not based upon the fact that in the discussion of the bill then pending it turned out that the claimant was a disloyal man?

Mr. SPRINGER. But in that very case (the claim of Edward S. Armstrong for about $1,600) the question of disloyalty was the matter in dispute; it was the question at issue, having been determined differently under different circumstances.

Mr. DWIGHT. The claims that my colleague referred to were those of the same character.

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; he speaks here of "rebel claims;" and he says:

> Nearly $3,000,000,000 of such claims are in committee-rooms, in pigeon-holes, and elsewhere, waiting but the advent of the Democratic party to power for their liquidation and payment.

Mr. DWIGHT. It crept out that claim was presented by a man presumed to be disloyal.

Mr. SPRINGER. That was a disputed question.

Mr. DWIGHT. Oh, no, it was not.

Mr. SPRINGER. He was said to be so after the evidence was heard.

Mr. DWIGHT. It is admitted that claim was presented by a man absolutely disloyal.

Mr. SPRINGER. The claim was not a war claim at all; it had nothing to do with the war.

Mr. DWIGHT. Does it make no difference to the gentleman that it was presented by a disloyal man? Such a one is cut off by the statute. This man was admitted to be disloyal, and under the law was not entitled to payment.

I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois another question, and it is this, whether nearly all that side of the House did not vote for that claim after the claimant was known to be disloyal?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; I do not know any such thing. I did not vote for it.

Mr. DWIGHT. I think the record will show that side of the House nearly all voted for it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not know how many voted for it. I state it was not a war claim and had nothing to do with the war. This party was simply claiming so much of his father's estate as came to him; a claim growing out of a contract his father had with the Government of the United States before the war. That is all there was in that case. I am not going into a discussion of it now.

Mr. DWIGHT. The man was in the war against us all the time.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not know whether he was or not; I voted against it.

Mr. DWIGHT. Was not the man who presented that claim in the rebel army?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not know.

Mr. DWIGHT. I state that he was. It is shown in the testimony that he was.

Mr. SPRINGER. The honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] who succeeded in this House the late President Garfield reported it and advocated it on the floor of this House. I took it for granted we ought to pay it until the honorable gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] made a statement in regard to it, and then I thought it ought not to be paid, and I voted against it. I submit to the gentleman from New York, would he not think a man might be misled on a question of loyalty after a favorable report was made on the case by a distinguished Republican member, the successor of General Garfield on this floor?

Mr. REED. The successor of General Garfield said the man was not loyal.

Mr. SPRINGER. He reported in favor of allowing the claim; but I am not going into the details of all these small claims. It is impossible for any one member of Congress to do it. We have to take them upon the report of the committee. This case came to the House under such favorable circumstances that any member would have been authorized to support it without going into the merits of the matter. After the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] made a speech on the subject, however, I felt satisfied the claim should not be allowed and voted against it. Let this suffice for this case. I hope the honorable gentleman will not interrupt me further on the subject.

Mr. DWIGHT. Did not all that side vote solidly for it?

Mr. SPRINGER. I did not; I voted against it.

Mr. BRAGG. Here is a small fragment who did not vote for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. And I do not think the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] voted for it. But here is the record of the vote. The enacting clause was stricken out of the bill by a vote of ayes 71, noes 40. The vote was by tellers. If all the "noes" were Democrats (which was not the case) they would constitute less than one-third of the Democratic members of the House.

Since the gentleman from New York [Mr. DWIGHT] seems so much concerned about the Armstrong case, I will print the report on it in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, in order that all the facts may be known. The report submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] as the unanimous report of the Committee on Claims is as follows:

> The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 987) amendatory of the act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs and next of kin of James B. Armstrong, deceased," approved March 3, 1873, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to make the following report:
> In 1855 James B. Armstrong made a contract with the Government of the United States for the transportation of men and supplies on the Rio Grande. Armstrong claimed that the Government failed to comply with the terms of said contract, and brought suit against the United States in the Court of Claims to recover damages for the breach.
> In this action judgment was rendered by the Court of Claims in favor of his administrator (he having died) on the 22d day of November, 1860, for the sum of $17,846.78. The war intervening, no legislation making appropriation for the payment of this judgment till March 3, 1873, when a law was passed appropriating $13,385.09 for the satisfaction of this judgment of the Court of Claims, the Senate having cut down the sum proposed to that amount. (See Senate report No. 488, Forty-second Congress, third session.) The provisions of this law authorized the payment of the proportion of this amount to each of the heirs of said James B. Armstrong according to their interest in the estate, but required proof of the loyalty, during the rebellion, of each person to whom payment was to be made. On the 7th day of March, 1874, satisfactory proof having been made of the loyalty of all the heirs but one, each, except that one, was paid by the Secretary of the Treasury the sum of $1,673.14.
> The one not paid was Edward S. Armstrong, the proof of loyalty in his case not being satisfactory. Only two witnesses testified to this point: one by implication impeaching his loyalty, and the other swearing positively that he was and remained loyal during the war. Edward S. was a resident of Missouri during the war, and as that was a non-seceding and loyal State, the presumption of law would be that its citizens were loyal; yet the known facts of history as connected with this particular subject would not raise a very strong probability of fact as to a particular individual. It is possible, therefore, that an officer acting under the positive and unyielding letter of the law referred to might be justified in withholding payment from Edward S. Armstrong; but your committee think that Congress will not feel obliged to require strict proof of this fact now that the case is before it for further action, especially as this claim accrued long before the war, is unquestionably honest, and comes to the claimant by inheritance.

On consideration of the whole case, the committee report back the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House the recess must be taken at half-past four o'clock, and there are a few matters upon the Speaker's table which ought to be disposed of. If the gentleman from Illinois will give way, it will not come out of his time.

Mr. BRAGG. How much time has the gentleman left?

The SPEAKER. Fourteen minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. Very well; I will yield the floor at this time.

Mr. BOWMAN. I move that the bill under discussion reported by the Committee on Claims, as well as the one reported by the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, be printed in the RECORD to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. That order has already been made, and the two bills will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BRIGGS. I move the following amendment:

Amend by inserting after the word "facts," in section 1, line 6, "accruing prior to August 20, 1866." Also insert after the word "matter," in line 1, section 2, "accruing as aforesaid."

Mr. HOLMAN. And I move to strike out the fourth section of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSE] and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

SEC. —. The jurisdiction of said court shall not extend to or include any claim against the United States growing out of the destruction or damage to property by the Army or Navy during the war for the suppression of the rebellion, or for the use and occupation of real estate by any part of the military or naval forces of the United States in the operations of said forces during the said war at the seat of war; nor shall the said court have jurisdiction of any claim against the United States which is now barred by virtue of the provisions of any law of the United States.

SEC. —. In any case of a claim for supplies or stores taken by or furnished to any part of military or naval forces of the United States for their use during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, the petition shall aver that the person who furnished such supplies or stores, or from whom such supplies or stores were taken, did not give any aid or comfort to said rebellion, but was throughout that war loyal to the Government of the United States, and the fact of such loyalty shall be a jurisdictional fact, and unless the said court shall, on a preliminary inquiry, find that the person who furnished such supplies or stores, or from whom the same were taken as aforesaid, was loyal to the Government of the United States throughout said war, the court shall not have jurisdiction of such cause, and the same shall, without further proceedings, be dismissed.

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House both amendments will be printed in the RECORD.

LEAVITT CANCELING-MACHINE.

On motion of Mr. SHELLEY, by unanimous consent, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2811) authorizing the Postmaster-General to purchase and adopt the Leavitt letter-canceling and post-marking machine; and the same was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. TALBOTT, until Monday next.

To Mr. HOGE, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 26) to amend section 2326 of the Revised Statutes, in regard to mineral lands, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 361) for a public building at Frankfort, Kentucky; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4454) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Keithsburgh, in the State of Illinois, and to establish it as a post-road.

HARRIET N. ABBOTT.

Mr. RAY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5906) granting a pension to Harriet N. Abbott; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CATHARINE A. MAPES.

Mr. HOBLITZELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5907) for the relief of Catharine A. Mapes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that in his absence at the evening session the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] will preside.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the order of business for the evening session?

The SPEAKER. The consideration of bills reported from the Committees on Pensions, Invalid Pensions, and from the Military Committee for the donation of condemned cannon.

The hour of four o'clock and thirty minutes having now arrived, at which time, by a previous order of the House, a recess is to be taken, the Chair now declares the House in recess until seven o'clock and thirty minutes this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House (at seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) reassembled, Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan, in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. MARSH. I move that the House take a further recess of ten minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The House reassembled at seven o'clock and forty minutes p. m.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the order under which this session is held.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That until the further order of the House, on Friday of each week the House shall take a recess at 4.30 o'clock until 7.30 o'clock, at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committees on Invalid Pensions and Pensions only shall be considered. April 14, 1882, amended, on motion of Mr. JOYCE, so as to include the consideration of bills granting condemned cannon, not to interfere with bills above named: Provided, That general debate shall be in order at such sessions, not to interfere with said bills.

Mr. JOYCE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. BRIGGS in the chair.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar for the purpose of considering bills under the special assignment of business heretofore made by the House for this evening's session.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JOYCE. Mr. Chairman, there are some seven or eight pensions cases on the Private Calendar which have heretofore once or twice or perhaps oftener been passed over informally, because objected to. The first bill on the Calendar passed over in this way is the bill (H. R. No. 2142) granting arreages of pension to Andrew J. Morrison, a bill that I have charge of. Now, if these other bills that have been objected to from time to time, and which are likely to provoke discussion, can be passed over informally to-night so as to enable us to proceed with the consideration of bills on the Calendar to which there will be no objection, I shall not object to this bill being also passed over informally. I am willing that it shall be passed over as I have said, but only on condition that the others are informally passed over.

Mr. ATKINS. Can the gentleman from Vermont state the ground of objection to these bills?

Mr. JOYCE. Not with reference to all of them.

Mr. ATKINS. Have you an idea as to any of them?

Mr. JOYCE. Yes, sir.

Mr. ATKINS. Are they bills granting pensions to soldiers in the ordinary military service of the country; or are they for the purpose of granting pensions to some other than persons in the military service?

Mr. JOYCE. I think that in one or two cases they are for the purpose of pensioning men who are not, perhaps, considered directly in the military service.

Mr. ATKINS. Then I should myself interpose an objection to any of them being considered.

Mr. JOYCE. There are, I think, seven of these cases on the Calendar.

Mr. ATKINS. Then I shall object to their consideration, because I am satisfied that I know of some gentlemen who wish to be heard upon them. I do not desire myself to say anything in reference to them, but I know other gentlemen who wish to be heard.

Mr. PARKER. I would like to know from the gentleman if he will object to their consideration on the ground that there is no quorum present?

Mr. ATKINS. I have already given my ground of objection.

Mr. PARKER. I suppose a simple objection does not stop those more than any other?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir; it will without a quorum.

Mr. PARKER. Of course if the gentleman opposes their consideration on the ground that no quorum is present he can prevent their consideration.

Mr. MATSON. I would ask the gentleman from Tennessee if he would not be willing to proceed with the consideration of those cases on the Calendar which are not likely to provoke discussion, and take up the cases to which he now refers at a subsequent time.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not desire to make any factious opposition. I have not the remotest idea of that. I believe the soldiers who have served the country faithfully and have become disabled by reason of wounds or disease contracted in the military service ought to be pensioned. I think a country that will not pension its brave defenders when they become maimed in the service is not worthy to live.

But, sir, I spoke of a class. That class the gentleman from Vermont has alluded to. The proposition, as I understand, is to pension certain parties who were not in the military service, and I objected to that just because I knew there were some gentlemen, members of the House, who would object to those bills passing without discussion. That is all I have to say about it.

Mr. MATSON. I understand, and did understand before, the position of the gentleman from Tennessee very well. I knew he was not here to make any factious opposition. But I want to inform him of the fact that the case, or perhaps the cases—I am not sure but there are perhaps more than two bills of the kind he refers to, including a bill to pension the widows of persons who were in the Life-Saving Service, and that is perhaps the case he refers to—that cases of that class have been called heretofore and passed over, and that if they were called now a discussion would be opened up and the time of this evening's session would be consumed upon them and the other cases would not be reached, there being perhaps nine-tenths of those cases which would not be objected to. I think those cases ought to be reached and that the time should not be occupied in the discussion of those about which there is dispute. I presume that would be satisfactory to the gentleman from Tennessee and to all concerned.

Therefore I move, if it is in order, and I presume it is, that we begin the call of the Private Calendar on page 37, at House bill No. 4101. [After a pause.] I accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DAWES] to begin with bill No. 4444, on page 28 of the Calendar, and ask that we then pass from that to the bill I have indicated on page 37.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection it will be so ordered.

WILSON W. BROWN AND OTHERS.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill which has just been indicated by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. MATSON.]

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. No. 4444) as formerly amended in Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

A bill granting pensions to Wilson W. Brown and others.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, at the rate of $20 per month, the names of Wilson W. Brown, late second lieutenant of Company F, Twenty-first Regiment Ohio Volunteers; John R. Porter, late second lieutenant of Company G, Twenty-first Regiment Ohio Volunteers; William Bensinger, late captain of Company C, Thirteenth Regiment United States Colored Infantry; John A. Wilson, late of Company C, Twenty-first Regiment Ohio Volunteers; William Pittenger, late of Company G, Second Regiment Ohio Volunteers; Martin J. Hawkins, late of Company A, Thirty-third Regiment Ohio Volunteers; Daniel A. Dorsey, late second lieutenant of Company H, Thirty-third Regiment Ohio Volunteers; Elihu H. Mason, late of Company K, Twenty-first Ohio Volunteers; William H. Reddick, late of Company B, Thirty-third Regiment Ohio Volunteers; and Rachel Slavens, widow of Samuel Slavens, a soldier executed at Atlanta, Georgia, by the confederate authorities, June 18, 1862: Provided, That the pensions hereby granted shall be in lieu of all other pensions that have been granted to or are claimed by any of the above-named persons under the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3486) granting pensions to Wilson W. Brown and others, respectfully report as follows:

The petitioners seeking to be benefited by this bill are known in history as the "Mitchell Raiders." In the early part of April, 1862, General O. M. Mitchell had advanced his column as far south as Shelbyville, Tennessee. On the west the battle of Shiloh had just determined in favor of the Union arms. At the east McClellan, with his Army of the Potomac, was at Yorktown, threatening an advance upon Richmond. Against these two armies of the West and East the South had concentrated their strength. General Mitchell saw then, as a bloody history so fully demonstrated subsequently, the vital importance of seizing and holding Chattanooga as a strategic point on the great railroad line between the East and West, which connected the main armies of the rebellion. The capture of Chattanooga at that crisis of the war involved also the possession of East Tennessee and the probable uprising of a strong loyal element there. The Mitchell Raiders were a body of twenty-one men under command of one J. J. Andrews, selected by General Mitchell to undertake the desperate enterprise of penetrating nearly two hundred miles south into the heart of the enemy's territory and endeavoring to destroy the wooden bridges on the railroad between Chattanooga and Atlanta. This, Mitchell hoped, would cut off the advance of troops from the South while he moved down his army and captured Chattanooga. Judge-Advocate-General Joseph Holt did not exaggerate when he said of this expedition that "in the daring of its conception it had the wildness of romance, while in the overwhelming results which it sought to accomplish it was absolutely sublime."

The account of the raid, following, is borrowed from another writer, and is correct, according to the evidence of participants:

"The soldiers of this forlorn hope, dressed in citizens clothes and representing themselves as good secessionists, set out on foot through the enemy's country by twos and threes, and, after many adventures, came together at Marietta, a point on the railroad a little north of Atlanta. The plan was to take passage on some north-bound train, and, at an opportune moment, overpower the guard, seize the engine, and drive onward with all speed, burning bridges and tearing up track as they went, and leaving a trail of flame and destruction behind them; to dash clean through Chattanooga, and meet Mitchell as he advanced along the Memphis road. It was early in the morning of April 12 when these adventurous travelers, with tickets for different points to avert suspicion, boarded the train, and finally seated themselves in the same car. At broad daylight the conductor called out: "Big Shanty; twenty minutes for breakfast," and at once passengers, engineer, and trainmen all poured into the long eating-room, leaving the engine unguarded, although it was within the lines of the rebel encampment.

"The little band sauntered forward, each falling into his appointed place, when in a twinkling, on a signal given, the passenger coaches were uncoupled, an engineer and fireman of the party sprang into the cab, the valve was pulled open, and the engine, tender, and three cars moved off as the remaining adventurers leaped into the open doors of one of the box cars. A few minutes placed the exulting party beyond what seemed to be the danger of any successful pursuit, for there was no telegraph at Big Shanty, and no other engine at hand. But it was one day too late. General Mitchell had advanced to Huntsville, and his approach was so threatening that all the rolling stock about Chattanooga had been ordered South, and the delay caused by meeting these unscheduled trains was fatal. Andrews, representing himself as a confederate officer of high rank, who had impressed the train for the purpose of running powder through to Beauregard at Corinth, excited no suspicion. But while he was losing precious minutes in waiting for the extra trains, and moving them off the track, the conductor at Big Shanty left his coffee and began the pursuit on foot until he reached a hand-car, and soon after, in a swift locomotive, which, by rare good fortune, had come down to the road, on a private track, from large iron works just in the nick of time. Before the raiders found opportunity for any serious work their pursuers were upon them. A desperate chase ensued, until finally, after a run of nearly one hundred miles, the captured locomotive, now jaded and shattered, was abandoned, and the captors scattered to the shelter of thick woods."

The whole party was captured after enduring the sufferings incident to fruitless efforts to escape their pursuit. It is unpleasant to recall the history of the treatment to which these prisoners were subjected. They were denounced as spies. They were chained together by twos by the neck, marched through the streets of Chattanooga amid the angry jeers of an infuriated crowd, and thrust into a kind of dungeon. This apartment was thirteen feet square and of about the same depth. Twenty-one men were confined here for nearly three weeks. Scanty provision was furnished and no sufficient means afforded for the removal of excrement. If we may credit the statements of survivors of the party, which are as given above, the horrors of this confinement were beyond description. When released from the dark and noisome hole their condition was pitiable, and for hours they were blinded by the light of day. Andrews, the leader, was hung as a spy. The party was removed then to Atlanta, where seven more were tried, convicted, and hanged as spies. One, Jacob Parrot, was whipped, one hundred lashes being inflicted on his back. For six months some of the survivors and for eleven months others of them were in constant apprehension of the same death by hanging as their comrades had suffered. It were better that the story of the sufferings and indignities inflicted on these heroic soldiers were left unrecited, as they were incredibly terrible as told by the survivors.

In considering this case the committee think it very clear that this raid was a military expedition. Judges Baxter and Temple, who it appears acted as attorneys to defend the men who were hanged, have lately written that they considered that they clearly showed before the court-martial that the expedition was a military one under authority and command of General Mitchell, and that the men were not spies. It is evident that the confederate government so regarded the matter, as the further trial of the survivors was stopped after the execution of Andrews and seven of the party. These soldiers, therefore, who undertook and with marvelous energy essayed the task imposed by their commander, suffered an outrage in being treated as spies and worse, which justifies their appeal for consideration.

Jacob Parrot, one of the raiders, by special act of Congress approved March 3, 1879, had his pension increased to $20 per month, as will be seen in the following statement from the records of the Pension Office:

"Persons referred to in bill 3486.

"Wilson W. Brown, pensioner, at $12 per month, for gunshot wound left knee and hand, received at Chickamauga, September 20, 1863.

"William Pittinger, pensioner, at $18 per month, for disease of lungs and liver, contracted while prisoner of war, captured April 15, 1862, on raid.

"Martin Hawkins, prisoner, at $8 per month, for scurvy and debility, contracted in prison at Chattanooga.

"Daniel A. Dorsey, pensioner, (papers out of file.)

"Jacob Parrott, pensioned under general laws, at $8 per month, for injury of back, caused by whipping, while prisoner of war; pension increased to $20 per month by special act, approved March 3, 1879.

"John R. Porter, claimant for pension on account of right hernia, contracted in March, 1865.

"William Bensinger, applicant for pension on account of bronchitis and piles, contracted while captain of Company C, Thirteenth United States Colored Infantry.

"John A. Wilson has not applied for pension under the general law.

"Elihu A. Mason, applicant for pension on account of scurvy and results, contracted while a prisoner of war at Atlanta.

"Rachel Slavens, widow of Samuel Slavens, pensioned under certificate 68918, soldier was executed at Atlanta, Georgia, June 18, 1862."

The committee report a substitute for the bill, which provides that the names of Wilson W. Brown, William Pittinger, Martin Hawkins, Daniel A. Dorsey, John R. Porter, William Bensinger, John A. Wilson, Elihu Mason, and Rachel Slavens shall be placed on the pension-roll at $20 per month, and that this shall be in lieu of all pensions heretofore allowed or claimed to be due to any of said persons, and recommend its passage by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection the bill will be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. McMILLIN. I call for a vote on the bill. I do not wish it to be understood as going by unanimous consent.

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. McCOID. I give notice that I will offer some amendments in the House.

ELISABETH BRAY.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the first of the pension bills on the Calendar which have not been heretofore called.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 4101) for the relief of Elisabeth Bray.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elisabeth Bray, widow of E. Bray, late a private in the Eighth Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Elisabeth Bray, having had the same under consideration, would respectfully report as follows:

That Elisabeth Bray is the widow of Edward Bray, who enlisted in the United States service on the 10th day of October, 1863, in Hawkins County, Tennessee, under Major W. W. Willis, of the Eighth Tennessee Cavalry, but before muster into service said Bray was killed in battle on the 6th day of November, 1863, near Rogersville, Tennessee.

No record of his service having been made, her claim for pension was rejected on this ground.

But that Edward Bray was a soldier duly enlisted, though not mustered, is proven by the affidavits of the officers of his regiment and company.

They state, under oath, that he was enlisted on October 10, 1863, and on the 6th of November following, while in line of duty, was killed in battle.

This affidavit is sworn to by William B. Davis, late major of the regiment, L. M. Jarvis, late captain of Company E of the regiment, and F. M. Turner, late lieutenant in the same company. They further swear that from neglect or ignorance of duty no military record was kept of said Edward Bray by the officers whose duty it was to keep the rolls of said command.

In view of these facts, your committee feel that this is a meritorious case for special relief. They therefore report favorably and recommend that the bill accompanying this petition be passed.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it so pass.

LEWIS BLUNDIN.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1462) granting a pension to Lewis Blundin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lewis Blundin, late of Company C, Twenty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, who was stricken down by disease during Sherman's campaign from Atlanta to the sea, which resulted in paralysis.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions reported the following amendment:

After the word "Volunteers," in line 7, strike out the words:

"Who was stricken down by disease during Sherman's campaign from Atlanta to the sea, which resulted in paralysis."

The amendment was agreed to.

The report was read, as follows:

This committee, to whom was referred the bill of the House No. 1462, have considered the same, and adopt the report made to the Forty-sixth Congress by the Invalid Pension Committee:

"The petition of Lewis Blundin sets forth that he enlisted in Company C, Twenty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers, on July 20, 1861, and was mustered out by reason of expiration of term of service on July 20, 1864; that he again enlisted on March 20, 1865, in Company C, First Army Corps, Third United States Veteran Volunteers, for one year, and was discharged March 29, 1866, on expiration of term of service.

"He now claims pension by reason of disability incurred in the service and in line of duty; that his disability is paralysis and chronic rheumatism, the result of exposure, and an attack of typhoid fever; that he was treated for said fever and rheumatism in 1864 in a field hospital near Resaca, Georgia.

"The records of the War Department show service as above claimed, but furnish no evidence of his disability."

"John E. Littleton makes affidavit that he was lieutenant in Company C, Twenty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers; swears claimant was disabled about May 15, 1864; that from want of shelter, and from exposure, Blundin contracted typhoid fever, was a patient in field hospital, was returned to duty, and by reason of his weakened condition and exposure was attacked with rheumatism, and again became a patient in the field hospital. The affidavits of five witnesses show their acquaintance to have extended over a period of fifteen years prior to the filing of the claim; were his neighbors; knew him to be a perfectly sound and healthy man at the date of his first enlistment; that on his return home after first discharge he was greatly changed and complained of rheumatism; told affiants that he contracted disability in the service; that his health having somewhat improved he again entered the service, and returned a broken-down man; informed affiants that he had not been able to perform manual labor; and since 1868 has been the worst cripple affiants ever saw, even is an object of pity.

"William C. Todd, M. D., makes affidavit that his knowledge of claimant dates from March, 1868; that he finds paralysis of left side, lower part of body, and visceral organs; that he is incapable of performing manual labor; disability caused by chronic inflammation of the spinal cord, which may have been the result of exposure in the United States Army.

"W. H. G. Griffith, M. D., makes affidavit that he has treated claimant professionally since 1870, for paralysis of left side and visceral organs; believes the disability originated from sickness, medical maltreatment, and exposure while in the United States Army; his habits good and temperate.

"Samuel Lovett, examining surgeon, reports disability, resulting from typhoid fever; paralysis, rheumatism, and spinal disease; in his opinion disability originated in the service; that one side of claimant is useless; the sphincter muscles of the anus and bladder are also paralyzed, has no power over their functions; has rheumatic symptoms; affection of spine is the result of fever.

"The records of the field hospital are not on file in office of Surgeon-General. Claimant is unable to discover the regimental surgeon.

"The committee are of the opinion that the bill should pass, and they therefore recommend the passage of the bill as amended."

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EMMA A. PORCH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4877) for the relief of Emma A. Porch.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Emma A. Porch, of Centre Town, Missouri, at the rate of $50 per month, for disability contracted while employed as a scout under the direction of general officers in command of the Union forces during the war of the rebellion.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions reported the bill with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the word "Missouri," in line 6, namely, these words:

"At the rate of $50 per month, for disability contracted while employed as a scout under the direction of general officers in command of the Union forces during the war of the rebellion."

The amendment was agreed to.

The report was read, as follows:

This committee, to whom was referred the bill of the House No. 4877, have considered the same, and finding the facts correctly reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the Forty-sixth Congress, adopt said report which shows:

"That the committee find that Mrs. Porch, during the war, was employed by the military authorities of the Federal Army as dispatch-bearer and spy; that in this capacity she was most active, and rendered important and valuable service to the Army in the Department of the Missouri. The Government recognized these services, and Congress, by special act approved June 14, 1878, paid her a moderate compensation therefor after many years of impatient waiting. The evidence submitted to the committee, from her neighbors, the county officials, and her attending physicians, abundantly establishes the fact that when she entered into the military service she was and had always been possessed of a robust constitution and perfect health; that during her said military service she was much exposed to hunger, cold, and rain; that since the war her physical strength and health have been greatly impaired, and have continued to decline, until a few years ago she was stricken with paralysis, which has partially destroyed the use of one side. She is now quite nigh helpless and unable to work, and is a subject of charity, being without any property of consequence, and in constant need of medicine and medical treatment.

"Your committee think her case appeals most strongly to the Government, which she served with such heroic spirit and fortitude in the day of its need, to help her now in her infirmity resulting from military services. No good reason is apparent for her exclusion from the bounty of the Government because she was not an enlisted soldier. Her sex prevented the enlistment, but it enabled her to gain access to the enemy, to pass safely by and through their lines, and thereby to render to the Government a service as valuable as the soldier who bore a musket."

Your committee therefore report back the bill with an amendment, to strike out all after the word "Missouri" in line 6, and thus amended recommend that it do pass.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

NEWTON BOUTWELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 5684) granting a pension to Newton Boutwell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Newton Boutwell, of Morrisville, Vermont, as a dependent father.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3127) granting a pension to Newton Boutwell, submit the following report:

This committee have considered House bill No. 3127 and find the following facts:

That the claimant, Newton Boutwell, who resides in Morrisville, in the State of Vermont, now seventy-four years of age, contributed to the Union forces in the late civil war four sons, namely, Thomas N. Boutwell and Robert T. Boutwell, both of Company D, Fourth Regiment of Vermont Volunteers; Rodney M. Boutwell, of Company F, Eleventh Regiment Vermont Volunteers; and William C. Boutwell, of the Sixteenth New Hampshire Regiment.

That the son, Thomas N. Boutwell, died of disease contracted in the service soon after the close of the war, and after his return from the Army to Vermont.

That Robert T. was wounded in the battle of the Wilderness, and died while a limb was being amputated.

That Rodney M. was also wounded in the battle of the Wilderness, and died soon after from effects of wound.

That William C. died in hospital near Baton Rouge, Louisiana, of disease contracted in the service.

That at the time of the enlistment of these boys the said Newton Boutwell was the possessor of considerable property, but was involved pecuniarily and did not call himself worth more than about one thousand dollars, which, on account of failing health and adverse circumstances, he has since wholly lost, and is now absolutely destitute, his property having been swept away by a mortgage upon it at the time of the enlistment of his said sons. That the mother of these boys died when the youngest, Rodney M., was about ten years old. That while in the service the said Rodney M. sent his father, the said Newton Boutwell, a portion of his pay, he at that time being under twenty-one years of age; and that the father, in his mind, had selected this as the son who should remain at home with him and take care of him in his old age.

The fact that at the time of the enlistment and service of these boys the said Newton Boutwell was in comfortable health and could earn a livelihood, coupled with the fact that at that time he had some property, prevents him from obtaining a pension under existing laws. But your committee, in view of the fact of the loss in the service of his four only sons, and of his present complete destitution, and the fact that the said Rodney M. did contribute to the support of his father while in the service, are compelled to look upon this as a case in which Congress may well exercise the power which it possesses and grant a pension to this applicant.

The committee recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZA HUDSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1554) granting a pension to Eliza Hudson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Eliza Hudson, widow of William L. Hudson, late a captain in the United States Navy, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month during her widowhood, in lieu of the pension she now receives, from and after the passage of this act.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill of the House No. 1554, have considered the same, and beg leave to report that the claimant, Eliza Hudson, is the widow of the late William L. Hudson, captain in the United States Navy, who died on the 15th of October, 1862, of disease contracted in the service in the line of his duty.

The claimant is now seventy-eight years of age, and has no means of support except her pension of $30 per month granted to her on the 15th of October, 1862.

The committee find that Captain Hudson entered the naval service of the United States as a midshipman January 1, 1816, and served in the navy-yard, New York, the brig Dolphin, and sloop of war Cyane until 1825; was promoted to lieutenant in 1826 and ordered to the sloop of war Warren, remaining in her a long cruise, during which he was engaged, with distinction, in the suppression of pirates in the Grecian Archipelago; was wounded during one of the engagements, receiving a bullet in one of his legs, which could not be removed, and the effect of which he felt the remainder of his life.

In 1830 he returned and was on leave of absence until 1833, when he was stationed at the New York yard, where he remained until 1838, and was then ordered to the command of the sloop of war Peacock, engaged in the United States exploring expedition, for a term of four years. November 2, 1842, was commissioned as a commander, and from 1843 to 1847 was executive officer of the navy-yard, New York, rendering efficient service and arduous duty in that position during the Mexican war.

Commanded the sloop of War Vincennes in the Pacific squadron from 1849 to 1852; was again executive officer of the navy-yard, New York, until 1856; promoted to captain September 14, 1855, and in 1856 he was detached from the yard and awaiting orders until 1857, when he was ordered to the frigate Niagara, and the command of the important expedition engaged in laying the first Atlantic submarine telegraph cable. After the successful accomplishment of this famous mission he was ordered as commandant of the naval station, Boston, and remained for three years, during which period the rebellion was at its height, and the duties performed were unusually arduous and responsible. He was detached from the Boston station April 30, 1862, and appointed light-house inspector of the New York district, on which duty he was engaged up to the time of his death.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Does this bill provide for the payment of $30 a month?

The CHAIRMAN. From the passage of the act.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. It seems by the report that this person is already receiving a pension of $30 a month. The proposition is to increase that pension to $50 a month. It seems to me that such a bill ought not to pass, unless there is some very special reason for it.

Mr. RANDALL. The death of the husband of this lady can be traced directly to disease contracted while he was in the line of his duty. This widow is a very old lady, now seventy-eight years of age. I am informed that she is in feeble health, and it is not likely that she will live much longer. She is dependent for support solely on her pension, and $30 a month is inadequate for that purpose. We have had other cases of a like character.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Do I understand that this increase takes effect only from and after the passage of this bill?

Mr. RANDALL. That is all.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I will not make any objection to it.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ELIZABETH F. RICE.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 5018) granting a pension to Elizabeth F. Rice.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Elizabeth F. Rice, of Osceola, Iowa, formerly of Mercersburgh, Franklin County, Pennsylvania, widow of Perry A. Rice, who died in Libby Prison, Richmond, Virginia, February 28, 1863, having been captured by General J. E. B. Stuart, in a raid through Pennsylvania, on the 10th day of October, 1862, and that she be paid the sum of $8 a month from the date of the death of her husband, and during her widowhood.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the words at the end of the bill "from the date of the death of her husband and during her widowhood."

The report was read, as follows:

Elizabeth F. Rice is the widow of Perry A. Rice. On the 10th day of October, 1862, when General J. E. B. Stuart made a raid on Mercersburgh, Pennsylvania, Rice was captured, with several others, and taken South and confined in Libby prison. After a confinement of five months he took sick and died. His death was the result of the exposure and hardships of his prison life. Rice was a citizen and not in the military service. He was taken and held by the confederates as a hostage to secure the safety of certain confederates held in custody by the United States. This bill puts his widow on the pension-roll at $8 per month. The committee recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment: strike out the words "from the death of her husband and during her widowhood."

The question was upon agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. HEPBURN. I hope that the amendment reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions may not be adopted. This is one of the exceptional cases which it seems to me should receive the favorable action of this committee. There is perhaps no other case like it. So far as my knowledge goes, no other case like it occurred during the whole war.

The husband of this lady was not in the military service. As the report says, he was taken prisoner by the confederate forces and held as a hostage, and during the time he was in Libby prison he died, leaving his family nearly in destitute circumstances. His wife has been able to feed and clothe his children, but not to educate them, particularly the two younger ones, unmarried girls. It seems to me this is a case in which arrearages of pension should be granted, and I hope the Committee of the Whole will take that view of it and not adopt this amendment. So far as the latter words of the clause proposed to be stricken out are concerned, I am not at all particular; but it seems to me that arrearages ought to be granted in this case.

Mr. BROWNE. I would like to have the attention of the committee while I state the facts in this case: In 1862 or 1863, during a raid of General J. E. B. Stuart into the State of Pennsylvania, this man Rice, and five or six other citizens of that State, were captured by the confederate forces and taken South by them, and held as hostages in one of the Southern prisons. During the time that Rice was thus imprisoned he took sick and died. Being a citizen, not a soldier, his widow was not entitled to receive a pension under the general pension laws.

She applied to Congress for a pension some years ago; how long ago I do not now remember. The Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House, in at least one former Congress, reported favorably upon her case, but the bill failed to pass, as bills of this character often do, for want of time to consider it.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions of this House, as is apparent from their report, have acted favorably upon this bill, although in doing so we made a clear departure from the rule to which I think we ought in the main to adhere; that is, this bill puts upon the pension-roll the widow of one who never was in the military service.

The reason why the committee did not in this case act favorably upon so much of the bill as provides arrearages of pension is this: we thought that this widow occupied no higher position certainly, and had a no more equitable claim than the widow of a soldier who had died in the military service in the line of his duty. In all such cases, where the case was not one that the Pension Office could consider and favorably act upon—and we could have jurisdiction only of such cases—I say that in all such cases the Committee on Invalid Pensions, not only during this Congress but during preceding Congresses, have refused to grant arrearages of pension. In other words we have never granted arrearages of pension in such cases by a special act of Congress. We think that where the case is one that does not come within the provisions of the general statutes upon the subject, is a case where an appeal must be made to Congress for special relief, is an exceptional case to the general rule, we do liberally by the claimant if we grant a pension to date from the passage of the act.

There is another reason that I believe I have had occasion to state before; that is, that there went on the pension-rolls before the passage of the arrearages act by Congress the names of nearly 2,000 persons, soldiers in the main, which were placed there by special acts of Congress, to which the arrearages of pension act never can apply; nor can those pensioners ever receive arrearages of pension unless their cases are covered by some general statute to be passed, or unless individual personal acts are passed for the benefit of each; which as a matter of course can never be.

I may state further in this case, for I do not desire to allude to this question again, that even where soldiers or others disabled in the service, or the surviving widows of soldiers who died in the service, or their orphan children, have been placed on the pension-rolls, both before and since the passage of the arrearages of pension act, there are hundreds and thousands of instances that were not benefited by that act at all, nor can they be.

All those who have gone on the pension-roll, or who may go on it hereafter, since the 1st day of July, 1880, I believe go on the pension-rolls without the benefit of arrearages. Of the 270,000 cases now pending in the Pension Office quite 150,000 of them, should they be pensioned under the general laws, must accept their pensions without the benefit of the arrearages act.

I think the principle ought to be adopted that where relief can be obtained only by a special act of Congress the applicant ought to accept such relief from the date of the passage of the act. If we go on granting arrearages in all these cases, I do not know where we shall stop.

Mr. DAWES. While I agree in the main with the propositions of the honorable chairman of our committee, I think they do not altogether apply to this case. It seems to me there is no question of arrearages at all where the man was not a soldier, and never had a title to a pension. The only question here is, What in justice and equity and propriety ought this Government to do? This man, a man of some property, was seized as a hostage, taken to Libby prison, and there died. The question to be considered is what relief ought to be extended to the widow in such a case. Shall we give her the pension to which she would have been entitled from the date of the death of this man if he had been a soldier? I will not presume to say exactly what the measure of relief ought to be. But it seems to me the proposition here presented might be adopted without infringing upon the ground taken by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and without impugning the principles stated by the chairman of that committee.

The amendment recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

KATE WILHARLITZ.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2910) granting a pension to Kate Wilharlitz.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Kate Wilharlitz, mother of Joseph Wilharlitz, late of the Nineteenth Regiment Regulars, United States Army, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2910) granting a pension to Kate Wilharlitz, have had the same under consideration, and report:

It appears that the said Kate Wilharlitz is the dependent mother of Joseph Wilharlitz, who enlisted as a private in Company I, Nineteenth Regiment United States Infantry, June 28, 1871, and served five years, when he was discharged by reason of expiration of term of service. In November, 1876, he re-enlisted in said service as a private in Company C, Second Regiment United States Cavalry, and was discharged therefrom on surgeon's certificate of disability, said certificate stating that he had chronic bronchitis.

Said soldier died on the 4th day of July, 1877, less than two months after discharge, and the attending physician states that his disease was consumption.

The claimant files an affidavit that when her son returned from the Army his voice was so weak and feeble it was difficult for him to give utterance to words by which his wants could be made known, and for that reason she failed to gain information from him as to the time and the circumstances when he was first attacked and the names of the witnesses by whom the necessary facts could be proved to entitle her to pension.

The fact of claimant's dependence upon her said son is clearly made out. Her husband is very aged, and she has two deaf and dumb children to support, one of whom is paralyzed.

Her claim for pension was rejected because the certificate of disability under which the soldier was discharged contained the statement that the soldier was a victim of said disease when last enlisted.

The committee are of opinion that the claimant has exhibited a right to pension, and therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

HEIRS OF KUNIGUNDA A. MILLER.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2912) granting relief to the heirs of Kunigunda A. Miller, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to John Albert, Mary Carr, (formerly Albert,) Michael Albert, and Carrie Miller, heirs-at-law of Kunigunda A. Miller, deceased, and brothers and sisters of Leonard Albert, late a private in Company F, Twenty-sixth regiment Indiana Volunteers, the arrears of pension due and heretofore authorized to be paid the said Kunigunda A. Miller, now deceased, under pension certificate numbered 129461.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2912) for the relief of the heirs of Kunigunda A. Miller, deceased, have had the same under consideration, and report:

It appears that the said Kunigunda A. Miller was the mother of Leonard Albert, who died while in the military service of the United States as a private in Company F, Twenty-sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteers. It appears that after the death of her said son Mrs. Miller applied to the Pension Office for pension, which was granted, and pension certificate No. 129461 forwarded to her; her pension to date from 15th January, 1869.

Kunigunda A. Miller afterward applied for the arrears of pension due her as "mother" aforesaid under acts of Congress of January 25 and March 4, 1879, which were also granted her, and certificate forwarded to her, (No. 129461,) but, by mistake in the Pension Office she is designated widow instead of mother, and the same was not paid on that account by the pension agent at Louisville. Before the mistake could be corrected in the Pension Office Mrs. Miller died, and the claim of her heirs for said arrears was rejected. Said arrears were at the rate of $8 per month from August 30, 1863, till January 14, 1869.

It is fully shown that John Albert, Mary Carr, (formerly Mary Albert,) Michael Albert, and Carrie Miller are the children and heirs at law of said Kunigunda A. Miller, and brothers and sisters of said soldier.

The committee think that the said heirs are entitled to the arrears due their mother, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

GEORGE J. WEBB.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2349) granting an increase of pension to George J. Webb.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George J. Webb, late of the One hundredth New York Volunteers, for increase of pension to $20 per month.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2349) granting an increase of pension to George J. Webb, has had the same under consideration, and begs leave to submit the following report:

The petitioner was a soldier of the One hundredth New York Volunteers, and is now the recipient of a pension of $12 per month, granted for a grapeshot wound in the head, received at the storming of Fort Wagner, causing deafness in the left ear, partial loss of vision in the left eye, and cerebral disturbances.

Since the issuance of his pension certificate for $12, granted for causes stated above, the petitioner, having totally lost the sight of his left eye, made application to the Pension Office for an increase of pension on account of the loss of his left eye. The examining surgeons of the Pension Office state that the loss of the eye is the direct result of the grapeshot wound in the head, received in the line of duty.

The Commissioner of Pensions rejected the claim, after a careful examination of the facts in the case and the medical questions involved, on the ground that $12 per month was the full rate of pension he was entitled to under the law for the degree of disability existing from wound in the head, (including the loss of the left eye.)

The medical examination had, under the rejected claim for increase, shows the following disabilities: grapeshot wound of left side of face and head; missile entered left side of face, fracturing the molar bone, and removing one-half of the helix and antihelix of left ear, and causing total blindness of left eye, and total deafness of left ear; cicatrices adherent.

There is some deformity of face and loss of motion in muscles. Sight of right eye considerably impaired, probably due to sympathetic irritation.

It is evident that the disability in this case is greater than that recognized by the Pension Office, and therefore the committee reports favorably on the bill, and asks that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

PATRICK SULLIVAN.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1873) for the relief of Patrick Sullivan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension from $18 to $30 per month of Patrick Sullivan, late of Company K, Eighty-second Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, for loss of left leg just below the knee, rendering him helpless as though his limb were amputated above the knee, and also for rupture on the left side, which wholly incapacitate him for the performance of manual labor.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1873) for the relief of Patrick Sullivan, has had the same under consideration, and begs leave to submit the following report:

Sullivan is a pensioner at $18 per month for loss of leg below the knee. He applied for increase June 29, 1880, on account of hernia, alleged to have been contracted by assisting in lifting wagons at the battle of Fredericksburgh, Virginia. The Pension Office, without affording the claimant an opportunity to establish the claim for the additional disability, rejected the application for increase on the ground that the loss of leg and rupture combined, if the latter were shown to be due to the service, would not disqualify the soldier for the performance of "any manual labor," as required by statute, to give title to a higher rate of pension than that now received by Sullivan.

The petitioner has appeared before this committee, and an examination of the amputated limb "shows that he suffered amputation in the upper third of the left leg, leaving a short stump, which, owing to muscular contraction, is constantly and strongly flexed, and cannot therefore have any artificial limb adapted to it in the usual manner, but the weight of the body in standing rests upon the flexed knee and stump, causing painful irritation and excoriation of the parts." His limb is consequently in even a worse condition than if the limb had been amputated above the knee. He also suffers from inguinal hernia, and, in the opinion of your committee, is entitled to additional pension on that account; and it is therefore recommended that the bill be so amended as to entitle him to increase of pension to $28 per month from and after its passage.

The question being taken on the amendment recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to reduce the proposed pension from $30 to $28 per month, it was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ARTHUR W. IRWING.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3048) granting a pension to Arthur W. Irwing.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Arthur W. Irwing, late a private in Company C, One hundred and fourth Regiment of New York Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3048) granting a pension to Arthur W. Irwing, have considered the same, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Irwing enlisted May 30, 1861, in the Seventeenth Regiment New York Volunteers, and was discharged January 22, 1862, on surgeon's certificate of disability because of chronic rheumatism, which, according to the surgeon's certificate, had distorted the neck. He re-enlisted March 18, 1862, in Company C, One hundred and fourth New York, and served in that command and the Veteran Reserve Corps until September 5, 1866. It is not very clear from the papers on file when he was transferred to the latter organization; but as a cause for transfer "stiff neck" appears on the rolls. He applied for pension September 7, 1868, on account of curvature of spine, which he alleges followed an attack of typhoid fever in August 1862.

The claim has been rejected by the Pension Office because the record shows the existence of rheumatism, which is accepted as cause for present disability, prior to the service in which its origin is alleged. The claimant's soundness at time of his original enlistment is fully established; that he was attacked with typhoid fever and sent to hospital is also shown by the testimony of comrades, as well as his suffering from rheumatism shortly after recovery. There is record evidence of his admission to the hospital about the time alleged by claimant, and at different times thereafter, but, strange to say, the nature of the disease for which treated is not shown by the records of the several hospitals. In explanation of the record of his first service, claimant states and shows by the testimony of the surgeon of the One hundred and fourth Regiment New York Volunteers, that he was free from rheumatism at the time of his enlistment in said regiment, but that while in said first service he contracted jaundice and swelled neck, from which he thought he had recovered when he re-enlisted.

Medical examination by the Dayton, Ohio, board of surgeons finds that claimant is suffering from rheumatism. His head is thrown forward very much and is permanently fixed in that position. Cannot move his head without moving his entire body. Has considerable lateral curvature of spine, is emaciated, and totally disqualified for performing any manual labor.

In the opinion of the committee the evidence is conclusive that the soldier was sound when he entered the service; that he contracted his disease while in service and, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, it must be presumed, in line of duty; and that he has been disabled continuously since discharge; they therefore report favorably on the bill, and recommend its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

SOLOMON J. GRISSON.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 435) granting a pension to Solomon J. Grisson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Solomon J. Grisson, late a corporal of Company E, Twentieth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 435) granting a pension to Solomon J. Grisson, has had the same under consideration, and begs leave to submit the following report:

Grisson enlisted November 7, 1861, in Company E, Twentieth Kentucky Volunteers, was mustered January 6, 1862, and discharged January 17, 1865. His claim for pension on account of lung disease, resulting from measles contracted shortly after enlistment, was rejected by the Pension Office because there is no record of alleged disability, and the claimant is unable to furnish the evidence required under the rules governing the adjudication of pension claims.

An examination of the papers filed in the Pension Office shows that considerable evidence has been filed in support of the claim, which, in the opinion of the committee, is entitled to consideration. That claimant was sound at enlistment is clearly shown by the testimony of his neighbors and of the lieutenant of the company. The latter also testifies that Grisson contracted measles before the regiment was fully organized, took cold, and thereafter appeared to be troubled with disease of lungs and chest. Neighbors testify that upon his return from service the claimant was ailing and unable to do full or heavy work. In August, 1866, he came under the treatment of Dr. F. J. Sullivan for disease of both lungs, as appears from the latter's affidavit. Examination had by a Pension Office surgeon shows the existence of lung disease.

The inability of the claimant to furnish the affidavit of the regimental surgeon as to treatment for measles in service is explained by one of the officers of the company, who testifies that he has tried, in the interest of other members of the company to get up correspondence with the surgeon, but has failed to receive any reply.

Believing that Grisson had measles in service, as testified by the lieutenant, and that subsequent exposure resulted in disease of the lungs, from which he is still suffering, the committee reports favorably on accompanying bill, and recommends its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

JACOB R. M'FARREN.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 369) granting a pension to Jacob R. McFarren.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jacob R. McFarren, late a private in Company F of the Eighty-sixth Regiment of Illinois Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 369) granting a pension to Jacob R. McFarren, has had the same under consideration, and begs leave to submit the following report:

The said McFarren was a private in Company F, Eighty-sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, from August 11, 1862, till discharged for disability, February 12, 1863.

The certificate of disability sets forth that the soldier is unable to perform military duty because of hydropericardium. In his application for pension, McFarren alleges that while in said service and in line of duty, in November, 1862, after forced marching under General Buell, around Louisville, Kentucky, then to Crab Orchard, Kentucky, and immediately after battle of Perryville, Kentucky, he broke down, and as soon as he reached Camp Edgefield, Tennessee, his legs turned purple and swollen and spotted, and he was sent to hospital barracks at Gallatin, Tennessee, when he took bloody piles and dropsy of chest; the swelling of his legs resulted in erysipelas, which has afflicted him ever since, and the piles have become worse. He states that he cannot find his officers and procure their testimony.

The claim was rejected because the Commissioner of Pensions was of opinion that the disability was not incident to claimant's Army service.

Two of claimant's comrades in the service testify that they knew him for three years before his enlistment; that he had always been a sound man physically so far as they knew; that in October, 1862, he broke down on the march to Nashville, and had to be hauled to Camp Edgefield. His legs were spotted and badly swollen; had rheumatism and diarrhea also. Saw him after the war, and he was worse.

R. A. Moore, a comrade in the service, says claimant was sound when enlisted; that claimant broke down in October, 1862, on the march to Nashville; legs spotted and swollen; had rheumatism and diarrhea; limbs broke out with erysipelas, and was sent to hospital at Gallatin; and up to 1870, when affiant last knew him, claimant was still suffering from said diseases.

William M. Reed states that he saw claimant immediately after his return from the Army in 1863. He was then a used-up man, and suffering from erysipelas of legs, diarrhea, piles, and rheumatism.

Dr. P. J. Jennings testifies that he began to treat claimant for abscess, hemorrhoids, and chronic rheumatism in December, 1874; that the abscess yielded to treatment, but not the other diseases. They were only palliated. Claimant is not able to perform more than one-fourth manual labor. The doctor states that he had dropsy also, but had recovered therefrom, and that his habits are good.

Dr. H. T. Cooper testifies that he has known claimant since June, 1877, when he began to treat him for bloody piles and dropsy; that claimant had also suffered since that time from rheumatism.

P. N. Terwilliger testifies soldier was sound when enlisted; since his return from service has had erysipelas, piles, diarrhea, and rheumatism.

There is a great mass of other testimony, professional and lay, all of which is to the same effect as the above.

James P. Dimmuth, examining surgeon, certified September 24, 1878, that claimant is wholly incapacitated for obtaining his sustenance by manual labor, and continues: "I find claimant suffering from external and internal bleeding hemorrhoids, which render him a great sufferer." He says further: "I learn that he has had erysipelas and dropsy, but find no disease at present except that above rated."

Claimant has been unable to ascertain the wherabouts of his officers, or the regimental surgeon who first treated him, therefore cannot furnish the evidence required by the Pension Office. Unfortunately the medical records of the regiment or of the hospital at Gallatin, Tennessee, in which he was treated, as shown by the report of the Adjutant-General, are not on file in the proper department.

In the opinion of the committee there is ample proof that the petitioner was a sound man at enlistment; that he contracted diseases by reason of the exposures incident to a campaign, and that by reason of said diseases he has been to a great extent disqualified for the performance of manual labor ever since discharge, and therefore reports favorably on the bill, and asks that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

HENRY STRAWBRIDGE.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 240) granting an increase of pension to Henry Strawbridge.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c, That Henry Strawbridge, late a private in Company G, One hundred and thirteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, be, and he is hereby, granted and allowed, from and after the passage of this act, a pension at the rate of $24 per month; and the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of said Henry Strawbridge on the pension-roll at said rate, (in lieu of the pension now paid him.)

Mr. JOYCE. In each of the cases thus far considered, the report has been read; and the Committee of the Whole can thus understand how carefully the cases have been considered by the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I suggest that hereafter the reports be printed in the RECORD without reading, unless in some particular case some member desires the reading of the report.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I wish to hear the report read in this case. The bill is for an increase of pension.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 240) granting an increase of pension to Henry Strawbridge, have had the same under consideration, and submit as part of its report the report of the Committee on Pensions, United States Senate, in the case, as follows:

"The applicant is now receiving a pension, for anchylosis of the knee joint, at the rate of $18 per month, the rate allowed by general law. He desires an increase of his pension to $24 per month, the rate allowed by the law for loss of leg above the knee.

"The evidence shows the disability at the knee, in addition to absolute stiffening of the joint, to be attended with constant pain and acute tenderness, compelling constant care in the movement of the limb to avoid contact with obstacles of any description, thus apparently creating in this case a greater disability than if the limb had been amputated. The evidence is quite full and explicit, showing that the applicant is often confined to his room and bed for days together, by reason of severe pain in the knee, and that the well limb has become much affected because the heavy weight of his body is so constantly supported by it. The case is peculiar, and, we think, much worse than the ordinary disability occasioned either by loss of limb below the knee or permanent stiffness of that joint."

Some doubts as to the origin of the disability having arisen, the committee have examined all the papers on file in the Pension Office in support of the case, and find that upon information adverse to the soldier's title to pension three special examinations were had; the last one, in April, 1878, settling satisfactorily the question of title, as appears from the indorsement made by the then chief of the invalid division, in words as follows:

"The case has a doubtful look as to origin, but as three investigations have failed to obtain anything adverse, and the right to pension has been twice conceded, I think we can let the case rest. The charges against it have evidently been induced by malice, caused by political enmity."

The conclusions reached by the Pension Office on the evidence before them are evidently sustained, and this committee therefore report favorably on the bill, and recommend that it do pass, as nothing sufficient to place in question the deliberate and carefully-guarded action of the Pension Office has been made to appear before them.

Mr. BROWNE. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that serious reflections as to the propriety of allowing this pension came to the ears of the members of the committee. I know they came to mine, and I entered upon its investigation. I thought the claim from what I heard of it ought not to be allowed. Not only the sub-committee which reported to the full committee examined all the testimony in the case, but I examined it very carefully myself, although I was not on the sub-committee. I think this report is abundantly supported by the testimony. I think there is no doubt about it, although I thought at the time the investigation was begun that it was a case where there ought not to be favorable action.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MICHAEL MARION.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1243) granting a pension to Michael Marion.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, at the rate of $15 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Michael Marion, late a private in Company A, First New York Volunteers, on account of injuries received and incurred in the Army of the United States and the military service thereof.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1243) granting a pension to Michael Marion, has had the same under consideration, and begs leave to submit the following report:

Marion is a pensioner at $8 per month for gunshot wound of right thigh, received near Alexandria, Virginia, February 2, 1862. At the same time and place his horse fell on him and knocked his hip out of joint. For the latter disability claimant was treated in hospital, but no rating therefor was made by the Pension Office. He applied for increase September 3, 1880, but his application was rejected. The certificate of the examining surgeon shows that the ball struck the left front and passed through the right thigh near its middle, fracturing the femur. Union ensued, leaving a forward curvature of the bone, with considerable enlargement. Owing, doubtless, to the hurt of the muscles, their consequent contraction and agglutination, the knee is partially but firmly flexed, which, with the injury at the hip joint—now a partial dislocation—makes the case a grave one. The leg is about two inches short, and as he stands the right foot rests obliquely across the instep of the left one, indicating clearly the character of the hip hurt.

The disability as above described is, in the opinion of the committee, greater than recognized to be by the present rating, and, therefore, it recommends that the word "fifteen" be inserted after the word "of," in line 5 of the bill, and that the bill thus perfected do pass.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES B. WHITE.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1341) granting a pension to James B. White.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of James B. White, late a private in Company B, Sixty-second Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, on the invalid-pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I do not ask for the reading of the report, although I did ask for the reading of the reports in these cases in the beginning. For myself, after listening to every one of those which have been read, I think the House owe to the Committee on Invalid Pensions an acknowledgment of the exact and careful performance of its duties; and relying on that, as I think the House well may, I do not ask the reports to be read, but think they should be printed in the RECORD to go along with each case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be so ordered.

The report of the committee is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1341) granting a pension to James B. White, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to submit the following report:

The committee find, from an examination of the papers originally on file in the pension claim at the Pension Office, that the petitioner was a private of Company B, Sixty-second Ohio Volunteers; that he enlisted October 4, 1861, and was discharged October 28, 1862. His declaration for pension was filed August 1, 1876, he alleging that at the battle of Winchester, Virginia, March 23, 1862, he bruised his leg by a fall on a rock fence while marching up hill, from the effects of which injury his leg has been amputated above the knee. The claim was rejected October 20, 1877, on the ground of "no record of alleged injury; inability to furnish necessary testimony."

Your committee find that there is no record of treatment in the service and no medical evidence of soundness or treatment to date of amputation. Date of amputation of leg, March 29, 1876. The petitioner, in an affidavit to the Pension Office, October 23, 1876, said that he was never treated in any hospital for the disability, but was treated by the surgeon of the regiment, Dr. Hood, who is now dead. He further swears that he cannot furnish medical evidence as to freedom from the injury at enlistment, because of the death of his family physician; nor can he furnish medical evidence as to his condition from date of discharge for the same reason, the death of his family physician. The only evidence he can furnish is that of his neighbors, which he asks may be accepted in lieu of medical testimony.

The testimony of neighbors who knew and had employed the petitioner prior to his enlistment is thorough as to the fact of the petitioner's soundness at the time he enlisted in the Army. One of the affiants states that he had had the soldier in his employ for twelve years prior to his enlistment, and that he was thoroughly sound when he went into the Army, and had no affection of his legs whatever.

Lieutenant Kohler, of the petitioner's company and regiment, swears that at the battle of Winchester, while the regiment was marching upon the enemy, March 29, 1862, the petitioner, in climbing a stone fence, fell and injured his left knee; that since that time, to affiant's knowledge, the knee continuously grew worse until amputation was rendered necessary.

Dr. Charles P. Hildreth, who amputated the limb, says that he—

"Commenced visiting the petitioner in 1876, and found him suffering a great deal of pain in the left knee; joint opened in two or three points and discharging a large quantity of pus; very much enlarged bones composing the joint carious or necrosed, and the structure of the joint disorganized. An effort was made to save the limb for two or three months. It became evident that he must lose his life or limb, and the limb was amputated March 29, 1876."

He further states that—

"The petitioner said to him that he was a cooper by trade and that he had mined coal for two years before he lost his leg, and that the disease in the joint was aggravated by getting cold and wet in the coal bank; that the joint had never been well or sound since he received the original injury at Winchester, Virginia."

The testimony of comrades is that while marching on quick time at the battle of Winchester the petitioner endeavored to cross a stone fence and fell and injured his knee, the comrades making this sworn statement alleging that they were in the rear rank immediately behind the petitioner and saw him when he fell and hurt himself; that they had a knowledge of the continuous and progressive nature of the disease up to the time his leg was amputated. The certificate of disability upon which the petitioner was discharged the service is signed by Dr. Charles H. Hood, the regimental surgeon, and finds him "incapable of performing the duties of a soldier because of his suffering from varicocele enlargement of the epididymis and testicle, both sides being affected, and is the result of exposure and hard living while serving in the pioneer corps of Shield's division."

The evidence proves conclusively to your committee that this soldier contracted the disease of the knee in the service which led to its amputation, although he is unable, through the lapse of time, removal, &c., to present to the Pension Office the necessary evidence required by the rules governing the adjudication of pension claims. The petitioner has filed some additional evidence before this committee corroborative of the statements heretofore made in the case.

After due consideration of all the evidence presented the committee are of opinion that the petitioner is entitled to relief, and therefore report favorably upon the bill and recommend that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

NATHANIEL J. COFFIN.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3000) granting a pension to Nathaniel J. Coffin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nathaniel J. Coffin, as first lieutenant of Company K, Thirteenth Regiment of New Hampshire Volunteers, war of the rebelion.

The report of the committee is as follows:

Lieutenant Nathaniel Johnson Coffin has served his country in two wars. May 4, 1847, at Fort Adams, Newport, Rhode Island, he enlisted as Nathaniel Johnson in Captain John H. Jackson's Company H, Ninth Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, for the Mexican war. He served as a private until the war ended, and received a medal for gallant conduct at the storming of Chapultepec. An honorable discharge was given him August 2, 1848. Lieutenant Coffin again enlisted, September 27, 1862, as a private in Company K, (Captain M. T. Betton,) Thirteenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers, to serve in the late rebellion. He was promoted to be first lieutenant of said Company K early in 1863. Afterward, in May, 1863, while stationed with his company on the banks of the Nansemond River, in Virginia, to check the enemy's advance on Norfolk, he received a wound on the skull, which probably caused a pressure of bone on the brain. Captain Betton certifies in relation thereto as follows:

"I hereby certify that Nathaniel J. Coffin was wounded on his head by a piece of shell, or glance round shot, in the first week in May, 1863, in a picket fight in front of Portsmouth, Virginia, while officer of the guard against confederate General Longstreet's advance. Mr. Coffin was in my command, and was promoted to first lieutenant but two months previous to his being wounded."

This wound, it is claimed, induced severe and continued pains in the head, mental confusion, and a partial loss of memory for several years. At any rate, in consequence thereof Lieutenant Coffin resigned his command, and was honorably discharged June 9, 1863, at Fortress Monroe.

In 1871 he joined the Polaris expedition; served on board the Polaris as ship's carpenter from June 1, 1871, to November 10, 1875, and during this expedition, in common with his comrades, suffered very great hardships.

The records of the War Department fail to show that the claimant was wounded, as testified to by himself and Captain Betton, and his application for a pension has been rejected on the ground that "the claimant seems to be unable to furnish such testimony as to justify this office in taking favorable action in the premises." Lieutenant Coffin is now an old man, in feeble health, and very poor. Without questioning the propriety of the decision at the Pension Bureau and the evidence there filed, your committee are of the opinion that this aged veteran's unquestioned patriotism and gallant conduct, by imperiling his life for his country in two great wars, and by enduring even greater peril and more severe exposure in the Polaris expedition, is fairly entitled, in his old age and poverty, to receive a gratuity pension for the few remaining years of his life.

We therefore recommend the passage of the bill, amended as follows: Strike out "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," in fourth and fifth lines. Add, at the end of eighth line, "at the rate of $12 per month."

The amendment of the committee to strike out the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," and, in line 8, to add, "at the rate of $12 per month," was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS ALLCOCK.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1188) granting a pension to Thomas Allcock.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place the name of Thomas Allcock, a private in Company F, Third Artillery, during the Florida war, upon the invalid pension roll, at the rate of $8 per month, from the 1st day of July, 1852, and to continue during his natural life.

The report of the committee is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1188) granting a pension to Thomas Allcock, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to submit the following report:

It appears that the petitioner is an invalid soldier of the Seminole war, having served as private, Company F, Third United States Artillery, and honorably discharged after three years' service. He applied for pension in 1852, and was informed that claim was not admissible on the proof under general law. On the 21st of June, 1872, there appears to have been an application filed by him alleging "that he served in said Florida war three years; that he received a sunstroke while in said service, and while on duty as sentry on the 6th day of July, 1839; and that Thomas Haley, mentioned in the annexed affidavit, was present at the time; that in consequence of such sunstroke he was totally blind for six days, and has lost the sight of one eye entirely; that a written discharge was granted him by Major Thomas Childs, at Fort Pierce, Florida, which is in the Department at Washington, filed on application for bounty-land."

The Adjutant-General's Office reports him sick in hospital at the time alleged by him; and there is ample proof in the case to show that it is a just and meritorious one, well worthy of consideration.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, House of Representatives, reported favorably in the case as far back as February 4, 1858, and say then:

"For this permanent injury to his eyes, rendering them perfectly useless for the remainder of his life, received in the service of his country, the committee think he is justly entitled, in some degree, to the consideration of the Government."

Your committee at this time heartily renew this recommendation and recommend the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1188) granting a pension to Thomas Allcock.

The amendment of the committee to strike out "1st day of July, 1852, and to continue during his natural life," and in lieu thereof to insert "passage of this act" was agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES K. STURTEVANT.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1373) granting a pension to James K. Sturtevant.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James K. Sturtevant, late a private in Company B, First Regiment Oregon Mounted Volunteers in the Indian war of 1855 and 1856, for wounds received in action; and that he be paid a pension at the rate of $8 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The report of the committee is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1373) granting a pension to James K. Sturtevant, having had the same under consideration submit the following report:

This claim has been under investigation in the Pension Department, and on the 6th of March, 1880, was rejected on the ground that "claimant was not in the United States service so as to entitle him to a pension under the pension laws."

An examination of the evidence presented to the committee establishes the following state of facts:

First. It is shown by letter of Second Auditor, dated Washington, District of Columbia, 1879, that James K. Sturtevant enrolled October 18, 1855, in Captain O. Humason's Company, B, First Regiment Oregon Mounted Volunteers, and was discharged May 19, 1856, as per General Order No. 32, of that date, and that he performed further service in Captain A. V. Williams's Company, Oregon Mounted Volunteers, from January 18 to August 11, 1856, as shown by the records of the War Department.

Second. James M. Kelley, one of the supreme judges of Oregon, under oath, states that in 1855 he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the First Regiment of Oregon Mounted Volunteers, and as such officer was in command of five companies of that regiment, including Company B, Captain Orlando Humason; that James K. Sturtevant was a private in said Company B; and that on the 7th day of December, 1855, an engagement took place with hostile Indians along the Walla Walla Valley, in Washington Territory, in which said Sturtevant was dangerously wounded—so dangerous that the surgeon of the regiment reported he could not recover; that he was sent to hospital and finally recovered; that the said Sturtevant was wounded in said engagement, in the line of his duty, by a gunshot in his breast; and that the captain and first lieutenant of said Company B are both dead.

Third. James McAuliff, on oath, states that he was second lieutenant of Company B, in said regiment, and further fully corroborates the statement of Lieutenant-Colonel James M. Kelley.

Fourth. Stoey Hemenway, M. D., upon oath, states that he had, under an appointment from the Pension Department, personally examined James K. Sturtevant, an applicant for pension, and certified that he had been wounded by a gunshot in right breast, passing through body, which incapacitates him for performance of heavy manual labor.

Fifth. It further appears from the records of the War Department that the First Regiment of Oregon Mounted Volunteers were called into service by order of the governor of Oregon to quell Indian disturbances, and that they were afterward paid by the United States under act of March 2, 1861, granting them the same pay and allowances as regular troops.

The foregoing are the facts, and may be regarded as showing clearly a meritorious case.

It seems the Pension Department, in construing the act of March 2, 1861, have held the term in said act "and allowances" does not include pensions, and for that reason alone have rejected this claim. Without inquiry, or any expression of opinion as to the correctness of that decision, we have no hesitation in saying the records and the proofs submitted to us show that this is a just and meritorious claim, and that the claimant, Mr. Sturtevant, is entitled to a pension.

We therefore respectfully return the bill, with a favorable report, and do recommend its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELISA A. MURRAY.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1336) granting a pension to Elisa A. Murray, reported adversely.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elisa A. Murray, dependent mother of Dwight E. Murray, late a private in the Ninth Ohio Battery.

Mr. MOREY. I ask that the adverse report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1336) granting a pension to Elisa A. Murray, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

The committee find, from an examination of the papers on file in the original pension claim at the Pension Office, that the petitioner is the mother of Dwight E. Murray, who was a private in the Ninth Ohio Battery, and who was killed while in the service; that he enlisted October 11, 1861, and died September 17, 1863. The mother's application was filed November 10, 1878, and was rejected by the Pension Office August 6, 1879, on the ground that the soldier at the time he was killed was not in the line of duty.

The evidence in the case shows the dependence of the mother upon the soldier and his contributions to her support. The Adjutant-General's report in the case reports him absent without leave since September 17, 1863, supposed to have been captured by guerrillas. He was afterward marked as a deserter on subsequent rolls. The evidence of officers and comrades on file in the case shows that the soldier with one or two comrades started out with the implied permission of their officers upon a foraging expedition while the company was encamped near Tullahoma, Tennessee; that while out upon such an expedition they were killed by bushwhackers, their bodies found, but no record made of their death on the company rolls. Lieutenant Cowles, of the company, states that the soldier came to his tent with one John Wilson, a comrade, and said they were going foraging in the country. The officer further states that he loaned to the deceased soldier his revolver and that they took with them two good horses. Comrades of the deceased soldier state that they had personal knowledge of the deceased and his comrade Wilson starting out on the foraging hunt, and that it was with the implied permission of their officers; that such permission had been allowed to the men of the command very frequently, and that they did not deem it any transgression of orders, inasmuch as their absence was with the full knowledge of the officers of the company. They further show that the soldier was killed while on this expedition, having been shot by bushwhackers, or guerrillas, with whom the immediate country was infested.

In the absence of a record that the soldier was away with leave, the Pension Officer rejected the claim.

The death of the soldier is fully proven, and also the fact that his absence from camp was known to his officers and with their implied permission.

A majority of the committee in this case recommended that the bill be reported adversely.

Mr. MOREY. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, in support of my motion that this bill be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation, that the report of the committee in this case discloses the fact that this soldier, who lost his life on this occasion, had been in the military service of his country for a period of two years. The report also discloses the fact that he left a mother, to whom he had contributed support and who was dependent upon him for that support. The fact is further disclosed that the Pension Office rejected the application for a pension on the ground that the record of the military history of this soldier did not show he was absent with leave at the time he lost his life.

Now, sir, it is within the knowledge of many gentlemen who are present here to-night in this committee, rigid discipline was enforced in our Army at that period.

It is well known, sir, that at that time our army, and this army to which this soldier belonged, was in the midst of the enemy's country; and that the soldiers were dependent in some degree at least for their subsistence upon the forage they could take in that country. This report shows that this soldier had gone from his camp as many other soldiers had done with the leave, knowledge, and consent of the officer in command; that while out on this foraging expedition, perhaps to get some necessaries for himself and comrades, and perhaps for the very officer who had loaned him his pistol to forage in the enemy's country, he lost his life. Now, sir, I think in view of the fact that this widowed mother had given her son to the service of the country, and that he lost his life while in the service, the mere fact that he had gone from his camp only a short distance, without a written order permitting him so to go, ought not to deprive that dependent mother of the support which she lost by his death. Sir, we have this very evening laid aside for favorable report to the House a bill granting a pension to a man who never was in the military service of the United States at all. It seems to me that the case of this soldier appeals more strongly to the equity and justice of this Government than the case to which I have referred. In that case the action of the House is a mere gratuity; in the case of an enlisted soldier, of one who had entered the military service, and was killed or disabled, the granting of a pension rests upon an implied if not an expressed agreement to care for the widows and the orphans of those who lost their lives.

For this reason I move you that the bill be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, this case is briefly this: the claimant is the dependent mother of a soldier who was killed when foraging upon the country not in the line of his military duty. It is clear that he might have been foraging and also in the line of duty, as foraging parties were often regularly detailed and sent into the country for the purpose of securing supplies. He was not thus detailed. He was not absent in pursuance of an order of a superior officer. It is said in the report that he was absent by the implied consent of his captain, who had loaned him, at the time he developed his purpose to go out foraging, his pistol. That may be an implied permission to go, but it is not an order to go; it is not a detail to go.

Mr. McMILLIN. Nor a legal permission.

Mr. BROWNE. It is not a permission to go in military contemplation. The Pension Bureau——

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question in this connection. Suppose it were actually the fact that he had permission, not that the permission was only implied; let us understand how the law would be as applied by the Pension Office. Did he have permission to go on this expedition, and if he had permission, would he, under the practice of the office, be entitled to a pension?

Mr. BROWNE. I will answer the question. The mere fact that the officer allowed him to go, being informed of his purpose to go, or permitted him to go, would not have put him in the line of duty to give him a pension.

Mr. DAWES. Would he not have been absent with leave?

Mr. BROWNE. There is a very great difference between absence from command with leave, and absence from command for the purpose of engaging in a willful disobedience of existing military orders a great, a grave difference. The captain, his commanding officer, could not authorize him to go in violation of a military rule——

Mr. DAWES. In Sherman's army that marched down to the sea?

Mr. BROWNE. I answer the question that in the opinion of a majority of the Committee on Invalid Pensions no worse precedent could be established than to offer a premium to that great source of demoralization—irregular, illegal foraging. My friend, the gentleman from Ohio, knows, as all know who were in the military service, that there is nothing which so demoralizes the Army as this irregular and illegal foraging. I am not here to say that foraging is not only permissible, but right. It ought to be done extensively in the enemy's country, but it ought to be done under rules and regulations.

Mr. HORR. It was generally neglected.

Mr. BROWNE. No, sir; it was not generally neglected. In this case it was nothing more than this, that the soldier and those with him were absent, with knowledge, it is true, according to the testimony, of the captain of the company. But they were absent in indiscriminate foraging in the country, and invited their own fate.

Mr. STEELE. I would ask my colleague if this man was not absent with leave for the express purpose of foraging?

Mr. BROWNE. No, sir. The very best that can be said in the case—and it is said very strongly in the report—is that he went to the tent where his captain was and announced his purpose to go on a foraging expedition, and he and his comrades went. It is not pretended they were detailed. It is not pretended there was any necessity for the expedition.

Mr. STEELE. Was not that a usual way of getting permission?

Mr. BROWNE. I do not know how it was in that portion of the Army in which my friend served so long and so well. I know in the branch of the service to which I belonged there was the strictest possible rule on that subject. No soldier was to go foraging unless he was regularly detailed and put under the command either of a commissioned or a non-commissioned officer. And to say in reference to soldiers who while in camp left their command and went out into the country to forage—whether from friend or enemy makes but little difference—to say under such circumstances when they dared their fate, as all of them knew they were doing when they went to a distance from their camp, and were killed in that way—to say that those who were dependent on them for support are to be pensioned is simply to invite willful disobedience of military authority, and that kind of disobedience I undertake to say that utterly destroys the discipline of an army; and when there is no discipline there is in fact no army.

Mr. DAWES. I am not aware of any armies to be demoralized by this precedent if it should be established, or of any danger to military discipline threatening or imminent at this time.

This soldier, as the honorable chairman of the committee has said, was out with the clearly implied permission of his officers, where it was the universal custom for the soldiers of the Army to go out upon such expeditions. And the honorable gentleman beside me, [Mr. HEPBURN,] who was himself at Tullahoma, Tennessee, informs me that those details were seldom made. And as the honorable gentleman on my left [Mr. MOREY] has said, at that time the army was in a starving condition. If there was any want of discipline who was to blame? The officers commanding that army, and the captain and lieutenants of the company to which this party that went out belonged. This soldier went out and was killed by the enemies of his country, by the greys. They were in the immediate vicinity of his camp, and he may have had a more formal order to go out than appears here in the record. I should think it probable he had from the information that has come to me.

Now, I think, sir, that this poor widow of that heroic soldier who lost his life at the hands of the enemy of his country ought to have this little pension which she has lost from the time of his death until now. I think the Congress of the United States can do that for her and do no more than justice, and not injure the discipline of any army we have now or that future generations may have.

Mr. PEELLE. So great is my confidence in the Committee on Invalid Pensions that I would be willing to vote for the allowance of a claim they might recommend. I believe in this case that this pension ought to be allowed. We cannot ignore the facts that occurred while we were in the Army. I very well remember that at one time when I was in the Army if we had not violated general military orders and gone on a foraging expedition I would most likely have starved to death. That was after the battle of Pea Ridge, and it was when we picked up corn out of the horse-rack. No general permission was ever given that I know of by a commander of an army for general foraging. It was always in violation of general military orders. Nevertheless it was done.

If this man was absent without leave I apprehend if he were to apply to Congress for relief, for the correction of his record, we would perhaps vote to direct the Secretary of War to grant him that relief. And now, Mr. Chairman, whether he was absent by the permission of his officer, implied or not, we must remember that soldiers very seldom went foraging unless they were in search of something to eat; and especially would that be true, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DAWES,] if he were in the midst of traitors. This soldier went on a foraging expedition, and so far as this case is concerned, say he was absent without leave and in the pursuit of something to eat, and he was murdered or killed. It seems to me that the mother dependent upon him for support should have the benefit of the pension which would have been accorded to him had he been in the direct line of duty.

I am inclined to believe the Committee on Invalid Pensions have only made the report they have for the reason of the dangerous precedent which they think it may establish; but I do not believe there are enough of this class of cases to make the precedent dangerous, and for that reason I sincerely hope that the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOREY] will prevail and that this bill will be reported to the House favorably.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. I desire to say only a word or two in reference to this matter. It seems to me that this report should have accompanied a recommendation for a pension, because if it shows anything it proves conclusively that this soldier was absent, not by implied but by express permission. He came to the tent of his officer with one of his comrades, and said he was going out on a foraging expedition. Did the officer forbid him? Instead of that, he gave him permission. How? By taking his revolver and loaning it to him, and allowing them to take two of his horses.

On general principles, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to drawing any fine distinctions of this kind against the needy mother of a dead soldier. Oh, it is all very well for us who have plenty here now and comfort and ease and all we want to eat to talk about the violation of military orders by foragers!

Why, Mr. Chairman, it was continually the only way that the soldier had to obtain the means to live. And when he came back to camp, this officer expected to have part of the forage that he procured. It seems to me it is an outrage to draw the line where it is proposed to be drawn here, when the soldier went with the permission of his officer, and carrying the revolver of his officer. If he could have permission, that was a permission.

As almost every man knows who was in the service, it was not at all likely that a soldier who did not need something to eat would go foraging in September, 1863, in Tennessee, in the condition that State was in at that time, filled with bushwhackers ready to take the life of every Union soldier, to shoot him down in his tracks. No, sir, it was a dangerous business. And the kind of men who were ready to risk their lives in that way, to invite danger, as the chairman of the committee has said, the kind of men who were ready to risk their lives in foraging were men who generally were ready the next day to stand in the front ranks when the fighting came. And the men who were not ready to forage were the men who the next day were sick or skulking in the rear.

I had not intended to say a word about this, but I would be ashamed to sit here and hear the character of a private soldier stigmatized when he had the permission of his officer to go out on this expedition, when he took the revolver of the officer by that officer's consent, and went out to find something for the support of himself and his comrades.

Sir, I would grant this man a pension just as soon as I would had he been shot down in the front rank of a charge. [Applause.]

Mr. MATSON. I am very sure, Mr. Chairman, that nobody intends to stigmatize the courage of a dead soldier. This is an adverse report. In the committee I believed, and I believe now, that this case ought to have been favorably reported. Every single fact necessary to entitle the mother of this soldier to a pension, except the one fact that the soldier was not exactly in the line of duty at the time he was killed, has been fully proven even according to the language of this adverse report. And the proof upon that point is so nearly within the purview of the law, is fortified by the additional fact that at the time this soldier started out to do this foraging he started out to do some fighting if necessary, because he took his arms with him and went out ready not to kill Union men but to kill the enemy if necessary.

So I say that in view of all these facts which have been admitted and the further fact of his pursuing this foraging in a fighting line, and the further fact that no one can be blamed about this matter except this officer, I think this committee ought to and will direct this bill to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. MATSON,] has said that every fact in this case except one has been established. That one fact is the very fact of all others that ought to be established before a pension is granted. There is not one word of proof in this record, and, belonging as I do to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I investigated this matter before it came here. I challenge the production of one single line of evidence to show that this man was in the line of his duty. It does not exist; it cannot be found in this Capitol to-night. I know it is very convenient to go off into rhapsodies on a question like this, but this, like all other questions, has its two sides. My friend from Ohio [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] in his enthusiasm said that he would vote for a pension in the case of this soldier as quickly as if he had been shot down in the line of battle. Now it is a question of taste whether he will vote as readily for a man killed out of the line of duty as for one killed in the line of duty.

That this man was a soldier is not denied; that he was killed is not denied; that the party seeking the pension bears the relationship alleged is not denied. But that can be said with equal truth of 25,000 persons whose cases have been rejected in the Pension Office, and of thousands whose cases have been rejected by Congress during the many years that Congress has been called upon to grant pensions.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. What can be said of them? The same as this?

Mr. MCMILLIN. That they were killed, that the parties applying were related to them; all the facts that can be given here.

Now, this idea of giving this man direction to go on a foraging expedition is entirely a matter of imagination, and the record does not bear it out. The most the record shows in this case is that the officer knowing of it winked at his going. I speak subject to correction any minute, subject to interruption any minute, subject to the production of the evidence any minute. Now, to my mind there is a vast difference between a man dying in the line of duty and a man dying out of the line of duty. It is the difference which separates the true soldier from the one who failed to discharge his whole duty.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. STEELE. In a military point of view, was this soldier who went on that foraging expedition with the knowledge of his officer to blame, or was that officer to blame?

Mr. MCMILLIN. They may have both been to blame. The soldier is to blame who leaves his command without the express permission of his commanding officer; not blamable in this case in all probability in a sense that would attach criminality to the act. I do not mean to say that. But you grant your pensions according to special rules. Now, we will suppose the case of a soldier who is furloughed to go home, and while home becomes sick and dies—not in the line of his duty. Do you grant a pension in such a case? Suppose a soldier gets into a personal difficulty and somebody shoots him. In that case do you grant a pension? No, sir.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. Would you refuse to grant a pension if the soldier while home on furlough was shot because he was a Union soldier?

Mr. MCMILLIN. The law declines to give a pension if the soldier at the time he dies or incurs the injury is out of the line of his duty, I do not care what he is engaged in. If a soldier is sent home by the direction of his officers upon furlough and while there is attacked, even then it is a stretch of authority to grant a pension. A pension has never been granted in this Congress in such a case.

Mr. BROWNE. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] will permit me I will answer the question of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. UPDEGRAFF.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. With pleasure.

Mr. BROWNE. By the general law which has been on your statute book for twenty years and more a soldier who, while absent from his command on regular furlough, receives an injury is not entitled to a pension except in case of absence on sick leave.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Precisely. When a soldier while in health, as this soldier is shown is have been, is furloughed and dies while on furlough a pension cannot be granted. By granting a pension in such a case you do injustice to a vast number. There may be 10,000 who died under such circumstances whose widows will not get any pension.

As I have stated, in this case the absence of the soldier was simply winked at. Besides, the record does not show that at the time in question there was any destitution of food in the command to which the soldier belonged.

I have no special feeling in this case. I know there can be no just complaint against the committee in this case for failure to make liberal recommendations in behalf of soldiers and their survivors. No complaint can be made against the Government for not making the general law as liberal as it should be. In view of all this, I insist that there ought to be a distinction between a soldier who dies in the line of duty and one who dies out of it.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to occupy only a moment to draw a distinction between this case and such a case as that suggested by the honorable gentleman who has just spoken. Ordinarily when a man gets a furlough he unbuckles his armor and goes to the rear. This man, with the consent of his officers, buckled on his armor and went to the front, in the face of the enemy, to get something to eat, so that he and his comrades might not starve to death. That is probably the whole of this case. As to the justice due from the Government to a soldier there is a broad distinction between the case where a man goes to the rear on furlough, out of the line of duty and out of all danger, and the case of a soldier who goes to the front under such circumstances as those presented here. This man, with the consent of his officers, went to the front bearing his arms, for the purpose of procuring for himself and his comrades something to eat.

Mr. BROWNE. I do not care a fig, Mr. Chairman, so far as I am personally concerned, what the result in this case may be. I have never yet consciously voted a pension for a disability incurred out of the service, especially for a disability incurred in violation of military rule. I do not intend to vote in the future for any such pension. If other gentlemen see the matter differently, I am entirely willing they shall so vote.

But I do not intend it shall go on the record in this case that this soldier was starving and for that reason went upon this expedition. There is not a word or a line in this whole case tending to show any such condition of things. Nor am I willing to believe that those who commanded the armies of the United States were so heartless that in a country where supplies could be had they refused the regular details by which soldiers are sent into the country on foraging expeditions.

I will vote pensions as liberally as any of the gentlemen who have seen cause to censure me for the position I occupy in this case, to soldiers or to the survivors or dependents of soldiers who have been wounded or disabled in the line of duty. But I will not in my representative capacity vote money out of the Treasury of the United States—money contributed in part perhaps by soldiers who were faithful and who have had no share in the distributions of the nation's bounty. I am not willing to vote their money away except in a case which is shown to be deserving under some rule of law or equity. No such case is presented here.

As to foraging, soldiers who sit around me know something about it. It was very extensively practiced in every command where I had the honor to serve. But I repeat what I have so frequently said, that irregular foraging was in violation of military rule and military discipline. If permitted, it would utterly destroy the discipline of the Army, as every man who commanded a company or a regiment knows. It is the right of the commanding officer to know when his men are absent and where they are. It is the duty of a soldier who leaves his command for any purpose to obtain regular permission to do so. Where the soldier leaves his command for the purpose of foraging it is important he should do so under the regular authority of his officer, so that the foraging may be properly done, that it may not be done merely for the sake of foraging.

If foraging was necessary it ought to be done. If there was anything in the neighborhood the Army wanted it ought to have been taken. Now I am not willing to go into a panegyric of those soldiers, many of them the best soldiers in many respects, with fighting qualities equal to any. I am not willing to go into a panegyric of those men who went off on a foraging expedition to gratify their taste for foraging.

A MEMBER. To gratify their taste for something to eat.

Mr. BROWNE. More frequently to gratify their taste for something to drink; but I do not care to pursue this question further.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, there is only one thing I wish to be distinctly understood, and that is that I do not cast any reflection upon the action of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, because I think no Committee on Invalid Pensions ever has been more faithful to the soldiers that this one of which the gentleman from Indiana is chairman. It seems to me, however, a little hard he should come down so roughly upon this soldier, who had the permission, and indeed I may say the command, of his superior officer to go upon this foraging expedition.

Mr. McMILLIN. Never existed, sir.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. What did not exist?

Mr. McMILLIN. The command.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. I am going to show you what I mean by command. I say that when the officer took off his revolver and gave it to this soldier, knowing he was going on a foraging expedition, it amounted to a command, and was nothing short of it. If my boy comes and tells me he is going on an expedition under my command, and I gratify him with the means to go, and supply him with the arms necessary for his defense, he then has my permission and my authority to go.

My friend from Indiana, the chairman of the committee, says there is not a word or line to prove there was any destitution. Now, sir, if there be any force in the logic of the report, then when he had the authority of his officer to go, do you undertake to say that officer would allow him to go upon this expedition when there was no necessity for it?

Mr. BROWNE. No; but I undertake to say when the American Congress proposes to take money out of the Treasury on a particular state of facts there ought to be some evidence those facts exist. That is what I say, that there ought to be some affirmative testimony there was necessity for it.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. The affirmative testimony is in the fact that the officer, knowing the condition of things at that time, knowing the danger that surrounded his men, knowing the woods was infested with guerrillas, gave this soldier his revolver, and that these men also took Government horses with the consent of the officers. This is affirmative evidence surely that they went, not only with the full knowledge but with the full consent of their superior officers. If that does not furnish affirmative evidence, then this report does not mean anything.

It is easy for us to say foraging demoralizes, and so on, but, Mr. Chairman, foraging was countermanded sometimes, and sometimes it was allowed.

My friend from Tennessee contends this case was winked at. It was a pretty big wink when they gave horses and revolvers to these men to go out for the purpose of foraging for their company.

Mr. McMILLIN. But they were all subject to their superior officers, and knew an inferior could not direct.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. This soldier was under the authority of his commanding officer, and he went on this foraging expedition with his permission and by the aid of that officer, and hence I claim he went with his full authority.

Mr. HEPBURN. There is one matter which seems to be overlooked by gentlemen, and that is, we are authorized to recognize such things as are known as presumptions. When certain facts are established others should be presumed to exist. Now, it is in proof that by the knowledge and consent of this officer this man went on this expedition; that he was provided with the means for his defense, and also with Government horses to make the expedition effective. Can we not presume from those established facts there was an order for his going upon this expedition and that there was a necessity for it. If you do not agree there was this order and this necessity, then you convict this officer of having committed a crime. I do not think you have a right to presume he has been guilty of any such offense.

Mr. BROWNE. If he were regularly detailed on an order from an officer who had a right to make the detail he would have been in the line of his duty and clearly entitled to a pension. How does it happen that instead of that the Pension Office refused to grant him a pension?

Mr. HEPBURN. I cannot answer that.

Mr. DAWES. The Pension Office said there was no written evidence.

Mr. HEPBURN. As a cavalry officer, the gentleman from Indiana knows not once in a score of times was a detail made, but that cavalrymen were always anxious to engage in this kind of service, and the question was not who should be compelled to go, but who would be permitted to go. Details were not necessary, and were not made.

I think that his experience will bear me out in this statement; and that while there might have been some irregularity, and perhaps with few exceptions in all commands there was, still there was an order from headquarters that foraging should not be permitted. But it was an order that was constantly violated—a violation that all grades of officers winked at and permitted. This had the effect of inducing many men, doubtless, to believe that they were engaged in proper and legitimate service when they were foraging, as I have no doubt in many cases they really were. I think I have answered the demand of the gentleman for proof that these men were engaged in obedience to an order, if we have a right to assume under these circumstances, as I think we have, the existence of that order from the knowledge of the officer who had given them aid in carrying it into execution.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, being a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions who voted for this adverse report, I shall not at all shrink from the obligations placed upon me by that action. I believe the adverse report was eminently proper. I believe it is the duty of the committee to sustain it, and I believe that in framing it they performed nothing more than their duty. If this were merely a question of sympathy, a case where our sympathies were enlisted in behalf of the soldier who lost his life, or of the dependent mother whose support was thereby taken from her, I would vote and vote cheerfully to give her all that was necessary to support her as long as she lived. But here is a question of fact, and a question of law, and not a question of sympathy. The report as submitted states the facts as they were found by the Committee on Invalid Pensions precisely as they would have been found by a court or a referee. Upon the facts thereby obtained the conclusion of the committee was based; and the report is based upon the conclusion that the man so placed shall not be pensioned.

Now, what is the case presented here? Here is a man, being under the control of a superior officer in the confederate country, surrounded by enemies, who went out on a foraging expedition. Did he go by order? The gentleman on my right assumes that he did. In that assumption he admits that he needs the order to sustain this demand for a pension. But the finding of facts in the case on which this report is based is that he had no order. He had an implied consent. Circumstantial proof is given that he had the implied consent of the commanding officer. In what way? Simply by reason of being permitted to use the officer's pistol. Is it possible to believe that an officer, responsible for the lives of the men under him, in an enemy's country, surrounded by foes, would send out two or three men selected at random on a foraging expedition? Does it seem to be a reasonable proposition? It does not, to my mind, present any such case. If they needed supplies, if they were starving as alleged, that condition of things would apply also to the entire command, and not merely to these two or three men who went out. If it was necessary to provide supplies for the command, a detail would most probably have been made for that purpose, and men sent out to supply not only themselves but to bring back supplies for the others; and the question is even then whether they would not have been acting outside of the line of duty.

But let us go a step further. We find a good many cases where a man is acting in the line of duty though not an enlisted man. Now if such a person, acting as a soldier, should go out foraging on his own account or should go out foraging for a soldier in the line of duty, and meet the fate that this man met, would it be claimed that he would be entitled to a pension? You would have to go a little further and say that every man foraging for a soldier ought to have a pension. Where would you stop? There is no stopping-place.

There is no place to draw the line, in the judgment of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, except where the committee has drawn it; and where a man is outside the line of duty, where he is abroad upon an adventure and perhaps simply from the love of adventure, and meets with disaster, the claim for pension has no foundation. I think the report of the committee should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, that the bill be laid aside and reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 16, noes 11.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROWNE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to be candid about this matter. I am willing that this case shall be reported to the House favorably upon this vote, but I want to say that this House will not pass the bill to-night. I want to know the judgment of the House when there is a quorum present. I am entirely willing, as I have said, that it shall go into the House with a favorable report; but it cannot pass to-night without a quorum.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions whether he has not already stated to the committee in his remarks that he did not care what action was taken in this matter; that he would simply place on record the facts in the case, and was indifferent as to how the House should decide in reference to it? I would like to ask him, that being the fact, whether this is now mere pride of opinion which induces him to interpose this objection?

Mr. BROWNE. If the gentleman from Iowa thinks the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions has nothing to gratify but his own personal desires he is mistaken, very sadly mistaken.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. BROWNE. I have no feeling in this case personally at all. I do not care whether the bill be voted up or voted down. But it is setting a wrong precedent, in my judgment, when we give a pension to the dependent mother of a soldier who did not meet his death in the line of duty.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no question before the committee.

Mr. CONVERSE. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BRIGGS reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the Private Calendar, had directed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles reported from the Committee of the Whole House without amendment were severally ordered to be engrossed; and, being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 4101) for the relief of Elisabeth Bray;

A bill (H. R. No. 5684) granting a pension to Newton Boutwell;

A bill (H. R. No. 1554) granting a pension to Eliza Hudson;

A bill (H. R. No. 2910) granting a pension to Kate Wilharlitz;

A bill (H. R. No. 2912) granting relief to the heirs of Kunigunda A. Miller, deceased;

A bill (H. R. No. 2349) granting an increase of pension to George J. Webb;

A bill (H. R. No. 3048) granting a pension to Arthur W. Irwing;

A bill (H. R. No. 435) granting a pension to Solomon J. Grisson;

A bill (H. R. No. 369) granting a pension to Jacob R. McFarren;

A bill (H. R. No. 1341) granting a pension to James B. White; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1373) granting a pension to James K. Sturtevant.

Bills of the following titles were reported from the Committee of the Whole House with amendments; the amendments were agreed to, and the bills as amended were ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 4444) granting pensions to Wilson W. Brown and others;

A bill (H. R. No. 1462) granting a pension to Lewis Blundin;

A bill (H. R. No. 4877) for the relief of Emma A. Porch;

A bill (H. R. No. 5018) granting a pension to Elizabeth F. Rice;

A bill (H. R. No. 1873) for the relief of Patrick Sullivan;

A bill (H. R. No. 1243) granting a pension to Michael Marion;

A bill (H. R. No. 3000) granting a pension to Nathaniel J. Coffin; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1188) granting a pension to Thomas Allcock.

The following Senate bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole House without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

A bill (S. No. 240) granting an increase of pension to Henry Strawbridge.

ELISA A. MURRAY.

The bill (H. R. No. 1336) granting a pension to Elisa A. Murray was reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CONVERSE. That, I think, is the bill on which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] proposed to have a vote in the House.

Mr. BROWNE. I ask for a vote on that bill.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore stated that in the judgment of the Chair the "noes" had it.

Mr. MOREY. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 17, noes 11.

Mr. BROWNE. I regret very much to make the point that a quorum has not voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point that a quorum has not voted. The Chair will order tellers.

Mr. BROWNE. Oh, no; let it go over.

RECONSIDERATION.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BROWNE. Before the motion to adjourn is put I desire to move to reconsider the several votes by which the bills already passed have been passed; and I also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JOYCE. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALDRICH] will withdraw the motion to adjourn. The House will recollect that there is attached to the order for the evening session an order to consider bills upon the Calendar donating condemned cannon. I do not know whether that is a continuing order or not. But at any rate it would take but a few minutes to take up these bills and dispose of them. We may as well do it this evening as on any other evening. I hope, therefore, the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his motion, and I will make a motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of taking up these bills.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not think it best to withdraw the motion. I think at the present stage of our proceedings we cannot do any other business, and that we should adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was not agreed to.

Mr. JOYCE. I now move——

Mr. McMILLIN. I hope my friend from Vermont will not insist on his motion. It is shown there is no quorum here. About twenty or thirty members are all we have present.

Mr. RANDALL. There is not one of the two hundred and ninety-three members of the House who, if here, would vote against those bills.

Mr. McMILLIN. I know a number of gentlemen have left believing nothing would be done beyond disposing of the pension bills. Furthermore, it is now ten o'clock and I think it is time to adjourn.

Mr. MOREY. It will take but a few minutes to transact this business.

Mr. ALDRICH. Can the question before the House upon which the point of no quorum was raised be laid aside so that we can now go on with other business?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] simply raised the point that no quorum had voted, but tellers were not ordered; and while the appointment of tellers was pending the gentleman from Illinois moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. PEELLE. I ask the gentleman from Vermont if the consideration of the bills donating condemned cannon was not part of the special order?

Mr. JOYCE. It was. I renew my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering those bills.

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not understand the Chair to say that the business pending when the absence of a quorum was developed has been laid aside.

Mr. RANDALL. Let that go over by unanimous consent, holding its place as unfinished business.

Mr. ALDRICH. If that goes over by unanimous consent I am willing that the proposition of the gentleman from Vermont should be acceded to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to this bill going over until to-morrow?

Mr. MOREY. To come up as unfinished business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. JOYCE, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. BRIGGS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering, under the order of the House, bills and joint resolutions granting condemned cannon, &c.

SOLDIERS' MONUMENT ASSOCIATION, BIRMINGHAM, CONNECTICUT.

The first bill granting condemned cannon was the bill (H. R. No. 2195) donating condemned bronze cannon to the Soldiers' Monument Association of Birmingham, Connecticut.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this bill will be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. McMILLIN. I wish to hear the bill read. [Laughter.] I notice that my request that the bill be read causes some merriment. I make the request for this reason: I remember that during the last Congress a bill came up donating cannon, some sixty bronze cannon, I believe. It came very near going through, although had it passed it would have taken sixty bronze cannon off their carriages.

Mr. JOYCE. It is very proper that these bills should be read.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized to deliver, if the same can be done without detriment to the Government, four condemned bronze cannon to the order of the president of the Soldiers' Monument Association of Birmingham, Connecticut, to be used in the casting of a statue of a soldier to surmount a monument in process of erection by said association.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The next business under the order was the bill (H. R. No. 2202) donating condemned cannon and cannon balls to the Soldiers' Monument Association of Birmingham, Connecticut.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized to deliver, if the same can be done without detriment to the Government, four condemned cannon and thirty-six cannon-balls to the order of the Soldiers' Monument Association of Birmingham, Connecticut, to be used in connection with a soldiers' monument now in process of erection by said association.

Mr. CONVERSE. Was not the bill which was passed before this a bill for the same association? How does it happen that two bills are on the Calendar granting four condemned cannon to the same association?

Mr. PEELLE. I would suggest that this second bill be passed over informally.

Mr. McMILLIN. It seems to me it should be reported to the House to be laid upon the table, as there seems to be two bills for the same purpose.

Mr. JOYCE. They are two separate bills; one is to grant bronze cannon for a statue and the other is to grant iron cannon.

Mr. PEELLE. I suggest that the bill be passed over informally, as they seem to be for the same association, and the author of the bill is not here.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the bill last read will be passed over informally.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

GRAND ARMY POST NO. 94, PHILADELPHIA.

The next business under the special order of the House was the bill (H. R. No. 3082) granting condemned cannon to the Anna M. Ross Post, No. 94, of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Philadelphia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to donate two condemned brass cannon to the Anna M. Ross Post, No. 94, of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Philadelphia.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

WATERLOO SOLDIERS' CEMETERY, IOWA.

The next business under the special order was the joint resolution (H. R. No. 8) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the city of Waterloo, Iowa, three condemned cannon and four cannon-balls, for decoration of soldiers' cemetery.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver to the authorities of the city of Waterloo, Black Hawk County, Iowa, three condemned cannon and four cannon-balls of a large caliber, for use in decorating the lot in Elmwood Cemetery, in that city, that has been set apart for the burial of ex-soldiers.

Mr. McMILLIN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. DEERING,] who introduced this bill, whether there is any evidence that there are condemned cannon now in possession of the Government?

Mr. ALDRICH. That is the kind they are making now. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOYCE. I called at the War Department this afternoon to find out all about that.

Mr. McMILLIN. How many are there?

Mr. JOYCE. I can give the gentleman the number in a moment.

Mr. STEELE. There are 135 iron cannon.

Mr. McMILLIN. The reason I ask is that I know during the last Congress the report was made to us that there were no more condemned cannon on hand.

Mr. JOYCE. There are 927 bronze cannon, 752 cast-iron guns, 22 cast-iron guns, 42 wrought-iron guns, 8 wrought-iron guns, and 48 steel guns.

Mr. McMILLIN. All condemned?

Mr. JOYCE. Not all condemned now, but they will be in due time.

Mr. McMILLIN. I desire to have an amendment to these bills providing that these cannon shall be from the number of condemned cannon now on hand. I think that ought to be done.

Mr. DEERING. Now condemned or to be condemned?

Mr. McMILLIN. I want my amendment to apply to all these bills, that these donations are to be made out of condemned cannon now on hand. I am informed by my friend on my right here, and my memory so serves me, that last year there were granted more condemned cannon than there were such cannon in possession of the Government. My friend from Vermont [Mr. JOYCE] says that they are not all condemned yet, and my friend from Illinois [Mr. ALDRICH] suggests that they are making no cannon now but condemned cannon.

Mr. JOYCE. They are not all condemned now, but many of them are, and all of them will be, for they are absolutely of no use in case of war. They are good for nothing but for old bronze and old iron.

Mr. ALDRICH. I want to offer an amendment that if there are not enough condemned cannon now on hand to fill these bills the officers of the Government shall be instructed to condemn enough for the purpose. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] proposes to move an amendment to the pending bill. The Chair will suggest to him to send his amendment in writing to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. McMILLIN. There seem to be some few condemned cannon now on hand, and I will not offer my amendment to this bill but to the next one.

Mr. PEELLE. If the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] be made to apply only to condemned cannon now on hand, and five days or only one day after these bills shall have been passed there should be more cannon condemned, his amendment would prevent their being donated.

Mr. McMILLIN. I certainly would not pass bills donating condemned cannon if there are none on hand now.

Mr. PEELLE. If they are not condemned now they may be condemned within a few days after these bills are passed.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then the amendment suggested by my friend from Illinois [Mr. ALDRICH] ought to be made.

Mr. REED. All the early bills on the Calendar would get the cannon and those that come afterward would get none, under the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee. Now, my bill is one of the earliest, and yet I object to the amendment of the gentleman out of charity to the others.

Mr. McMILLIN. I know my friend from Maine [Mr. REED] is a humanitarian; charity beams from every feature of his face. I want to give the gentleman due credit for all the charity he claims.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the bill will be laid aside to be favorably reported to the House.

The question was taken, and it was so ordered.

CONDEMNED CANNON FOR TOPEKA, KANSAS.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 459) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the city of Topeka, Kansas, for monumental purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized to deliver, if the same can be done without detriment to the Government, to the city of Topeka, Kansas, four condemned cannon and twenty cannon-balls, to be placed on a monument to be erected in memory of deceased soldiers in the Topeka cemetery.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by adding "also four condemned cannon to the town of Brimfield, Massachusetts, for monumental purposes."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. CONVERSE. I move to amend by adding "four condemned cannon for the Ferncliff Cemetery, Springfield, Ohio.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. I move to amend by adding "four condemned cannon to the Soldiers and Sailors' Association of Delaware, Ohio, for a soldiers' monument."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to offer a small amendment, and I will make the number of cannon "three" instead of four. I move to amend by adding "also to the National Soldiers' cemetery at Louisville, Kentucky, three condemned cannon, for the same purpose." I will state that I introduced in the last Congress a bill making a donation of this kind, which received favorable action. But it was announced that there were no condemned cannon then or thereafter to be had, so far as the authorities knew. I therefore withdrew the bill. Now, as there seem to be condemned cannon on hand, I offer this amendment in good faith.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. MOREY. I move to amend by adding "also four condemned cannon and four cannon-balls to Wetzel Compton Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Hamilton, Ohio, for the purpose of decorating a soldiers' lot."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BROWNE. Now, in order that each of the two hundred and ninety-three members of the House and the eight or nine Delegates may get a donation of four condemned cannon, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. WILLIS. I have offered my amendment in perfect good faith; but if its tendency is to break down the bills of other gentlemen I withdraw it.

Mr. MOREY. I think it is fair that all these amendments should be withdrawn. If we had proceeded regularly we would by this time have acted favorably upon a number of these bills, and the business of the committee would have been expedited. It occurs to me that to go on in this way defeats the very object for which we resolved ourselves into Committee of the Whole. For my part, I am willing to withdraw my amendment, as I hope other gentlemen will withdraw theirs, and let these bills take their orderly course.

Mr. STEELE. Gentlemen having propositions of this kind should introduce their bills and send them to the Committee on Military Affairs, where there will be no trouble in having them favorably considered.

Mr. BROWNE. I insist on my motion, unless we can arrive at an immediate agreement on this subject.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I do not see any reason at all why the Committee on Military Affairs should not report a single bill including these different places, so that they may be all treated alike. That we undertook to do in the last Congress. The town named in the amendment I have moved is, as gentlemen know, just as much entitled to a donation of condemned cannon as any other place. There is no reason why one town should have such a donation more than another. We all should stand about alike.

Mr. BROWNE. I can state one reason, if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I shall be very glad to hear it.

Mr. BROWNE. It is that other members were vigilant in getting their bills before the Committee on Military Affairs, and obtaining favorable reports. In this respect they stand ahead of the gentleman in equity.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I was so vigilant that I obtained a favorable report in the last Congress; and my bill got into precisely the same position as this one; when it came up various gentlemen jumped upon it and loaded it with amendments. I do not know whether my friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] helped to do it or not.

Mr. MOREY. As the gentleman "knows how it is himself," he ought not to assist in loading down this bill.

Mr. CONVERSE. I desire to say that in the last Congress a bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs was passed by this House giving condemned cannon to the Ferncliff Cemetery, but it failed in the Senate. The amendment ought to go upon this bill. We have another cemetery, for which I have not even made a request, where there are at least five hundred soldiers buried. I should be very glad at some time during the session to get a donation of four condemned cannon and the same number of balls for that association. But I insist that this amendment for the Ferncliff Cemetery shall remain in the bill, because a proposition to this effect passed the House in the last Congress and failed in the Senate. The amendment is just as worthy as any of the propositions of this kind that are presented here.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. No proposition of mine shall stand in anybody's way; I do not want to defeat any bill of this kind. Although I do not see why the town I have named in my amendment should not be treated in just the same way as these others. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. CONVERSE. I hope the gentleman will let his amendment stand. Let the bill pass with the amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I am willing to leave the amendment in or withdraw it, just as may be deemed best. I do not see why there is not as much merit in my proposition as in any other.

Mr. BROWNE. I concede it has just as much merit as a dozen other propositions which various gentlemen may make. There is in my town of Winchester, Indiana, a soldiers' monument association engaged in good faith in accumulating funds for a soldiers' monument. I had drafted an amendment with a view to offer it, but I saw at once we would defeat the whole object of this legislation donating more condemned cannon than we have, good, bad, and all kinds, and for that reason I thought it was best I should not offer mine. I withdraw my motion that the committee rise.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I will give mine up also, hoping to get something hereafter.

Mr. CONVERSE. Mine is a meritorious case, and I make an appeal to gentlemen in its favor.

Mr. BROWNE. I cannot discriminate in favor of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CONVERSE. It is not in my district.

Mr. MOORE. I object to its going on unless mine also goes on. Mr. Chairman, there is a soldiers' national cemetery in Memphis with 14,000 soldiers and no monument.

A MEMBER. Introduce your bill.

Mr. MOORE. Nine thousand of them Union soldiers unknown and 5,000 whose names are recorded. There is no monument and we need one. Certainly if condemned cannon are to be donated for soldiers' monuments, the national cemetery at Memphis should be liberally provided.

Mr. MOREY. Introduce your bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio withdraw his amendment?

Mr. CONVERSE. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move an amendment which I think proper should go on, especially in view of the experience of last session, when sixty bronze cannon came near going, worth over $200,000. I move to add the following:

Provided, There are cannon now on hand which have been condemned with which to meet the demands of this act.

Mr. RANDALL. If there are no condemned cannon they will not get them.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then my amendment will not hurt anybody.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SOLDIERS' MONUMENT, PORTLAND, MAINE.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 605) donating cannon and cannon-balls to aid in the construction of a suitable soldiers' monument at Portland, Maine.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to deliver, if the same can be done without detriment to the Government, to Post Bosworth, Grand Army of the Republic, Portland, in the State of Maine, four condemned cannon and sixteen cannon-balls, to be used in the construction of a suitable monument to be erected by said post in honor of the deceased soldiers of the late war.

Mr. REED. I move that bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to, and it was so ordered.

CONDEMNED CANNON FOR MONUMENTAL PURPOSES.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 679) donating condemned cannon, &c., for monumental and other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, if the same can be done without prejudice to the public service, to deliver to the parties herein named the following condemned cannon, &c., for monumental and other purposes, namely:

To the Charles Russell Lowell Post, No. 7, of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Boston, Massachusetts, two condemned twelve-pounder guns and gun carriages, to be used for monumental purposes in the decoration of a free burial ground for ex-soldiers, sailors, and marines who have been honorably discharged from the service of the United States.

To each of the towns of Woburn, Winchester, and Wakefield, in the State of Massachusetts, four condemned cannon, to be used in the erection of a soldiers' monument, or in the decoration of a soldiers' lot in the cemeteries in said towns.

To Post No. 78 of the Grand Army of the Republic, district of Massachusetts, four condemned cannon, to be used for monumental purposes in the cemetery at South Abington, Massachusetts.

To the McPherson Post, No. 73, of the Grand Army of the Republic, district of Massachusetts, four condemned cannon, to be used for monumental purposes in the cemetery at Abington, in said State.

To the selectmen of the town of Paxton, in the county of Worcester, State of Massachusetts, four condemned cannon, to be used in ornamenting the lot upon which the soldiers' monument is erected in said town of Paxton.

To the selectmen of the town of Brimfield, Massachusetts, four condemned cannon, to be used in the completion of the soldiers' monument in said town.

To the William H. Bartlett Post, No. 3, of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Taunton, Massachusetts, four condemned cannon, for the purpose of ornamenting the burial grounds of deceased Union soldiers.

Mr. CONVERSE. I move to insert my amendment for four condemned cannon and four cannon-balls for Ferncliff Cemetery, Springfield, Ohio.

Mr. ALDRICH. Any report in favor of this?

Mr. RANDALL. There has to be; that is the rule.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. All these cases were reported favorably last year, but failed to pass. They are reported again this year. I drew the bill myself.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 4.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SOLDIERS' CEMETERY, GALLIPOLIS, OHIO.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 1287) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for the soldiers' cemetery at Gallipolis, Ohio.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to furnish such number of condemned cannon as may be required to Colonel L. Z. Cadot, Surgeon William S. Newton, and Major Samuel F. Neal, for the use and adornment of the soldiers' cemetery in the city of Gallipolis and State of Ohio.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' ASSOCIATION, BELLAIRE, OHIO.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 2552) to donate condemned cannon to the Soldiers' and Sailors' Association of Bellaire, Ohio.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver to the Soldiers' and Sailors' Association of Bellaire, Ohio, four condemned brass field-pieces, if the same can be spared without detriment to the Government, to aid in the erection of a monument to the memory of the Union soldiers and sailors of Belmont County, Ohio, killed in the late war of the rebellion.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SAMPSON POST NO. 22, GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 3001) to authorize the Secretary of War to turn over to Sampson Post No. 22 of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Rochester, New Hampshire, four condemned cannon.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to turn over and deliver to Sampson Post, No. 22, of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Rochester, New Hampshire, to be placed about the soldiers' monument in said Rochester, four condemned cannon and two anchors.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SOLDIERS' CEMETERY, OTSEGO, MICHIGAN.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 3333) to donate one condemned bronze cannon to the citizens of Otsego, Michigan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to deliver to the citizens of Otsego, Michigan, one piece of condemned bronze cannon, if the same can be spared without serious detriment to the Government, to place in their cemetery, near the soldiers' monument.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MORTON MONUMENTAL ASSOCIATION.

The next business was the joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) granting condemned cannon to the Morton Monumental Association.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to give to the Morton Monumental Association of the United States twelve condemned and unserviceable cannon and twenty-five cannon-balls, for casting a statue of Oliver P. Morton, late a Senator from Indiana, to be erected at the city of Indianapolis, Indiana.

Mr. PEELLE. I desire to move an amendment to this joint resolution. It provides for twelve condemned and "unserviceable" cannon. It may be that the cannon are condemned, and yet are not unserviceable. I move therefore to strike out the words "and unserviceable" from the bill in line 5; so that it will read, "twelve condemned cannon and twenty-five cannon balls," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EQUESTRIAN STATUE OF GENERAL REYNOLDS.

The next business was the joint resolution (H. R. No. 38) appropriating thirty condemned guns for the equestrian statue of Major-General John Fulton Reynolds, who fell at Gettysburgh, July 1, 1863.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to give to the Reynolds Monument Association thirty condemned cannon, to be used in making the bronze equestrian statue of the late General John Fulton Reynolds, who fell at the battle of Gettysburgh; and that the proper Department be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to take such measures as shall be necessary to secure the co-operation of the Government in all ceremonies attending the laying of the corner-stone and the final unveiling of the proposed statue.

The joint resolution was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SOLDIERS' MONUMENT, MANSFIELD, OHIO.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 4585) to donate two condemned bronze cannon to the city of Mansfield, Ohio, to be placed on the public square near the soldiers' bronze monument.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to deliver to the mayor of the city of Mansfield, Ohio, for the benefit of said city, two pieces of condemned bronze cannon, if the same can be spared without serious detriment to the Government, to place on the public square of said city near the soldiers' bronze monument recently erected on said public square at a cost of $10,000, the gift of a patriotic and liberal-minded citizen.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill is reported with an amendment. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "bronze," where it occurs in the bill, and insert the word "iron;" also amend the title so as to read: "A bill to donate two condemned iron cannon to the city of Mansfield, Ohio, to be placed on the public square near the soldiers' bronze monument."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SOLDIERS' CEMETERY, HAMILTON, OHIO.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 4745) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for the soldiers' cemetery at Hamilton, Ohio.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to furnish to Wetzel-Compton Post of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Hamilton, Ohio, such number of condemned cannon, not less than four, and of large size, and spherical shot, as may be required, for the use and adornment of the soldiers' cemetery in the city of Hamilton and State of Ohio.

Mr. MOREY. I desire leave to print some remarks in connection with that bill.

There was no objection. [See Appendix.]

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

STURTEVANT POST, NO. 2, GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 4545) to authorize the Secretary of War to turn over to E. E. Sturtevant Post, No. 2, of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Concord, New Hampshire, six condemned cannon.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to turn over and deliver six condemned cannon to E. E. Sturtevant Post, No. 2, of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Concord, New Hampshire, to adorn the soldiers' lot in the cemetery at Concord aforesaid.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MILAN, OHIO.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 3738) to donate bronze cannon to the township of Milan, Ohio.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to deliver to the mayor of Milan, Ohio, four condemned bronze cannon, if the same can be done without serious detriment to the Government, for the adorment of the monument erected in the village of Milan commemorating the names of soldiers who devoted and lost their lives in the service of the United States during the war of the rebellion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the proposed amendment to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "bronze," where it occurs in the fifth line, and insert "iron;" and amend the title so as to read: "A bill to donate iron cannon to the township of Milan, Ohio."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' MONUMENTAL ASSOCIATION OF LYCOMING COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 3877) donating condemned cannon and other munitions of war to the Soldiers' and Sailors' Monumental Association of Lycoming County, Pennsylvania.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized to deliver, if the same can be done without detriment to the public service, to the Soldiers' and Sailors' Monumental Association of Lycoming County, Pennsylvania, four condemned iron cannon and such other munitions of war as in his discretion may be deemed advisable for the purposes of said association.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CONDEMNED CANNON, BRANDON, VERMONT.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 5211) granting four condemned cannon to the town of Brandon, Vermont, to be placed near a soldiers' monument in said town.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to deliver to the selectmen of the town of Brandon, in the county of Rutland, and State of Vermont, for the benefit of said town, four pieces of condemned iron cannon, if the same can be spared without serious detriment to the Government, to place on the public square of said town near a soldiers' monument to be erected on said square by said town.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

M'LEAN POST, NO. 16, GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 5240) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish a condemned cannon for the use of McLean Post, No. 16, of the Grand Army of the Republic.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to furnish to McLean Post No. 16 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Reading, Pennsylvania, a condemned cannon or mounted field-piece of large size, for the use of said post.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment suggested by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "condemned," in line 6, insert the word "iron;" so that it will read:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to furnish to McLean Post, No. 16, of the grand Army of the Republic, at Reading, Pennsylvania, a condemned iron cannon or mounted field-piece of large size, for the use of said post."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to offer an amendment to this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Also six cannon and cannon-balls to the National Cemetery at Louisville, Kentucky, for monumental purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the title of the bill will be amended to conform.

Mr. ALDRICH. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Four condemned cannon and twenty-five cannon-balls for the soldiers' burying ground in Oakwood Cemetery, in the village of Hyde Park, Cook County, Illinois, for monumental purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. I move to amend by inserting:

Six condemned cannon for the national cemetery at Memphis, Tennessee, and twelve cannon-balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEELE. I wish to offer an amendment:

Granting two cannon to General Shunk Post, Grand Army of the Republic, at Marion, Indiana.

Mr. McMILLIN. Not for monumental purposes?

Mr. STEELE. For the same purposes that the others have been granted.

Mr. McMILLIN. They are not for monumental purposes; let the amendment be read again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. STEELE. You will see that these are for the same purpose as all the others. This bill reads:

To McLean Post, No. 16, at Reading, Pennsylvania, for the use of said post.

Mr. McMILLIN. This does not seem to be for monumental purposes. I will keep my eye on that when it comes into the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Keep your eye on that. That is all right. There is nothing the matter with that.

Mr. McMILLIN. If it is for other than monumental purposes, I will see to it.

Mr. RANDALL. The post, as I understand, have a lot in the cemetery for the burial of their members by their order, and they propose to erect a monument in the cemetery on that lot.

Mr. STEELE. That is as I understand it.

The amendment offered by Mr. STEELE was adopted.

The title of the bill was amended to conform to the amendments, and as amended the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SARATOGA MONUMENT ASSOCIATION.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 5377) to authorize the Secretary of War to deliver certain cannon to the Saratoga Monument Association.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized to deliver to the Saratoga Monument Association the following cannon, &c., captured from General Burgoyne at Saratoga, and now on hand at the Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, New York, namely: four twelve-pounder guns, one eight-inch howitzer, one twenty-four pounder howitzer, one eight-inch mortar, and one twenty-four pounder mortar, all bronze.

Mr. NORCROSS. I move to amend the bill by adding four condemned cannon for monumental purposes to the Grand Army post located at Westminster, Massachusetts.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. CANNON. I move to amend the bill so as to provide for donating four condemned cannon for monumental purposes at Danville, Illinois.

The amendment was adopted.

The title of the bill was amended so as to conform to the amendments, and as amended it was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BRIGGS reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration sundry bills donating condemned cannon, &c., and had directed him to report the same back to the House with various recommendations.

BILLS PASSED.

The first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with a favorable recommendation was the bill (H. R. No. 2195) donating condemned cannon to the Soldiers' Monument Association of Birmingham, Connecticut.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the bill will be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that these bills ought to be passed to-night. We have not a full House, and I would request of the gentlemen in charge of the bills that they be permitted to go over under the previous question and let a full House operate on them to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIS. Does not the gentleman suppose they would pass in a full House?

Mr. McMILLIN. Yes, I think they would pass, but I think it is best when a large amount of property belonging to the Government is being appropriated that it be done by as full a House as possible.

Mr. REED. Do you want to put 290 power on this business?

Mr. McMILLIN. Besides it is nearly twelve o'clock, and we have been here between eight and nine hours to-day. I think it is time to adjourn.

Mr. PEELLE. It was understood this was to be a part of the business to be disposed of to-night.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The following bills and joint resolutions, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union without amendment, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 3082) granting condemned cannon to the Anna M. Ross Post, No. 94, of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Philadelphia;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 8) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the city of Waterloo, Iowa, three condemned cannon and four cannon-balls, for decoration of soldiers' cemetery;

A bill (H. R. No. 459) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the city of Topeka, Kansas, for monumental purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 605) donating cannon-balls to aid in the construction of a suitable soldiers' monument at Portland, Maine;

A bill (H. R. No. 1287) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for the soldiers' cemetery at Gallipolis, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 2552) to donate condemned cannon to the Soldiers' and Sailors' Association of Bellaire, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 3001) to authorize the Secretary of War to turn over to Sampson Post, No. 22, of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Rochester, New Hampshire, four condemned cannon;

A bill (H. R. No. 3333) to donate one condemned bronze cannon to the citizens of Otsego, Michigan;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 38) appropriating thirty condemned guns for the equestrian statue of Major-General John Fulton Reynolds, who fell at Gettysburgh, July 1, 1863;

A bill (H. R. No. 4585) to donate two condemned bronze cannon to the city of Mansfield, Ohio, to be placed on the public square near the soldiers' bronze monument;

A bill (H. R. No. 4745) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for the soldiers' cemetery at Hamilton Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 4545) to authorize the Secretary of War to turn over to E. E. Sturtevant Post, No. 2, of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Concord, New Hampshire, six condemned cannon; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5211) granting four condemned cannon to the town of Brandon, Vermont.

The following bills and joint resolution were reported by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with amendments; the amendments were agreed to, and the bills and joint resolution as amended were ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 679) donating condemned cannon, &c., for monumental and other purposes;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) granting condemned cannon to the Morton Monumental Association;

A bill (H. R. No. 3738) to donate bronze cannon to the township of Milan, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 3877) donating condemned cannon and other munitions of war to the Soldiers' and Sailors' Monumental Association of Lycoming County, Pennsylvania;

A bill (H. R. No. 5240) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for the use of McLean Post, No. 16, Grand Army of the Republic; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5377) to authorize the Secretary of War to deliver certain cannon to the Saratoga Monument Association.

Mr. PEELLE moved to reconsider the votes by which the above bills and joint resolutions were severally passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of J. Aretas Prime, for compensation for services rendered in the civil service of the United States—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. ATKINS: The petition of citizens of Madison and Henderson Counties, Tennessee, in favor of the construction of a ship-railway across the Isthmus of Tehauntepec—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. BINGHAM: Three petitions of citizens of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, for the passage of the French spoliation-claims bill—severally to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BUTTERWORTH: The petition of James C. Hopple & Co. and 20 others, merchants of Cincinnati, Ohio, protesting against the repeal of the tax on matches—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CARPENTER: The joint resolution of the General Assembly of Iowa, in relation to the duty on steel blooms and wire rods—to the same committee.

By Mr. N. J. HAMMOND: Two petitions, signed by 510 citizens of Georgia, for the repeal of internal-revenue taxes—severally to the same committee.

By Mr. B. W. HARRIS: The petition of D. McDougal, rear-admiral United States Navy, relative to his retirement from the active list—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. HEPBURN: The petition of N. C. Redmour, for an increse of pension—to the Committee of Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MATSON: The petition of Richard Jobes and 103 others, asking that said Jobes's pension be increased—to the same committee.

By Mr. MULDROW: The petition of T. B. Dalton and others, for an appropriation for educational purposes and for the distribution thereof on the basis of illiteracy—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. O'NEILL: Paper of Professor A. L. Kennedy, president of the Pennsylvania Polytechnic College, suggesting certain inquiries to be made as to the causes of the Mississippi River floods—to the Committee on Levees and Improvement of the Mississippi River.

Also, the petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, for the passage of a bill to settle the French spoliation claims and pay the claimants—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. PAGE: The petition of Alex. R. Baldwin and others, and of Flint, Peabody & Co., of San Francisco, California, for the passage of the bill for the incorporation of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua—to the same committee.

By Mr. REED: The petition of Maria Delaney, for compensation for destruction of property by authority of the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. J. S. RICHARDSON: The petition of the Board of Trade of Columbia, South Carolina, relative to the proposed free ship-canal connecting the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays—to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. O. R. SINGLETON: The petition of R. H. Camp and others, citizens of Mississippi, for the construction of a ship-railway across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. STONE: The petition of James E. Lothrop and others, of Dover, New Hampshire, and of J. H. Manly and others, of Augusta, Maine, for the survey of Sandy Bay, in Rockport, Massachusetts—severally to the same committee.

By Mr. VANCE: The petition of C. F. Davis for the establishment of a post-route from Coleman, North Carolina, to Merrittsville, South Carolina; also, the petition of H. G. Weaver for a mail-route from Marion to H. G. Weaver's, in the State of North Carolina—severally to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. C. G. WILLIAMS, (by request and with the statement that he does not favor the relief asked:) The petition of Orrin W. Dunn and fourteen others, native-born citizens of Irish descent, of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, asking that the laws passed in relation to the importation or immigration of Chinese apply with equal effect to the importation or immigration of Irishmen—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 22, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LIGHT ON CHICAGO WATER-WORKS CRIB.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 186) authorizing the erection of a light on the tower of the Chicago water-works crib, Chicago, Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause the erection of a light on the tower of the Chicago water-works crib, Chicago Illinois; and that the provisions of section 355 and 4661 of the Revised Statutes be suspended as regards this light.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was brought before the House, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BOWMAN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask leave to submit a resolution.

Mr. BOWMAN. I must call the regular order.

Mr. HAZELTON, (to Mr. BOWMAN.) Wait a little.

Mr. BOWMAN. Well, I will give notice that in fifteen minutes I will call the regular order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Why not now allow the proposition to be submitted to the House and acted on to call the roll of members alphabetically, so that each may submit a proposition to the House.

Mr. ROBESON. I object.

Mr. BOWMAN. I promised yesterday to try and get an order of the House to close debate at three o'clock to-day on the bill referring claims to the Court of Claims. If I am to be held to that promise, I must insist upon the regular order as soon as possible, and I will do so at the end of fifteen minutes.

CULTIVATION OF CINCHONA.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk be considered at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Commissioner on Agriculture be requested to inform this House whether any portion of the United States is adapted to the growth of cinchona.

Mr. RANDALL. I have taken this opportunity to introduce this subject so that I may state and have printed in the RECORD my reasons for doing so. The subject is an important one, and I desire to call to it the attention of those who are interested in the growth of this tree in the United States. I have been more directly moved to submit the resolution by a letter, which I hold in my hand, from Professor Alfred L. Kennedy, of the Polytechnic College, Philadelphia. The letter is as follows:

POLYTECHNIC COLLEGE,
Philadelphia, April 20, 1882.

MY DEAR SIR: You are doubtless fully aware that the plantations of cinchona or Peruvian bark, from which the world derives its supply of quinia, are in jeopardy, and that Holland and England have with a wise forecast already provided against probable contingencies by establishing in their Asiatic possessions plantations of the tree. It is so evidently the duty of our country to imitate this example, that I beg to suggest the passage by Congress of a resolution requesting the Secretary of the Interior to institute full and careful inquiry, and report to Congress whether any part of the public domain is adapted to the growth of the cinchona, with the view of having that portion reserved from sale until Congress take action on the report.

The tree grows well up in the slopes of the Andes, in a rare and temperate atmosphere. Its cultivation in Asia has already afforded a bark yielding a higher percentage of the active principle than the bark imported from Peru. There should be no opposition to a resolution of this kind, and although you are, I know, very much occupied, I trust that you will find time to prepare and present it at an early day.

Very truly, your friend,

ALFRED L. KENNEDY.

Hon. S. J. RANDALL, M. C., Washington, D. C.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SPRINGFIELD STREET RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that House bill No. 713 be taken from the House Calendar and put upon its passage at this time. It is a bill granting to the Springfield Street Railway Company the right to lay tracks in Mill street in Springfield, Massachusetts.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be read.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I think there will be no objection to passing the bill, if members will listen to it when it is read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Springfield Street Railway Company is hereby authorized to lay and maintain its tracks in Mill street, so called, in Springfield, Massachusetts, on land owned by the United States, from Central street to a point opposite Lincoln Hall, so called, with the privilege of hereafter extending its tracks from that point to the limits of the land of the United States, near Walnut street: Provided, however, That the said company shall remove said tracks whenever thereto directed by the Secretary of War or any person acting under or by virtue of authority from him: And provided further, That the right to repeal, alter, or amend this act is reserved to Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would inquire if this bill has been reported from any committee?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. It has been reported unanimously by the Committee on Military Affairs of this House, and it was favorably reported by the Committee on Military Affairs in the last Congress. It has the indorsement of the War Department, as shown by a letter which I have here, and which I will incorporate in my remarks.

This Mill street is in a thickly settled portion of the city of Springfield. The fee of the street belongs to the United States. Many of the persons living along the line of the street are employés of the Government in the United States armory. The road has already been built under the permission of the Secretary of War, and now requires the indorsement of Congress.

The letter from the War Department is as follows:

ORDNANCE OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 2, 1882.

SIR: In reply to your letter of yesterday, I have the honor to inform you that the amendment to this bill 713, requiring the railway company to keep the street paved three feet outside of rails, was suggested by the commanding officer, national armory, and has been recommended. If the proviso in the bill "that the said company shall remove said tracks whenever thereto directed by the Secretary of War, or any person acting under or by virtue of his authority" surrounds the grant with all the safeguards necessary, I should think a mere explanation would suffice to show that the amendment need not be made.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. V. BENÉT,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Ordnance.

Hon. GEORGE D. ROBINSON,
House of Representatives.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the House Calendar, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ACCOUNT WITH SOUTH CAROLINA FOR ARMS.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 1082 be taken from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time. It is a bill authorizing the Secretary of War to adjust and settle the account for arms between the State of South Carolina and the Government of the United States.

In that connection I desire to make a short statement to the House. This is a bill which has twice passed the Senate, once during the last Congress and now during this Congress. It has been before the Committee on Military Affairs of this House both of last Congress and this Congress, and has received the favorable action of that committee each time. I understand that the bill has been reported favorably by the present Committee on Military Affairs without a dissenting voice. My friend from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] I think will bear me out in that statement.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to adjust the account for arms between the State of South Carolina and the Government of the United States, and balance the same by so reducing the overcharge made against said State in A. D. 1869, under the act approved the 23d of April, A. D. 1808, and the several acts amendatory thereof, as that the amounts paid on said account by said State for the ten years last past be taken in full satisfaction of the same.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think this bill needs some explanation, so that we may understand it.

Mr. SPARKS. If the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RICHARDSON] will allow me, I think I can satisfactorily explain this bill. I examined it when it was before the Committee on Military Affairs, and it was by the unanimous report of the committee that it is now before the House. Some time in 1869 the State of South Carolina, being entitled to about nine thousand dollars' worth of arms from the United States as its quota under the provisions of the law of 1808, "distributing arms to the various States," &c., the governor of South Carolina authorized his adjutant-general, the notorious F. J. Moses, to come to Washington and obtain these arms due to the State. When he came here, instead of obtaining the quota of arms actually due, he obtained by some arrangement about one hundred and twenty-four thousand dollars' worth, thus incurring to the State an indebtedness to the amount of over $115,000, to be paid out of their future arms quota, thereby mulcting the State for over thirty years to come. These were old arms, of course, and, as it was claimed, to make them effective they were taken somewhere and repaired and were then taken to South Carolina and distributed to certain organized bodies of colored men called the militia of the State. I am informed (and by the way, the report of the investigation on this subject instituted by the Legislature shows the fact very clearly) that the State has absolutely lost all these arms. Now they have been sold or otherwise disposed of by the irresponsible organizations of colored men to whom they were distributed, and lost to the State.

Mr. BROWNE. Was not this bill reported adversely by the Committee on Military Affairs of the last House?

Mr. SPARKS. No, sir. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RICHARDSON] has stated that it was reported favorably by that committee; but I think it never was reported at all. I am well convinced, however, that the report would have been favorable. But on account of the lateness of the session General Johnston, who had charge of the matter as a sub-committee, failed, I think for want of time, to report the bill to the general committee. The gentleman from South Carolina informs me this moment that General Johnston informed him that he was directed by the general committee to make the report. However, I have stated the essential facts of the case correctly. There is no question but that the Military Committee of the House in the last Congress did or would have instructed in favor of the bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the question arises, could the governor or other officers of the State of South Carolina go on and in that way tie up that State in reference to its annual quota of arms for thirty or forty years in advance? Clearly they could not on any honorable or legal grounds do this. Yet the effect of their action was to do that very thing. Some thirteen years have now intervened; and the State is still behind some seventy or eighty thousand dollars. These people have therefore been deprived of their due quota of arms under this law of 1808 for fifteen years, amounting in aggregate value to perhaps $50,000 to $55,000, and now they are willing to rub out this whole matter and begin anew from the passage of this act. It impresses me, Mr. Speaker, as it did the committee, as being eminently just to do this. The governor of the State, so far as the record shows, never made a demand for this excessive quantity of arms; but it was done by his adjutant-general by arrangement with the War Office. If the governor joined in it it was by verbal authority, because nothing in the governor's written authority to the adjutant-general, as appears from the record, shows any demand made by him for any thing more than the quota then due, which was a little less than $9,000 in value.

Mr. DUNNELL. I must object to the consideration of this bill. I call for the regular order.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the passage, without amendment, of the bill (H. R. No. 3246) changing the name of the German Protestant Orphan Asylum Association.

AMERICAN CITIZENS IN BRITISH PRISONS.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I rise to a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, January 23, a resolution was referred, under the rules of this House, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; on the 14th of February the resolution, having been reported, was recommitted with instructions. On the 24th of March I inquired in this House when that committee would report upon the subject. We were informed that we should have a satisfactory report in two or three days. That is a month ago, yet we have heard nothing from the committee since. My present question is, how long must we wait for this Committee on Foreign Affairs to report on a question affecting the liberty of American citizens still held in jail by an impudent and unfriendly government?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not able to answer that as a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HAZELTON. It is not a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. It is not a parliamentary inquiry in any strict sense. The rule is as indicated by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON;] but it is not within the power of the Chair to take any action independently of the action of the House with reference to such a matter.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Mr. Speaker, what power has this House? The State Department does not obey us. This House is despised; the Government of England despises this country; and the Committee on Foreign Affairs despises you and me. What are we to do—this is my parliamentary question—to get this question before the House?

Mr. DUNNELL. I call for the reading of the resolution, if there is a resolution before the House.

The SPEAKER. There is no resolution before the House. The gentleman from New York has risen to make a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair can only state that by the rules it is provided that during the call of States and Territories on Monday, "resolutions of inquiry directed to the heads of the Executive Departments shall be in order for reference to appropriate committees, which resolutions shall be referred to the House within one week thereafter." That is the rule.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. It is now three months since the resolution was referred.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no power in the matter any more than any individual member.

Mr. CALKINS. I wish to ask whether a motion to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the question would not bring it back to the House?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. DUNNELL. What is the question?

The SPEAKER. The question of the gentleman from New York was stated as a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair does not think it a parliamentary inquiry in any other sense than to ascertain what the rule is. The Chair cannot enforce it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I make the motion that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution which they have now had in their possession since January 23, three months ago, and that the resolution be brought immediately before the House.

Mr. BOWMAN. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask the Speaker whether or not it is not a question of privilege? Here are two classes——

Mr. DUNNELL. Is the resolution before the House?

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will resume their seats.

Mr. COX, of New York. I make it a question of privilege. There are two classes of resolutions. I do not know whether my colleague has confused them or not.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I have not, I am clear on the subject—I know it.

Mr. COX, of New York. One is a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. BOWMAN. That is not a question of personal privilege.

Mr. COX, of New York. Whether it requires the action of the House or a question of privilege to compel the committee within the week specified in the rule to report the resolution of inquiry back, or whether in the other case where the committee is instructed by the House to report back a certain matter, not a matter of inquiry, that is the question I should like to raise in the House as a question of privilege. I think the committee under the rules is bound in one week to report all questions of inquiry of the Departments. Why not? How can you reach them if not by a question of privilege? Your rules require them to do it. They have not done it in this case.

Take the other resolution, which is a resolution instructing the committee to report forthwith to the House certain matters as to the prompt release of these prisoners. And I beg to say a word on behalf of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, as I understood from them they were waiting for the State Department to give them fuller information. I was advised three of the names out of four named in my resolution of instruction had been already discharged; yet we have no authentic information from the committee or from the Department.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Not one has been discharged; not one American citizen on account of anything we have done here.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am entitled to know, and I raise it as a question of the highest privilege, that the rules of the House shall be obeyed by the committee.

Mr. DUNNELL. The gentleman from New York very well knows that practically it is impossible for committees to report back within a week in a very large number of cases.

Mr. COX, of New York. Never heard of such a case before.

Mr. DUNNELL. The gentleman from New York knows very well the Committee on Foreign Affairs has been busily engaged in carrying out the instructions. The gentleman knows well the English Government has been disposed to concede and accede to the demands of our own Government. Our Government is not at fault, as the Committee on Foreign Affairs will show if it shall be allowed the time necessary for a complete report which will be satisfactory to the gentleman and all other gentlemen.

Mr. COX, of New York. I know no such thing.

Mr. DUNNELL. I object to the arraignment of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in this informal and out of the way manner.

Mr. COX, of New York. I beg to say to my friend from Minnesota——

Mr. DUNNELL. The Speaker has decided it is not a question of privilege.

Mr. COX, of New York. He has not done that; and in answer to what fell from the gentleman I wish to say that I do not arraign the committee, but I am making an excuse for them, if it is possible they can be excused. I think the Chair should decide it is a question of privilege.

Mr. DUNNELL. The Committee on Foreign Affairs will protect itself, and the honor of the House and country, but it must have time.

Mr. COX, of New York. God help the House and country if they are to be protected by neglecting their business. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BOWMAN. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOWMAN. I make the point this is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not decided the question raised on the application of the gentleman from New York, who proposes to have the House take action in relation to this matter. The Chair only indicated it was not within the power of the Chair to enforce the rule, and the inquiry as made to the Chair was not in a strict sense a parliamentary inquiry. But the Chair has not decided that a motion to discharge a committee after it had under consideration a resolution of inquiry for the period allowed by the rule might not be entertained as a question of privilege relating to the business of the House.

Mr. CALKINS. Let me make one suggestion to my friend from New York, that he allow——

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the present discussion is in reference to the order of business.

Mr. BOWMAN. I ask a ruling as to whether this is the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is hearing gentlemen upon the point presented by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CALKINS. I wish to suggest to my friend from New York that the motion or resolution which he has submitted embraces two distinct provisions, and it may not be strictly within the rule as a privileged question at this time. I would suggest to him that he permit it to go over until Monday, when it can be divided and brought before the House when it will be in order.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I thank the gentleman from Indiana for his suggestion and will accept that proposition. I withdraw the resolution for the present, but give notice that I shall offer it on Monday morning.

SARATOGA MONUMENT ASSOCIATION.

Mr. BRAGG. The House will bear with me for a moment while I explain an error which occurred in reference to the passage of a bill last evening. I refer to the bill (H. R. No. 5377) to authorize the Secretary of War to deliver certain cannon to the Saratoga Monument Association. This bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment. In the passage of the bill, at the evening session on yesterday, the wrong bill, the original printed bill, was inadvertently handed to the Clerk and read, and not the amended bill that came from the committee. I desire now to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which that bill was passed, so far as applicable to the bill itself, for the purpose of taking it up and passing it with the amendment reported by the committee, permitting of course the other amendments attached to the bill on yesterday by the action of the House to remain as they are.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire whether the motion to reconsider and lay on the table was made with reference to that bill.

Mr. BRAGG. I do not think it was, although I have not examined closely.

Mr. COX, of New York. I think the motion was made to reconsider and lay on the table.

The SPEAKER. If that be so, it can be taken up only by unanimous consent; and without objection, the motion to lay on the table and all the proceedings back to the engrossment and third reading will be vacated and the bill be considered as again before the House. Is there objection?

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. It was utterly impossible to hear the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin, or to know what motion he has made.

Mr. BRAGG. I stated that the bill which was passed last evening donating certain cannon to the Saratoga Monument Association was not the bill which was reported from the Military Committee, but the original printed bill, which was read by the Clerk by mistake. The bill of the committee had attached to it an amendment which was not in the bill handed to the Clerk and read and passed by the House.

The amendment is this: this is a bill to turn over to the Saratoga Monument Association, for the purpose of the decoration of their grounds and monument, the trophies captured from Burgoyne at the battle of Saratoga; and in order that the trophies presented might be in a more proper condition to add to the decoration of the grounds, and for the purpose contemplated, the Committee on Military Affairs deemed that the battery of four 12-pounder bronze guns which were captured should be appropriately mounted, instead of allowing them to lie around, as they otherwise would have to do. For that reason the Committee on Military Affairs recommended an amendment to the bill, to the effect that these four 12-pounder guns be mounted on suitable carriages before their delivery.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will suggest to my friend from Wisconsin who reports my bill back that the cannon be mounted precisely as they were when they were captured—in the old English style.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that might be done without the necessity of incorporating a specific amendment in the bill.

Mr. COX, of New York. I have thought over the matter a little and come to the conclusion that it might be well to incorporate it.

Mr. BRAGG. I do not know but that was perhaps in contemplation in framing the amendment, which provides for their suitable mounting.

The SPEAKER. The first question before the House will be, Is there unanimous consent to set aside the order by which the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table, so as to bring the bill before the House? This can be done by unanimous consent only.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of War shall cause the four 12-pounder guns to be mounted on suitable carriages before their delivery.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRAGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BOWMAN. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

REFERENCE OF CLAIMS TO THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. BOWMAN. I now call up the special assignment, being the bill under consideration on yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business coming over from yesterday is the bill (H. R. No. 684) to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is recognized as entitled to the floor for fourteen minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. When the House took a recess last evening I was referring to the remarks made a few days ago by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMP] who, I regret to see, is still absent from the House. That gentleman had seen fit to make a most extraordinary statement in regard to the pendency of war claims in Congress. He said that he had been told, and there were many reasons why he should believe, that there are about this Capitol nearly three billions of dollars of such claims in committee-rooms, in pigeonholes and elsewhere, waiting but the advent of the Democratic party to power for their liquidation and payment. Three billions is the amount fixed by the modest member from New York as the amount of claims of this kind which are now pending before Congress and about Congress. I do not know what he means by "elsewhere."

The present war debt is less than two billions of dollars. The gentleman has imagined fabulous claims amounting to one billion dollars more than the present national debt. This is a statement gotten up to frighten small children and is fit only to be retailed in the presence of feeble-minded persons. The idea that any such amount of claims has ever been presented to Congress is absured. The idea that anybody at any time has ever presented or considered such an amount of claims is absurd. There have not been in my opinion ten millions of dollars of private claims of all kinds pending in any one session of Congress in the last twenty years. And the claims imagined by the gentleman from New York are said to be rebel claims, and the parties in interest are said to be waiting but the advent of the Democratic party to power in order that they may be paid this enormous amount of money.

Mr. Speaker, if anybody is waiting about this Hall or in the country anywhere the advent of the Democratic party with the expectation that a rebel claim for one dollar will be paid, that gentleman will wait in vain. The Democratic party has had the opportunity to make a record upon this subject.

Mr. ROBESON. Does the gentleman say we will wait in vain for the advent of the Democratic party? I think so.

Mr. SPRINGER. I say to pay rebel claims.

Mr. ROBESON. If they do not come into power they cannot pay the claims.

Mr. SPRINGER. But you may soon expect the advent of the Democratic party again to power in Congress if we are to believe the signs of the times. I said if any persons are waiting the advent of the Democratic party to power with the expectation that we will audit and pay rebel claims, they will wait in vain. The Democratic party was in the majority in this House during the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses. We found upon the statute-book when we came into power the act creating the Southern claims commission, which was passed by a Republican Congress for the purpose of authorizing the allowance of certain war claims.

From the first session of the Forty-second Congress to the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress the Southern claims commission audited and allowed Southern war claims to the amount of $4,500,000. These were paid in pursuance of acts of Congress passed by the Republican party. There was also passed by the Republicans in 1864 the act of July 4 of that year, under which there have been paid large sums of money session after session upon claims which are examined in the Quartermaster's and Commissary's Departments. From 1874 to 1879, during the Forty-third, Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses, there were allowed claims which had been audited under this act to the amount of $867,000.

For payment of these various claims the Democratic party is in no way responsible. They came to us under laws in existence before the Democratic party was in the majority in this House. There has been no complaint, so far as I know, that the claims audited by the Southern claims commission and through the Departments ought not to have been paid as claims of loyal persons. But there were other private claims allowed not covered by the two acts I have mentioned. I desire to call the attention of gentlemen to bills reported favorably by committees when the Republicans held power in this House and when the Democrats were in power. The bills reported favorably from the War Claims Committee at the first session of the Forty-third Congress, when the Republicans were in power, amounted to $5,912,000; and the number reported favorably at the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress when the Democrats were in power only amounted to $215,000.

During the Forty-fourth Congress my colleague at that time, chairman of the Committee on War Claims, Mr. Eden, made this statement in debate:

> In reply to what has been stated in reference to the number of claims pending before the Committee on War Claims, I wish to state that in the Forty-third Congress there were reported by the committee private claims to the amount of $396,891.63; for the Quartermaster-General, Commissary-General of Subsistence, and commissioner of claims, $1,561,711.76; making the total amount reported, $1,959,603.30. That was a Congress in which our Republican friends had control and there was a larger number of claims before the Committee on War Claims than there was in the Forty-fourth Congress when the Democrats had control. I will state further that in the Forty-fourth Congress the amount of private claims reported amounted to $188,015.30 and the Quartermaster and Commissary Generals, and commissioners of claims, $943,713, the total amount reported being $1,131,828.30. The war claims reported favorably by the Republican committee of the Forty-third Congress exceeds the amount reported by the Democratic committee of the Forty-fourth Congress over $800,000.

If gentlemen will examine the special acts passed in the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses they will see they fell far below the amount of similar acts passed in the previous Congresses when the Republicans were in power. I could refer to the figures on this subject, which I have before me, but I only need to state as an example that the reductions in the Forty-fourth and Forty-fifth Congresses, when the Democrats were in power, in the amount of appropriations for private claims, as compared with the appropriations for private claims in the Forty-second and Forty-third Congresses, were $750,000, being a reduction of more than 33 per cent. This included the allowances by the Southern claims commission and under the act of July 4, 1864.

I wish to say once for all, that so far as I know there is no gentleman on this side of the House or upon the other who has ever knowingly presented a claim growing out of the war, and asked for its payment, in which the claimant did not aver his loyalty and offer to prove it. And further, I do not believe there is a gentleman on this side of the House who has ever asked Congress or any committee of Congress to allow a claim growing out of the war unless the claimant had established his loyalty. If there be such a claim, I call upon any gentleman on either side of the House to mention it. I will pause for an answer. [After a pause.] No one can point to such a case.

There are members of Congress before me who have been here for more than twenty years, even before the war began. There are other honorable gentlemen here, notably the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE,] who has been here eight or nine years, and who has full knowledge of claims of this character. I see also here the late chairman of the Committee on War Claims, the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] and also the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUK,] the present chairman of that committee. I can learn from none of these gentlemen that any claim has ever been pressed upon the attention of Congress or of any committee of Congress in which the claimant was not or did not claim to have been loyal during the war.

In view of this fact, which is admitted here in the presence of the country, which is admitted in the presence of the House from which these slanders have gone out, is it not taxing the credulity of the people to an alarming extent to ask them to believe the wild and reckless statements which have been made on this subject?

Now, in reference to the pending bill, I stated yesterday my fears that this bill would not prove effectual. I believe so from the fact that subsequent Congresses may evade its provisions, should it become a law. There is, in my judgment, nothing that will prevent forever and effectually do away with the vicious system of special legislation except constitutional amendment on this subject.

In the constitution of Illinois, adopted in 1848, there was a provision that corporations should not be created by special act in cases where, in the judgment of the General Assembly, the object of the corporation could be accomplished by a general law. Yet in view of that constitutional provision there were passed in one session of the Illinois Legislature four volumes of special laws, which aggregated 3,355 pages of print. In every session of that Legislature private laws were passed in the face of that constitutional provision, and it was done by declaring at the end of the bill "this act shall be deemed a public act," and therefore the courts held that it was a public act because the Legislature had so declared; and so it will be hereafter in Congress. When gentlemen desire to pass these private bills they will begin or conclude their bills with the statement that "this is a public act and shall take effect from and after its passage." And when the point of order shall be made that such a bill is a private bill and should go to the Court of Claims under the provisions of this law, the mover or introducer of the bill will insist that it is not a private bill because it purports on its face to be a public act.

There are many other ways in which the provisions of this bill can be evaded. Therefore, while I am willing to go as far as any gentleman to procure an enactment which will relieve Congress and the members of this House of the burdens now imposed upon them, I warn gentlemen now that there is but one escape from this enormous evil, and that is through a constitutional prohibition of all special legislation.

Subjects of national interest demand our whole time and attention. The Ways and Means Committee has proposed to farm out the tariff question to a commission, because they have not time to consider the vast interests at stake. The interstate-commerce bill is dragging its slow length along in the Commerce Committee. Questions of improving our water-ways and opening up new avenues of commerce and trade are pressing upon us for consideration. But we have no time. Private claims and correspondence incident thereto, and applicants for office, demand our whole attention. Let us cease legislating for the few and go to work in the interest and for the benefit of the whole people.

I respectfully and urgently request the Committee on the Judiciary to report a constitutional provision on this subject in order that we may submit it to the State Legislatures to assemble next winter. And if this House will not do it, should I have the honor to be a member of the next Congress, I will move it again. I shall continue to urge this subject on the attention of Congress so long as I am a member of it or until it shall have succeeded. If Congress will not act upon the matter, we must go to our Presidential conventions and put it in our platforms and continue to agitate the question until Congress shall divest itself of the great enormity of special and private legislation.

We can stop it now if we will. We could pass this constitutional amendment in fifteen minutes' time under a motion to suspend the rules. Every gentleman understands exactly what provisions will accomplish this object. Let us submit a constitutional amendment prohibiting private and special legislation, and do away with this evil for all time to come.

Mr. BRAGG. I will say in the outset, Mr. Speaker, that I am unalterably opposed to the bill from the Committee on Civil-Service Reform as well as to the bill reported from the Committee on Claims; yet I am favorable to a bill providing for sending to a proper court for proper trial proper cases worthy of their consideration.

This subject which we are now dealing with is a subject upon which the American people are extremely sensitive. And I warn gentlemen who are favoring these bills that they see to it that by their votes they create no jurisdiction which shall have authority to consider and determine cases that the verdict of the American people have set their seal of condemnation upon.

A moderate bill, like the bill introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOWMAN,] representing the Committee on Claims, may be a species of anæsthetic which for the time being will lull us into quiet. But, unless I am much mistaken, if it be carried into effect its results will be such that the men who favor it in this House will call upon the mountains and the hills to fall upon them, that they may hide away from the curses of an indignant and an outraged people.

What are the arguments used in the advocacy of this bill? It is to relieve Congress by creating a judicial commission, which is to consider these cases in lieu of Congress. And as the bill introduced confers no power upon the court to render a judgment in the case, it seems as if coward conscience had warned the committee to shrink from going that far, but had cautioned them to adopt, to accomplish the same end, this quasi-judicial proceeding, so that when the claim comes back to us from the Court of Claims it will come stripped of the character of a war claim and be foisted upon Congress as the adjudication of a court with all the sacred surroundings attached to the judgment of a court, and then it will pass pro forma into an appropriation bill, and the party in power will escape the condemnation of allowing the payment of war claims under the thin guise of the payment of a judgment properly recovered against the United States. But I warn this House that the people are on the alert, and no such flimsy covering will deceive them.

Congress never can be relieved of the annoyance of having claims presented to it so long as the sacred right of petition is preserved. No Congress can prevent its successor from entertaining and considering claims; nor can it prevent any American citizen from presenting to Congress any claim which he may see fit.

We have been told by the gentleman who favors the bill from the Committee on Civil-Service Reform that so long ago as 1854 we established a Court of Claims to which we gave jurisdiction over all claims arising upon contracts. But we are told, and our experience teaches us every day, that that proved a failure in relieving Congress of the pressure upon it. Why? Because the measure of right as it is judged by the claimant is the measure of his demand; and whenever his claim is referred to a court, if that court fails to come up to his measure of right, he appeals from the judgment of the court to the great representative body of the American people, and asks of them relief, not upon the legal ground—these claims are not put upon legal grounds; if they were, the decision of a court having jurisdiction would settle the legality of the claim; but they are put upon the ground of a broad equity, and members of this House and of the other branch of Congress are appealed to day by day and week by week and month by month and year by year upon so-called broad equities, not upon legal rights.

These honest claims which have been spoken of in such pathetic terms by the distinguished gentleman who represents the Committee on Claims are claims that start from mere nothing and after years and years of talk and conversation and description of the merits of the claims by members of the lobby and persons interested in the division of the fund if the claim be paid become wonderfully large and wonderfully honest. These claims, in a great measure, are like wine: they grow richer and better and finer-flavored as year after year rolls over them. They become more and more honest, because the facts against the claim which were familiar to the contemporaries of the claim when it was said to have originated have one by one become dissipated and lost in the lapse of years, while the facts in favor of the claim have been preserved and burnished and polished and added to year by year, until at one end of the claim the facts upon which it really originated are lost, and at the other a glorious presentation made by the claimant and his agents is all that remains to be exhibited to the body to which appeal is made for the exercise of its generosity. Upon the surface of the water, as the poet has described, we see presented to us as it were the bust of a fair and beautiful maiden; but if we follow it down beneath the surface we find the coarse and thick scales of the fish. Yes, most of them are fishy indeed!

It is age that a claim wants to make it prime. Look at the Sutter claim which was gloriously depicted yesterday. What was it? A mere claim of the imagination. The claimant, whose rights were spoken of yesterday, enlisted some men under his command to fight a battle for one of the contesting princes or governors in Mexico. As the condition of rendering this assistance, he required a concession of a large grant of land to be made to him. Under the law that concession required the confirmation by council; but in consequence of the pendency of a battle the council was unable to approve the concession, and it fell, because the troops which this man was hired to vanquish were victorious, and the power that was to complete the grant passed to another and hostile chief. Thus the old man's title failed as his troops failed to achieve victory. Long years afterward he comes to Congress and finds his advocates, the only argument in favor of his claim, which has grown so rich and ripe with age, being that he entertained Frémont most magnificently—that in his own country he entertained with princely hospitality those who called upon him. Look at another one of these honest claimants. I notice it was reported but a day or two since adversely by the Committee on the Judiciary, and laid on the table, yet when that claim was presented to the committee by a distinguished advocate of this District he made its merits so manifest and the defaults of this Government so glaring that without a single objection every member of the sub-committee was ready, as I am informed, to report favorably for the allowance of a claim in excess of $60,000 to this honest citizen of the United States who had been robbed by this cruel and unfeeling Government. But by a mere accident the attention of another member of the committee was called to events which ran back to the period of the war, and in tracing through the Departments the origin of this claim he found that this honest claimant, whose claim had been so gloriously depicted, had been arrested for a conspiracy to defraud the Government out of thousands of dollars and had spent some time in a military prison as a punishment for the fraud he had undertaken to perpetrate. That fact had become lost through the dim vista of years, while the man and his attorney lived to address a committee of Congress and depict in glowing colors the shortcomings of the Government.

I can give you another case which came under my own observation—a peculiarly honest claim from the State of the gentlemen who is to follow me. It was the claim of an old patriot who lived in Baltimore, that hot-bed of secession and rebeldom, (as his papers were pleased to represent;) a man who was the intimate, personal, confidential friend of Abraham Lincoln, (as he claimed;) the man who reached out his hand and saved Maryland from going into secession, (as he alleged.) True patriot was he! Congress was called upon to recognize his services by paying him thousands of dollars for the recruiting of troops and sending to the field Maryland regiments in support of the flag of the Union. I held the papers connected with that claim in my possession during one whole session of the Forty-fifth Congress. It smelled badly, notwithstanding it was garnished with such pretentious representations, but I was for some time unable to detect the precise point of rottenness from which the smell emanated.

The mass of papers was large, almost enough to fill a bushel basket. One day accidentally in shaking up that bundle a paper fell out, and in it a letter. That letter was from the Secretary of War, the Hon. Simon Cameron, stating substantially in reply to a demand for the claim: Sir, we have already paid you vastly more than you are entitled to, and we paid it to you out of consideration for your distinguished service in that rebel city. That begun to open my eyes. I took that for my cue, and I followed that claim until I found way back eighteen years ago Congress had passed a bill under whip and spur paying the man the identical money asked for in the bill I was investigating. That finally disposed of that honest claim, unless it shall turn up in the next half century like the brig Armstrong claim, with a widow and flaxen-haired children interested in it, and then I have no doubt sentimental gentlemen will be found asking remuneration to that distinguished patriot for an honest claim that had been so long unsatisfied by a cruel and unfeeling Government.

These are but a few illustrations of the true inwardness of these very honest claims and claimants that gentlemen are so continually talking about.

It is a source of regret to me that members of this House shall stand here and join in hue and cry against the Government, pronouncing it piratical in its dealings with its citizens, when the Government has a court to which they may all go if they have a legal claim; and the claims which come here to us are claims which are addressed simply to our generosity, having no legal foundation upon which to stand, as the advocates of this bill have from time to time acknowledged.

Again, sir, to illustrate why this bill will afford no relief, I refer to the files of the several committees of this House who have charge of claims, and I venture to say, from my own personal knowledge of what exists in the files of one committee, that there is not a committee having charge of claims in this House but has memorials appealing to this House from decisions of courts of admiralty, from decisions of the Court of Claims, and from decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

I myself have had occasion in the last Congress to examine more than a million and a half of claims in amount which had passed through all the courts of the United States and been pronounced absolutely bad, and still they found their way before Congress and were pressed upon committees as claims which should excite not only sympathy but the feeling of indignation against the Government for its neglect to comply with the demand of the claimants.

Mr. HOUSE. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. BRAGG. I will get to your bill presently.

Mr. HOUSE. I wish to understand as you go on. Do I understand the gentleman to be opposed to Congress paying any claims except those based on legal right which can be enforced in a court?

Mr. BRAGG. I will answer the gentleman by saying I am not discussing the right of Congress to pay any claimant now. Neither do I propose to involve in the discussion of this bill the question whether Congress ought to pay any claim or not. I have stated in the outset I am in favor of referring proper claims to proper courts in a proper manner for judicial determination, not findings to be sent back again for us to have the ground all gone over again.

Mr. BOWMAN. I should like to ask the gentleman if he will allow me a question?

Mr. BRAGG. Certainly.

Mr. BOWMAN. Does he mean to define proper claims as used by him as meaning legal claims?

Mr. BRAGG. I will state to the gentleman when I come to that clause of his bill what I mean by proper claims. Now, sir, while I have endeavored to show the effort will be fruitless to relieve the House, I will now endeavor to show that the tribunal which is selected, the method in which the cases are to be considered and the lack of finality of determination will add to instead of diminish the trouble and cares which will fall on this House as a legislative body. In the first place I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that the Court of Claims is not the proper court; and for that I will give my reason. The Court of claims is located in the city of Washington; the Court of Claims has a rule under which evidence is taken and which governs and controls its transaction of business.

All evidence taken in that court substantially must be taken on commission by written deposition, the court never seeing the witness, and, as was said by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts yesterday, the evidence of a thief, the evidence of a convicted perjurer reads as smoothly on paper as the evidence of a man of the most perfect honesty and integrity. The transfer of this amount of business to the Court of Claims must of necessity make an accumulation of business in that court which cannot be properly attended to. For instance, 17,000 claims from the Quartermaster-General's Department, thousands upon thousands of claims from the Treasury, thousands upon tens of thousands which will proceed from the legislative body, all piled in upon that court, some from Oregon, some from California, some from Maine, some from Florida. What force have we in the Department of Justice that can be able to proceed to the localities whence these claims originated and ferret out the details of the claims, looking up witnesses who can testify to the truth of the facts in relation to the claims and bring them back here so their deposition may be taken under the order of the Court of Claims?

Particularly will the difficulty arise when, as this bill provides, you may go back twenty, thirty, forty, or fifty years with your claim. You have here merely the Attorney-General's Office. The people of the vicinage familiar with the claim, familiar with the facts on which it is based, are far remote; the trial is not to take place there; no information can be procured except by proceeding to the vicinage and there verifying the allegations contained in the claim. That cannot be done in the Attorney-General's Office. What will inevitably be the result? The result will be that the Attorney-General of the United States will be utterly powerless to defend the Government from thousands and tens of thousands of cases which will be reached in their order upon the Calendar, and the court and the Attorney-General will be tied hand and foot, because, being practically confined to the facts stated in the papers themselves and the affidavits, all rights which the Government would otherwise have as a defense will be forfeited. If that proves to be the result, as it seems to me it must be, this bill should be entitled "A bill to surrender the Treasury of the United States to the claim agents in Washington." But not only that, it would seem as if the Committee on Claims when they prepared the bill had provided for that by incorporating a provision that this mass of proof, this ex parte evidence that has been so thoroughly denounced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] shall be transferred bodily to that court, where the claims are to be docketed and filed, and the court will have every one of these affidavits before them for consideration. So that when a claim is reached and this vast accumulation of fraudulent affidavits is considered, the Government will have no kind of defense against dishonest claims, because it will be replied, "here is a bill prepared by this Congress which forces us to consider these affidavits, and nem con the claim must be allowed, unless the Government be prepared with evidence in rebuttal." [Mr. BOWMAN rose.] I see the gentleman from Massachusetts is prepared for a question, but I think I can anticipate it.

Mr. BOWMAN. I hope the gentleman will allow me to put it into words; it will take but a moment. I wish to ask if the gentleman from Wisconsin means to say seriously that he believes that the Court of Claims, when a case comes there, would try it on ex parte evidence without examination of witnesses or without evidence being taken by the Attorney-General?

Mr. BRAGG. Do I believe it? Yes. Why will they do it? They will say, "We have no responsibility in this matter. We regard it that the legislation of Congress is of such a character that these parties can come here with this class of evidence and force a judicial determination upon that evidence alone." But it is so written in the book. They will say, "The blame lies with the Congress. They must not say that we did it." There can be no prevention of it because the gentleman from Massachusetts in his bill provides that they shall do it.

Mr. BOWMAN. But does not the bill provide that the Attorney-General or his assistants under his direction shall appear for the defense and protection of the interests of the United States in all cases which may be transmitted to the Court of Claims under this act?

Mr. BRAGG. It does so state. But I say to the gentleman as a lawyer, not as standing here defending the bill and advocating its passage simply because it comes from his committee, but as a lawyer, when a case that has been term after term, with the plaintiff ready for trial, and the other side term after term unable to come to trial, after this extends to three or four terms of the court, the court cannot and will not longer wait, but will say to the Attorney-General, "You have behind you all the power of the Government. If the Government has failed to secure its witnesses (and we have given you ample time) it is not the fault of the claimant or the court," and when the Attorney-General pleads press of business, says he could not do it, says that Congress has devolved such an avalanche of business upon him that his force is utterly inadequate to keep up with the Calendar, the court will reply, "True, Mr. Attorney-General, but these cases must be disposed of; this docket must be cleared." Under such circumstances, how much is the Government protected by the clause in the bill requiring him to be present and defend its interests? All the Attorney-General can do is to be a witness to the rendition of a judgment upon an undefended case, and curse the folly of a Congress that placed him in such an unenviable position!

But it is stated that there is another safeguard. What is it? That committees may or may not send these papers in their discretion. Now, that I will not call by what I think its proper term; but I will say it is a poor excuse to bridge over the difficulty, but it comes very properly from the committee who only yesterday, when speaking through their chairman, who had his attention called to the fact by one of his colleagues from Massachusetts, that this bill might prove a Pandora's box by the bringing back to life millions of rejected and disallowed claims, barred by statute, and giving them a standing in court again to be considered and passed, replied, "Oh, don't mention that; we kept it out of the bill, and we don't want to run upon that snag now." I say that, with this frank avowal from the chairman of the committee, I have a right to claim that this is a very poor excuse, to say the least, that these claims will go to the Court of Claims only by direction of a committee. Do you want to put the work upon some one else?

Does not the gentleman know, does not every gentleman here know, that if a mass of papers is piled up in a committee-room of the House, and a party comes in here asking a recognition of his claim, stating that it involves questions that necessarily require time to examine and investigate, and time to ascertain and establish the exact condition of the facts involved, and you are asked to send it to the Court of Claims or some other commission or board, thereby taking it from you and imposing the labor upon another tribunal or body, if there is a single committee here or elsewhere that would not be willing and anxious to relieve itself of the labor and let it go?

The trouble is the Committee on Claims is like a doctor who asks us to swallow his medicine, and when we ask him what the effect of it is to be upon us, he says to us "Oh, wait and see." I am unwilling to wait and see. I desire to understand now before I do this thing what its effect and what its operation will be; so that when it goes into effect I shall have no reason to regret either that I favored it, if I should do so, or that I opposed it, as I now do.

Now, another objection, and I leave the first section for my last comments upon this bill. This bill refers all disputed questions in any departments of the Government to this court to ascertain the facts and the law. When I was a very young man, which is a good many years ago, I used to think that the moment a man mounted the bench that moment he ceased to be a specimen of humanity and that he ranked akin to the gods. But an experience of thirty-five years' practice before these gentlemen occupying those positions has taught me that a man is a man no matter where you place him; he is subject to all the influences, to all the sympathetic feelings, to all the outside pressures that are broght to bear upon ordinary humanity wherever you may find it. Humanum est errare applies as well to the bench as it does to the legislature. And I have learned further, Mr. Speaker, to put a lawyer of mediocrity on the bench did not make him any better a lawyer than he was when he stood practicing at the bar. The only difference is that on the bench he can make the law to suit himself, and on the other his success depended upon demonstrating upon principle and authority what the law was; the latter condition requiring vastly more knowledge and greater brain power than the former.

Why should you send the mooted questions arising between this Government and foreign nations, or between this Government and claimants in the Departments, for judicial opinion to the Court of Claims? Is there a man upon the Court of Claims whose name stands half so high upon the roll of fame in his profession as the distinguished Attorney-General of the United States? Has it belittled him that he has become the head of the Department of Justice; and has it magnified three, four, or five country lawyers in importance or knowledge that they should be mounted up here on a commission of claims to ascertain and audit them as they are presented from the Departments?

Are not the law knowledge and legal reputation of the Attorney-General of the United States better for the Government to rely upon than the decisions of these gentlemen, although they may be called judges of the Court of Claims? In what respect do they excel in legal knowledge, experience, or probity the Attorney-General or his assistant attorneys-general or the several attorneys-general in each Department who furnish their legal opinions upon all questions pending before them? Has the Court of Claims at last absorbed all the legal learning of this day and generation into its body? I should say, Mr. Speaker, if they had I should regret that so learned, erudite a body should, by indirection, in their communications with the committees of this House invite this transfer of business to their jurisdiction. I do not wish to speak otherwise than in terms of respect for the present occupants of the bench, but I cannot resist the impulse which impels me to say that to make a court a committee to do the work of this House and report its findings to this House for its review and action will present an anomaly in the history of the judiciary.

Now, sir, as to the first clause of this bill. The first clause in this bill transfers every imaginable claim, real, equitable, legal, genuine, fictitious, of every and all kinds, and gives it a standing in court with a Congressional indorsement.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Any claim or matter.

Mr. BRAGG. Any claim or matter. That means all we have and all others that can be conjured up between now and the time we pass the bill. We sanctify what heretofore has never dared show its face in a court by a quasi-indorsement as worthy of consideration by thus sending it to a court and authorizing the court to take its pedigree written by its author as evidence of the truth of the facts stated in it. We do it irrespective of any limitation. Why, sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] says there are limitations. What are they? Why, the reasonable limitations, limitations that are ordinarily known to law, said he. Is that so? Would my friend state that if he were arguing a case under such a statute at the bar? Would he state that there was any objection to it except that it was stale, and instead of being able to plead any statute of limitations, would he not argue that by reason of the staleness of the claim and by analogy to other statutes of limitations the court ought in its discretion to apply a statute? That is as far as he could go; that is all he could say. And what would the court say to him then? The court would say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, "Sir, that might have been the law had this claim come to us without being sent from Congress to be considered and passed upon on its merits; but when you send it to us to determine, you have decided that there is no statute of limitations, else you would not have sent it to us; you yourselves by your action have by implication repealed any statute applicable to it, and we take it as your bantling, not ours, and must decide it upon the law and the fact as we find it."

Mr. BOWMAN. As the gentleman from Wisconsin has pointed to me and asked me a question, will he let me answer now?

Mr. BRAGG. I beg the gentleman's pardon if he thought I pointed to him.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word to him in reply?

Mr. BRAGG. Not in the way of a speech.

Mr. BOWMAN. He asked, "What would the gentleman from Massachusetts say to that?"

Mr. BRAGG. I am perfectly willing to answer any question the gentleman chooses; but I cannot possibly stop in the limited time given me to have incorporated in my remarks a speech by another gentleman. I listened to the gentleman's speech yesterday, and I am now trying to reply to what he said; and he can add nothing to the strength of what he said yesterday by repeating it to-day.

Mr. BOWMAN. If the gentleman was putting an improper construction upon the bill, as I thought, I supposed he would allow me a word, inasmuch as I permitted him several times yesterday to interrupt me.

Mr. BRAGG. Although I am not able at this moment to put my hand on the decisions of the Court of Claims and other courts, I will state that they have ruled precisely as I have said upon that question; that the very fact that we referred a case to them, if it was barred by an express statute, is a Congressional enactment, relieving that case from the effect of the statute and sending it to them to consider and determine, irrespective of the statute. If we intended to rely upon the statute, we would not send it to them, but ascertain the statute and stand upon it. But when we waive the statute and send the case to them, they take it as it comes to them.

Mr. SPRINGER. But under this bill they take it to ascertain facts only; they make no judgment.

Mr. BRAGG. I will come to that in a moment. I will say that I regret that a man who stands here and denounces war claims, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] does, should put a little anodyne into his conscience so that he can sustain this bill and send every claim of that kind to the Court of Claims. And each such claim will come back, not as a war claim, but as a judicial determination found upon the law and the facts by the Court of Claims. Each such claim will then go into an appropriation bill and when it is challenged—as such a claim was challenged here the other day in the case of an appropriation to pay railroads for carrying mails when one of the conditions of the grant to such railroads was that they should carry the mails free—we will be told that the court has decided in favor of the claim. The Supreme Court of the United States decided that that act was unconstitutional. We insisted here in this House, at least over in this quarter of the House, that we were bound by our construction of our own grants, and out of respect to ourselves we should stand upon that determination. We were told: this is the judicial determination of the courts; do you stand here to repudiate the decisions of the highest judicial tribunal of the land? And that is what will be said when these claims come back here.

What said the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] the other day, when a bill came in here to appropriate money to pay the claims audited by the Departments? He stood up here and resisted the passage of that bill. He said it was an outrage that such a bill should be allowed to pass, and yet what was the bill? It was a bill to pay the accounts audited under the law by the accounting officers of the Treasury, a bill which had passed a committee of this House, a bill which had been determined to be correct in every particular.

Yet here you are asking us to take not merely $112,000, as that bill did, but hundreds of millions of dollars away from public view and send the claims down to this court with their ex parte testimony to be made a portion of the record of that court. And when these claims come back here they will come back not as claims but as judicial findings; so much due A and B, so much due C and D, &c. And if this House ever desires to ascertain the correctness of such findings it will have to go into an examination of the cases de novo, just as before they were sent to the Court of Claims. Otherwise we must rely upon the judgment of the court and pass them nem con.

This bill makes no limitation of claims for ravages and depredations during the war. It opens the doors of the court to every sort of claim and matter which arose during the war, and sends it for determination to a court that has decided that pardon and amnesty relieve claimants from the disability resulting from the rebellion. That the people who may read my remarks, outside of this grave and distinguished assembly, if any should choose to do so, may know that when I am talking about millions I know a little something of what I am talking about, I will call the attention of this House to one small item of claims that will go before this court for consideration. First, the proceeds of property taken under the captured and abandoned property act. The amount now covered into the Treasury as proceeds of captured and abandoned property is $24,251,269.93. Start with that at the head of your column. The cotton tax, said to be above $60,000,000, comes also in the line.

Now, to show you the class of proof you authorize to be transferred to that court to support these claims, I will call your attention to another item. The cotton captured after June 1, 1865, approximates in value the sum of $5,500,000, as appears from official Treasury documents, representing 50,000 bales of cotton, nearly all seized as owned by the so-called confederate government, which had purchased it of citizens in exchange for confederate bonds delivered to those citizens. Yet on this fund, confessedly arising from cotton of this character, claims are already filed before the Secretary of the Treasury, all individual claims, under the act of March, 1872, covering 136,000 bales, nearly three times the amount seized, and aggregating in value $18,000,000, proven to be property taken, when the amount really taken as the sales show was but about 50,000 bales, aggregating in amount $5,500,000. Yet the felicitous imagination of the claim agent has already expanded the claims for that property to $18,000,000.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me right there?

Mr. BRAGG. Yes.

Mr. REAGAN. The claims reported——

Mr. BRAGG. I beg pardon. I cannot permit you to make a speech. I thought you wanted to ask a question.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not want to make a speech, but to make a suggestion which ought to accompany your idea, because it misleads as to the truth.

Mr. BRAGG. I am stating not what ought to be allowed, or what has been allowed, but the fund and the amount of claims as they have accumulated in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. REAGAN. But I want to call the attention of the House to the fact——

Mr. BRAGG. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] misunderstands me.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not misunderstand you. If you will allow me to state——

Mr. BRAGG. The amount of the property taken after 1865 is $5,500,000; confessedly the greater part of it having been cotton, which was transferred to the confederate government by the owners, who received the bonds of the confederate States, the confederate cotton being used to be shipped abroad to be drawn against in support of the then dying confederate government.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. BRAGG. Against that fund of $5,500,000 there are already filed claims for $18,000,000.

Mr. REAGAN. Will not the gentleman allow me to state what makes a contract, and call his attention to——

Mr. BRAGG. No, sir; not now.

Mr. REAGAN. Because you do not wish the House to understand the truth.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, I deny the right of any member of this House to insist upon making a speech while I am addressing the House. If he desires to ask me a question, I am always ready and willing, if my time will permit it, to allow him to do so.

Mr. REAGAN. I did not undertake to make a speech—simply to state the facts.

Mr. BRAGG. For him to stand here as the representative of that interest, when I am not reflecting upon it at all, but simply seeking to show the class of proof which is filed in support of claims—for him to stand here in an indignant manner and make a fling at me because I will not permit him to occupy my time, is not only unparliamentary but seems to me to be a lack of courtesy that I should have expected from almost any one else in this House sooner than from my distinguished friend.

Mr. REAGAN. Is it worse than to make a statement of fact and refuse to permit a correction?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. JOYCE.) The gentleman from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. BRAGG. Now, I turn to another item of claim which, perhaps, will not be so disagreeable to my friend to hear referred to. The State of Pennsylvania has filed a claim of $3,450,909 as its share of the plunder. There has just been presented to the Committee on War Claims, and it has received an authoritative support by a report of a committee of this House, the commencement of claims for payment for damages incurred in the erection of fortifications which were built to protect this capital. After these claims had slept for twenty years, after they have been rejected by the Court of Claims, the claimants now turn round and have discovered that all the cutting of timber, all the destruction of homesteads was done by the engineers of the United States. Their saplings are converted into oak timber; the computation of price is made by the cubic inch and foot; and claims to the amount of thousands and tens of thousands are on their way to address themselves to the generosity of this House. Any one who is familiar with the chain of forts extending around this capital during the war and who will acquaint himself with the bills which have come in asking payment of damages by reason of the construction of those forts must see that $10,000,000 will be a small sum to meet the measure of damages claimed by the people, who say that their homes were destroyed and their forests cut down in the defense of the capital.

I simply allude to these classes of claims without discussing their merits at all, but to say that this bill opens the door of the Court of Claims and gives it jurisdiction to hear, determine, decide, and report to this House the extent of these claims, which, as the House will readily see, must reach millions upon millions of dollars.

This bill opens the door to claims for payment for all the ravages and devastations in Missouri. It opens the door to claims for payment for all damages and destruction of property done in Kentucky. It opens the door to claims from Indiana, to claims from Ohio. They are all waiting now with their noses peering through the crack to get in first. It opens the door not only to Tennessee but to every claim in any insurrectionary State, without limitation or reserve.

I say that this Congress ought never to pass such a bill or to entertain it for a moment, and that any man who votes for a bill which will have such results will in years hence hardly dare to meet his constituents face to face.

As to the other bill, the bill reported by the Committee on Civil-Service Reform, I hope the gentleman who has charge of it will excuse me if I call it a jumble and a hotchpot. I mean no reflection upon the committee; but I mean, as I am going to say with reference to the identical bill under consideration, that no proper conservative bill can be passed if it is made up by amendments as they are shot in by members of the House without due consideration of the measure as a whole. A bill made up as evidently this bill will be made when it passes this House should not pass until recommitted to some committee, who should take all the amendments and suggestions which have been made and revise the bill so as to make it homogeneous in all its parts.

Now, to illustrate what I mean. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSE] reports a bill. This bill as it was originally drawn was homogeneous; it was uniform; it had no crudities or awkward things in it. Somebody moved an amendment, and in the sixth section it reads:

> No private claim which accrued, of the character described in section 2 of this act, prior to the year 1866, and which has not been pending before Congress or some one of the Executive Departments since the year 1860, shall be heard by the Court of Claims, or considered by Congress or any of the Executive Departments.

This is an amendment inserted in the bill; the original bill read "1861;" and with this date the provision would harmonize with other provisions; but the insertion of this amendment makes the bill a hotch-potch. Why? Because section 2, to which this amendment by way of limitation is applicable, does not specify any particular class of cases; whereas section 4 provides specifically for the determination and trial of the identical cases excluded by section 6. It states what facts shall be found, how they shall be reported, and what evidence shall be necessary.

Such is the effect of the incongruous amendment that has been inserted in the bill. It is not the fault of the committee; but it demonstrates the fact that it is unsafe in bills of grave importance to have material amendments shot into the body of the bill without an opportunity to compare them fully with the provisions of the measure.

Mr. HOUSE. The gentleman will permit me to state that these amendments he is talking about were put on the bill by the committee. The bill was first printed and recommitted.

Mr. BRAGG. Then I must say that the committee must have been blind, at least in one eye, because by section 6 you provide that "no private claim which accrued, of the character described in section 2 of this act, prior to the year 1866, and which has not been pending before Congress or some one of the Executive Departments since the year 1860, shall be heard by the Court of Claims, or considered by Congress or any of the Executive Departments."

Section 2 of the act provides:

> Any person having a claim or matter against the United States in respect of which he desires relief by special act of Congress, and of which the Court of Claims could not under existing laws take jurisdiction, may, before applying to Congress for such relief, file a petition.

In section 6, by the amendment, you exclude from the consideration of the court every case that would be covered by the provisions of section 2. Then by section 4 you provide for a specific class of cases, showing apparently that by the construction of the committee the cases specified in section 4 are not within the purview of section 2; and while your limitation would apparently exclude all the cases which arose during the war—from 1861 to 1866—section 4 provides specifically for the determination of all the claims which are war claims and were within that period.

Mr. HOUSE. There is no incongruity. A war claim is a claim in respect to which the party requires a special act of Congress, as in section 2.

Mr. BRAGG. Let us see. If the gentleman means what he says, and section 4 contains what is in section 2, and section 6 by the amendment puts a limitation so no case shall be heard except what is in section 2, why did you put in section 4? If you guard section 4 by the amendment to section 6, why do you re-enact section 4? Why not let section 2 stand and then let section 6 apply, which bars all the claims provided in section 4?

Mr. HOUSE. If the gentleman will allow me—I know he does not intend to misrepresent the bill.

Mr. BRAGG. I am reading the bill.

Mr. HOUSE. Section 4 was put in because it refers to war claims, preserving the policy of the Government in respect to the loyalty of claimants.

Mr. BRAGG. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Does your statute of limitations in section 6 apply to war claims?

Mr. HOUSE. I think it does.

Mr. BRAGG. Why do you put section 4 in? There was no war claim which arose after 1866. Every war claim arose between 1861 and August 1865. Section 6 bars every one of those claims if it is to have the force and effect gentlemen claim for it. If it does bar——

Mr. HOUSE. It accrues prior to the year 1866; I ask the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BRAGG. Certainly we misunderstand ourselves. Let us read the provisions of section 6: "No private claim which accrued prior to the year 1866 of the character described in section 2 of this act shall be heard." So section 6 prohibits the hearing of any claim which arose prior to 1866, provided that claim be covered by section 2. Section 2 by its general language would cover everything; but when you embodied section 4, "in any case of claim for supplies or stores taken by or furnished to any part of the military or naval forces of the United States for their use during the war for the suppression of the rebellion, or for the destruction of or damage to property by any part of said forces, the petition shall aver, &c.," then what would be the construction of that act? Your limitation applies to 2, when in 4 you make a specific case for a particular kind of cases and provide how they shall be tried and determined. The construction of that act must be—for it must be construed so as to stand altogether—that the claims specified in section 4 by the lawmaker were not included under provisions included in section 6, else if they are included section 4 is a nullity and should be stricken from the bill. If section 4 is to be retained in the bill section 4 nullifies section 6, so far as all war claims are concerned, and Pandora's box, with its contents, is reserved to trouble and plague this Government, notwithstanding the form of limitation which this bill purports to have in it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have stated in brief my objection to each one of these bills, that they do not accomplish the purpose their framers intend, that they do not fill the measure of benefit which their advocates insist they will, and that they are obnoxious, because they do away with the statutes of limitation and open courts to a class of cases which have never yet been bold enough to demand admission to the courts, and dare not now, except they come in generically under the general term of claims and that we give them a foothold in the courts we ought not to give them and destroy all the protections and limitations which year after year of legislation sustained by public sentiment have caused to be passed and enforced.

And I do not believe there is a single member on either side of this House who is anxious or desirous personally and upon his own consideration that any such door should be thrown open. I do not think any member on this side of the House, any more than any member on the other side of the House, would be desirous to bring down upon this House that flood of claims. Why, sir, that horde of claimants would almost darken the air, and the ravages of the locusts in Egypt would dwindle into insignificance in comparison with their raids upon the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BRAGG. I desire, with the permission of the House, to append a few remarks to show why I favor the bill known as the Edmunds bill, which I have offered as a substitute for the pending bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BRAGG. My reasons briefly are that it closes the door of the courts against claims sounding intort or arising out of implied contract which originated during the war. It imposes a short limitation and it sends the claimant to the Federal court of the district where the claim arose, where the witnesses live, and where the truth or falsity of the claim may be cheaply and readily determined. I have not time to elaborate.

Mr. URNER. I yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Georgia. [Mr. STEPHENS.]

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Speaker, I wish, with the indulgence of the House, to submit a few remarks only upon the general principles embodied in the pending proposition. I regard this bill as one of the most important measures that has been submitted to Congress within the last ten years. It involves the great question of how claims against the Government may best be adjudicated.

All governments necessarily incur debts and liabilities, and against all governments unjust claims are likely to be brought, and ours, perfect as it is, and I believe it is the best, is no exception to the general rule. Now, then, how shall claims pending before either branch of Congress or before the Departments of the Government be best adjudicated and settled? That is the question submitted here. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that all good governments are divided into three divisions of sovereign powers—the law making, the law expounding, and the law executing; that is, the legislative, the judicial, and the executive powers of sovereignty. These are the three potentialities of all good governments, and which constitute the grandeur above all others of our own systems of government, State and Federal. These are like the three potentialities, separate and distinct, which constitute the trinity in unity of that Omnipotence which rules the moral universe with perfect justice and right.

These with us are separate, coequal, and independent. The law-making power has no conflict with the judicial power, neither the law-making power nor the law-expounding power should clash with each other. These three principles on which our Government is based are and should remain forever distinct, separate, and independent of each other.

Now, then, it is the province of Congress to pass laws; it is the law-making power under our system. It is the body clothed by the Constitution with all power necessary to pass laws within its limited jurisdiction under the fundamental law. We are to pass the laws; the judiciary are to expound them, and to adjudge rights to people who have them under the law. Then it is the duty of the Executive to see that the mandates of the courts are carried out.

Now, I say in response to the objections which have been made by the honorable gentleman from Wisconsin to this bill, that I, favoring as I do such a method of adjudicating the rightful claims of persons against the Government, am by no means for opening the doors to any horde of hungry cormorants seeking the Treasury.

I suppose there have been, and will be for all time, unjust claims against the Government. But I am for opening the door for this adjudication of these claims by a judicial tribunal—yes, of all claims, whether they be just or unjust. If they be just, they should be paid; if unjust, they should be rejected. I am for opening the door for a legal hearing to every man who has a demand which under the law he has a right to make. Every man in our Government has a right to have his claim inquired into, and we should establish courts to ascertain, adjudicate, and fix the extent of his rights, if he has any, and reject his claim if it is not based upon a legal right. It is our duty to establish courts to settle all such questions and to which all such matters should be referred. I do not care if we do open the doors, nor how wide we open them. I want them opened wide enough to admit every one, whether high or low, who has a wrong unredressed to have a judicial hearing. Now, it is asserted that there are many claims against the Government, and that many of them have been here for ten or twenty years. The honorable gentleman from Wisconsin has alluded to a great many of that class. That is all true. I know that there are many claims here; but if they are right they ought to be investigated and paid, even though they amount to millions and are covered with a century of years.

I know claims, sir, that I met with when I first came to Congress in 1843. There was the claim of the privateer Armstrong which very recently was allowed by this Congress, a claim founded upon the strictest principles of international law. There was the old French spoliation claim, as just a one as was ever presented, in my judgment. It has been passed by two Congresses. I will not give the history of it, but it was vetoed, chiefly, I believe, for the want of money. That was not a good excuse. Public credit is the basis of national glory. Junius said of it that it was to England what the plumage was to the eagle, that bore it in grandeur to its loftiest heights. Public credit is founded in honesty. The government that will not pay to its humblest citizens what is justly due them affords but little ground on which to base a character for sustaining public credit in the estimation of other nations. Governments are established for the security and protection of private as well as public rights. I am for maintaining the public credit in every respect. I am in favor of paying the honest debts due to individuals, however long standing they may be.

As my time is short I shall not go into the general details of this bill or the substitute offered for it. I do not mean to go into the merits of either proposition. I am for a settlement of these questions by court, and I believe that this reference of them to the Court of Claims is eminently proper and wise. I am in favor, when a man says he has been wronged by the Government or that the Government justlyowes him anything under law, of directing him to a proper judicial tribunal and let him bring his case and evidence before it, have it investigated, and let that tribunal say whether or not he presents a question of right. If he cannot prove his claim let him be turned out of court.

The gentleman from Wisconsin speaks of cases coming all the way from California and other distant places here, and the difficulty of securing evidence to disprove such claims. But the claimant must establish the truth of his claim before any court will allow it. The burden of proof is upon him. When a truth is established it cannot be disproved. Truths never collide. Two truths can never be brought in antagonism to each other. They are immutable and eternal, and when a truth is established it can never be disproved by counter testimony; and if a man presents a claim which is founded in fact, a claim based upon truth and equity, no country and no government can afford to trifle with it or ignore it, however humble may be the individual. That is my answer to him. I would open the door to anybody, invite him to come in and have a hearing and establish his right, if he has any, and if the right is established, pay him his dues.

The gentleman seemed to intimate that he would not trust the court, for it might do unbounded mischief. Mr. Speaker, I hold that the judiciary of this country is the firmest, the soundest, and most lasting of all the special bulwarks that we have for the security of personal rights and protection of constitutional liberty. Others may give way. Your Senate, your House, and your other branches of the Government may give way, but my last hope is in the integrity and firmness of the judiciary; and therefore I would infinitely prefer the reference of all these claims to a court properly created and regulated rather than to Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. JOYCE.) The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. STEPHENS. I desire only a moment more.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I ask that by unanimous consent the time of the gentleman be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS. I desire simply to repeat that in my judgment the legislative, the law-making power of any country is not the one to adjudicate rights under the laws they make.

We have the law-making power; we have the law-expounding power; that is the judiciary; and then we have the Executive. But I say that everything pertaining to the adjudication of rights should be excluded from the legislative power. It belongs to the judiciary. And I am for such a court properly constituted. I do not know whether these propositions will carry out my ideas. I have only given my general view of the subject and I shall vote for anything in that direction to begin with. [Applause.]

Mr. URNER. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE.]

Mr. HOUSE. I desire only for a moment to reply to what the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] was pleased to term an incongruity in the bill I had the honor to report to the House. The incongruity, Mr. Speaker, is not in the bill at all, but is in the gentleman's misapprehension of its meaning.

The gentleman from Wisconsin says that section 2, section 4, and section 6 are inconsistent with each other. Now, section 2 describes a certain class of cases. What are they? That class of cases in respect to which the party wishes a special act of Congress. Now, that includes a war claim as well as all other claims, because a war claim needs a special act from Congress as well as any other. Then the fourth section goes on to provide that in respect to the war claims you shall do something else than is required in section 2, to wit, you are to prove your loyalty.

And now comes section 6, prescribing a limitation that applies to all cases included in section 2, war claims as well as others:

> No private claim which accrued of the character described in section 2 of this act prior to the year 1866, and which has not been pending before Congress or some one of the Executive Departments since the year 1860, shall be heard by the Court of Claims.

My colleague [Mr. HOUK] yesterday represented my bill as barring all claims that accrued prior to the year 1866. It does nothing of the sort, Mr. Speaker. The claim must accrue prior to the year 1866. And what else? If a claim of that sort has not been pending before Congress or some one of the Executive Departments from the year 1860 up to the present time, why, then, it is barred. We treat it as a stale demand. But if the party has been knocking at the door of Congress he is not barred. There is no incongruity whatever in it. It is all in the gentleman's imagination.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. URNER. I do not think there is any difference of opinion that some legislation is required for the purpose of relieving Congress from the great mass of private claims in our committee-rooms and crowding our calendars. What that legislation shall be, and what kind of claims shall be reached by it, are questions of very great importance.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] said that the American people are extremely sensitive upon this question of claims. That may be true, Mr. Speaker. The American people are very sensitive upon the question of claims because they do not want any dishonest, any unjust claims to be paid out of the Treasury. But, if I know the sentiment of the American people at all, I do not think they are sensitive upon the question of paying just and honest claims. I believe they want the very best facilities presented to the private claimant to get an adjudication of his claim and a speedy and cheap settlement of it.

This question has been precipitated to some extent and has come up earlier than I supposed it would, and therefore I am not prepared to speak upon it as elaborately as I would have desired, and only have the preparation that I made yesterday while hearing the debates. But there are some facts to which I wish to call the attention of the House. I hold in my hand a volume of the reports on alien claims in the second session of the Forty-third Congress, a book that is full of most valuable information upon this question. During the administration of General Grant, the hero of our war, the man who had led our armies on to victory in the field and who when the war was over wanted justice to be done in time of peace—I say under his administration an effort was made to ascertain what the practice of other governments was on this question of paying claims of private citizens. Secretary Fish therefore sent communications to our representatives to foreign governments, asking them to get information as to what the practice was in those governments and what facilities were offered to enable the private claimant against his government to have a speedy and early settlement of his claim.

And I find, Mr. Speaker, that in nearly all the civilized nations of the world, and especially in the three great countries of Germany, France, and England, tribunals are established in which the private citizen can go and present his case, furnish his proof, and have his claim investigated and adjudicated when against the government or the crown, with the same facility as if it was against an individual. I shall not take up the time of the House now in reading to any very great extent on this subject; but I desire to call attention first to France, now a republic, to show what that nation did after the Franco-German war.

I read from page 74 of this book containing the information obtained through the efforts of Secretary Fish referred to:

According to the laws of France, an action may be brought against the state by a private individual either before the civil or administrative tribunals, according to the nature of the case. If the state is sentenced to pay a sum of money, such sum is taken from the budget of expenditures, and as it is the duty of the legislative branch to vote the budget, it follows that the legislative branch really provides for the payment.

After the close of that war, during which the citizens of France had suffered not only by the demands made upon them to supply the wants of their own army but also by reason of the requisitions of the German army, one of the first things that the Government of France did was to devise a plan by which their people who had suffered during the war should become indemnified and reimbursed for their losses.

I am prompted to some extent to speak upon this question because my own constituents are immediately interested in it—the question of "war claims"—which whenever mentioned in this House shocks the nervous system of certain distinguished gentlemen on both sides. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] says these claims have no legal standing. If that is true, it is because Congress has been derelict in the discharge of its duty and has not provided a tribunal into which the claimants can go and assert their rights.

In regard to these claims I assert that they are legal according to the well-recognized principles of international law, which should not only govern Congress but will govern the court whenever a bill is passed enabling these claimants to go into the Court of Claims or any other court that may be provided for their adjudication—those principles of international law which are recognized and respected in all civilized countries, and which are so clearly and tersely set forth in the book to which I have already referred and from which I shall further quote. After the close of the Franco-German war, one of the first things the French Government did was to pass laws for the relief of its citizens who had suffered by the war. The following is an enumeration of them according to their respective dates:

Law of June 15, 1871, on requisitions.

Law of September 6, 1871, granting the sum of 106,000,000 francs to the sufferers by the war.

Law of April 7, 1873, providing for an additional grant of 260,000,000.

Law of July 28, 1874, granting still another sum of 26,000,000 to a special class of sufferers.

The law of June 15, 1871, provides:

ARTICLE 1. The bearers of requisition certificates given by the French authorities, civil or military, since the beginning of the war, shall be obliged, under penalty of forfeiting all claim upon the treasury, to deposit, within two months, at the office of the prefect of the department, or at that of the sub-prefect of the district in which such requisitions are made, the said certificates, with a statement of the amounts claimed by them, and the documentary evidence in support of their claims, if the delivery thereof has not yet been made to the proper authorities.

Those persons who had no certificates given them for supplies furnished the army during the war were required to make a statement of their claims, or they would be forfeited; and those claims thus stated were to be investigated according to judicial principles. Here is the law of September 6, 1871, which I will read for the information of the House, and the sentiments of which I commend to the American Congress:

The National Assembly has adopted and the President of the French Republic promulgates the following law:

Whereas in the late war the portion of the territory invaded by the enemy suffered numberless burdens and underwent numberless devastations; and

Whereas the sentiments of nationality which are in the hearts of all Frenchmen impose upon the state the obligation of indemnifying those who have suffered these exceptional losses in the common struggle;

The National Assembly, without intending any violation of the principles laid down in the law of July 10, 1791, and the decree of August 10, 1853, decrees:

ARTICLE 1. An indemnity shall be granted to all those upon whom during the invasion contributions have been levied or requisitions made, either in money or in goods, or who have paid fines or suffered material damages.

ART. 2. The amounts of these contributions, requisitions, fines, and damages shall be verified by the cantonal commissions now acting under the direction of the minister of the interior. A departmental commission shall revise the labor of the cantonal commissions, and shall finally fix the sum of the losses of which evidence may be furnished. This commission shall be composed of the prefect, president, of four councilors-general, designated by the councilors-general, and of four persons representing the minister of the interior and the minister of finance.

That shows clearly that at the close of that war the French Republic recognized the fact that these losses that had been sustained in certain districts had been endured for the benefit of the common cause, and that they appealed to the sentiment of nationality in the hearts and breasts of all Frenchmen to make some provision whereby those losses should be equitably borne by the whole people. No one asks the United States to go quite as far as did the French nation. It cannot be expected that the devastations of the enemy will be paid for, but it is expected and common honesty requires that private property voluntarily taken for public use by our own Government shall be paid for. So also in both England and Germany the individual citizen having a claim against his government is permitted to go into court, and if it is just to have his claim established, to have it adjudicated at least.

The information obtained by Mr. Fish through the legation of the United States at Berlin, with respect to the law and practice of Germany, says:

In the procedure where claims against the Government come up before the administration or judicial tribunals for investigation, and in the procuring of evidence in such procedure, the same rules obtain, in general, as in the consideration, determination, and deciding of such claims when presented against other parties. In exceptional cases only are directions to be found prescribing a particular feature of the procedure in the case of a claim against the empire.

In the report obtained through General Schenck, our then minister to England, I find the following:

With respect to claims made against the Crown, the common law method of obtaining possession or restitution of real or personal estate has, for the most part, been by petition of right, a form of proceeding dating from the time of Edward the First; but in 1860 an act of Parliament was passed (23 and 24 Vic., C. 34) by which provision was made for assimilating as nearly as may be the proceedings on petitions of right to the course of practice and procedure in actions and suits between subject and subject, &c.

At the time of this report it did not seem to be settled whether a petition of right "would lie for breach of contract or to recover money claimed by way of debt or damages, or, indeed, for any other object than specific chattels or land."

That question, however, has been since settled by the case of Thomas vs. The Queen, in which it was decided that "a petition of right will be for a breach of contract resulting in unliquidated damages"—a case reported in tenth volume Queen's Bench Law Reports.

But how is it here in this great Republic of ours?

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question merely for information?

Mr. URNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask if in those countries there are any statutes of limitation?

Mr. URNER. I am not able to answer that question; I presume there are.

Mr. BLOUNT. I know it has been insisted upon by the Secretary of State in this country time and time again.

Mr. URNER. I say that while the governments of England, France, and Germany, and all other governments, so far as I have been able to ascertain—for as I said a moment ago the time I have had to examine this question has been so limited, and my other engagements have been so multitudinous, that I have not been able to make the investigation as thorough as I would like—while in Great Britain and Germany, with their monarchical governments, the citizen is permitted to sue the Government, in this great Republic of ours, this country whose Government we are pleased to denominate a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, the citizen seems to have no rights as a claimant his Government is bound to respect. When a private citizen has a claim which is not provided for by any law or tribunal now in existence, he is relegated to Congressional action, which, as we all know, amounts in the majority of instances to an absolute denial of justice. I say it is our duty to provide some means by which these claimants can have their cause tried. As I said before, I propose to speak more especially about the class of cases known here as war claims.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. If it will not disturb the gentleman for me to make a suggestion, I would like to do so; if it will, I will not do so.

Mr. URNER. What is it? Do not take much time, please.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I will speak very rapidly. The gentleman indicates that he would have our citizens go into the courts. Grant that. But after you send these different claimants into the court, as the law now stands no judicial determination can give them any relief. These claimants come here to Congress and ask that a law be passed for each particular case. To grant them relief we must make a law in each particular case, because it is an exceptional case; it does not come under any general law. Being out from the operation of any general law, they want us to legislate for their benefit and to make a new law in each particular case. Now, the courts can give no such relief as that, can they?

Mr. URNER. I will answer the gentlemen. Why, Mr. Speaker, that is just what I am speaking of. I know that they have no relief; a special act of Congress is required for each particular case. That is just what I am complaining of. I want a general law passed, giving to some tribunal the right to adjudicate these cases, to investigate the facts and report the cases back, as is done in France; so that Congress may make an appropriation of money with knowledge as to what it is appropriating for; and I understand that under the bill before us, if Congress finds that the court has made a mistake it will have the right to withhold the appropriation. [Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, rose.] I would like very much to yield to the gentleman, but I am pressed for time.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I would be glad to reply to the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. URNER. I have already given away part of my time.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Masschusetts. I will not interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. URNER. I hold that these claims, if they are honest and just, and if the claimants are loyal, have just as much right to be paid out of the Treasury as any other class of claims against the Government of the United States.

There are two classes of war claims. I will state them briefly. In the first place there are claims of citizens growing out of the taking, use, and occupation of property voluntarily as distinguished from those claims presented in some quarters growing out of the taking and use of property involuntarily or as a military necessity. Now, according to my understanding of the principles of international law applicable to these cases the former class of claims are just and right and should be paid; the latter class should not be paid. To illustrate, in the district I have the honor to represent both classes of claims exist. The Army was encamped there from the beginning of the war in some capacity or other. Where the Army encamped for the winter it required fuel to keep the men warm, lumber to provide them shelter, corn, oats, and hay for the horses; and when property of this sort was taken under those circumstances the Government is bound to pay for it. Unless it pays it virtually repudiates an honest debt.

But the Army passed through our State on its way to Gettysburgh, to Antietam, and to the battle of Monocacy, when as a matter of military necessity property was destroyed. Wheat was trampled down; timber had to be removed in order to make a place to plant artillery. These and whatever other incidental casualties occurred at the time were involuntary—were a matter of military necessity. The people who suffered losses under those circumstances have no claim against the Government; and so far as I know they have not presented claims.

I want to call attention to a statement of the law on this subject:

> By the principles of universal law, recognized anterior to the Constitution, in force when it was adopted, and never abrogated, every civilized nation is in duty bound to pay for army supplies taken from its loyal citizens, and for all property voluntarily taken for or devoted to "public use."
> There is no reason why one citizen should furnish quartermaster's or commissary supplies rather than another. The Government can, as to these, exercise a discretion; it can buy from any who may have to sell, or select those from whom it will impress. Here is a deliberate, voluntary taking for public use.
>
> The Government has always paid loyal citizens for the use and occupation of buildings and grounds in loyal States when used for officers' quarters, regular recruiting camps, and in cases where the occupation was voluntary and the result of choice, superinduced by no overruling military necessity; and for this the law provides.

While on the other hand—

> In battle or immediately after, and when it may be impossible to procure property in any regular mode by contract or impressment, self-preservation and humanity may require the temporary occupancy of houses for hospitals, for wounded soldiers, or for the shelter of troops, and for necessary military operations which admit of neither choice nor delay. In these and similar cases the question arises whether there is a deliberate voluntary taking of property for public use requiring compensation, or whether these acts arise from and are governed by the law of overruling military necessity.

Now, I make another subdivision based upon territory. There was a portion of the territory of the United States recognized as being in insurrection. The residue of the States were known as the loyal States. In all the States in insurrection the Government of the United States had the right for its own use to take whatever property was there, and in the taking did not make itself responsible for the payment of a dime; and this applied to all the people within that section of territory. I understand that to be the unmistakable principle of international law, and in support of this position I adduce the following:

> As to the eleven States proclaimed in rebellion during the period of flagrant war, it may be said in general terms that the United States, by the strict rules of international law, incurred no liability whatever for property taken, used, damaged, or destroyed therein by Government authority, so far as dictated by the necessary operations of the war, nor by the operations of the enemy. This is well settled by every writer on the laws of war.

Halleck says:

> War * * * makes legal enemies of all the individual members of the hostile states; * * * it also extends to property, and gives to one belligerent the right to deprive the other of everything which might add to his strength and enable him to carry on hostilities, &c.

If within the insurrectionary territory there were loyal citizens who by reason of exceptional circumstances are to be paid, the burden of proof should be upon them to clearly establish not only the taking of their property but everything necessary to show that they should be excepted from the general rule which would authorize the Government to take the property of all the citizens of all that territory without making any compensation. But in the loyal States, where the people at all times claimed to be citizens of the United States, where they recognized no allegiance to any power except their own Government—in those States under the well-known principle of the common law that a man is to be presumed to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty, every citizen is prima facie considered a loyal citizen; and when the Government takes the property of such a citizen and appropriates it to its own use under circumstances which would ordinarily make the Government responsible, if the Government withholds payment the burden of proof is upon the Government to show why it does not pay its honest debts and to prove that the citizen has forfeited his constitutional right to be compensated by disloyalty.

Now, I say, Mr. Speaker, that in violation of the principles of the Constitution and the laws we have already in existence, under the act of 1864, and the manner in which it has been executed, great injustice has been done to many people. The principles of constitutional law have not been complied with. Why, I read in the Constitution of my country this language:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

Now, when gentlemen say these people have no legal rights, I say they have legal rights. It is true they may be rights under the Constitution alone, now dormant because of no legal machinery to make them valuable; for you know, Mr. Speaker, the Constitution does not execute itself.

There may be a right recognized in the Constitution, but before that right can be valuable to a citizen the Congress of the United States, the legislative power of the Government, must pass laws and establish a tribunal in which that right, recognized by the Constitution, shall be made valuable.

Then, too, these claimants have rights recognized by the law of nations. It is a principle of international law that the Government is liable to its citizens for the property that is necessary when it is taken voluntarily, as in the case of quartermaster stores taken under the circumstances I have detailed.

Now, sir, when the Government of the United States does not pay, when it withholds payment, it fails to do what it is honestly, morally, and lawfully bound to do.

I stated that in my district parties are located whose property was taken and whose premises were occupied when our forces were encamped there under the circumstances I have narrated, private property voluntarily taken for the public service, and there are many just and meritorious claims which have not been paid and which ought to be paid. Under the act of 1864 the Quartermaster-General sent out special agents. The agent went around through the country where these claims arose—and while I have no reflection to make on any individual, I will say the agent went around, took the testimony ex parte, unsworn, not under oath, making his report based on the merest hearsay and ipse dixit he could get in the neighborhood in regard to a man's claim and in regard to a man's character, possibly from an enemy, who would take that opportunity thus secretly to stab his neighbor in the back, and yet on that testimony many thousands of claims were considered and disallowed. Not in my section particularly, because we have not that many there. I do not want to frighten gentlemen on the other side, who get scared at figures, by leaving the impression there are so many claims in the sixth district of Maryland. We have, however, many claims in that district, where our forces were encamped during the war.

I was assured by the late Quartermaster-General when I appeared before him in person and asked to have a claimant allowed to offer testimony to prove his case that as the special agent had made his report and on that the claim had been rejected, and, as he stated, there were about thirty thousand cases similarly disposed of, and if he opened this case in this instance, although it might be in the interest of justice to do so, yet to be consistent he would have to open every one of those thirty thousand rejected cases, and therefore could not comply with my request.

I say this provision of the Constitution has not been complied with. I say the Government of the United States owes this money and will never get rid of this honest debt until some provision is made whereby the party can go into some court and have his case investigated and adjudicated. What I read from the French act applies equally here. It is true that some of these gentlemen of the far North, and I am not speaking in any sectional sense, do not have this class of claims. They live in a country where they did not arise.

Those which arose in the State of Maryland in the sixth district, and I believe I represent all the portion of that State where the armies were encamped during the war, the claimants had to suffer for the good of the whole country. They did it voluntarily; they did it willingly and cheerfully, because they were a loyal people and they were willing to make the needed and necessary sacrifices for the benefit of their Government. But while they were doing it at that time they looked to the day when the Government of the United States, actuated and inspired by a spirit of equity and fair dealing, not to say common honesty, which ought to characterize a great and noble government, would grant them the relief they deserved.

I know the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] spoke about a Baltimore claim. I do not know anything about it. It is an old claim, and I have nothing to say about it. If it was fraudulent, of course it should not be paid. It only shows that even in Baltimore there are some dishonest people. It is an easy matter to characterize Baltimore as the hot-bed of secession, for there was a time in the beginning of the war when some people in Baltimore, in a frenzy and state of excitement, did a very ugly thing, and for which I know they now feel deep regret. I refer to the events of April 19, 1861.

But, sir, while there are bad men in all places, and while there are men that will be led away by excitement in all places, and while there were, perhaps, men in the city of Baltimore, as I doubt not there were, who were willing to see the State connect itself with the confederate cause, but, so far as the State of Maryland was concerned, a majority of its people were loyal; and that Monumental City of Baltimore boasts justly to-day of its monuments, its free libraries, its school system, without a parallel, and of its loyalty to the Government in time of war.

It points with pride to the fact that in Baltimore the Christian Sabbath is observed and respected to a degree not equaled in any other city of its size in this land. These are facts for which that city and that people may rightfully feel proud. I have no doubt they regret more than perhaps I can express for them the occurrence of the 19th day of April, 1861. But barring that act of rash madness, to-day they are proud of their achievements and look hopefully forward to a glorious future. My friend from New Hampshire sitting near me suggests that there were disloyal men in other States as well as in Maryland—in States north of Mason and Dixon's line. I am satisfied of that fact. There were men who were opposed to the prosecution of the war in the city and State of New York. There were men opposed to the prosecution of the war in Indiana. There were men opposed to its prosecution all over the North, but when a claim is presented from any State in the North why is it that the question of loyalty is never raised? But when a man from my State presents a claim he is required to come up and by overwhelming proof sustain the fact that he was unquestionably loyal to his Government during the war, or his case will be turned down simply because at the beginning of the war some of our people were opposed to its prosecution.

The burden of proof is thrown upon him. I think, Mr. Speaker, there should be some allowance made for the people of Maryland. You remember, and we all remember, before the war that Maryland was a slave State. You will remember the bitter strife and contention which prevailed in the country growing out of the question of slavery for years before the war began. At the time of the war there were in Maryland not less than 87,000 slaves, and while the people during all of that irrepressible conflict that preceded the war had their sympathies enlisted on the side of the South because Maryland was a slave State, yet when it came to the actual conflict, when the war had actually begun and the soldiers were marching to the front, the majority of the people of that State, notwithstanding the possession of this slave property, stood with patriotic devotion by the old flag. It is true a great many sympathized with the Southern people. They sympathized merely, but were not in great numbers in favor of secession. They were opposed to secession, but they did not want to have a war waged against the Southern people because of their sympathies, and they falsely hoped to see a peaceable solution of the troubles.

But the people of that State were not the only ones who were bound by the prejudices growing out of slavery. Even my distinguished, eloquent, and scholarly friend from Cincinnati, Ohio, remembers, doubtless, in 1836, when that man from the South——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. My recollection is not very distinct of that time.

Mr. URNER. The gentleman remembers it as a matter of history, doubtless, that in 1836 a man from the South, a former slaveholder who had emancipated his slaves, came to the city of Cincinnati and established there a paper known by the name of the Philanthropist. This paper simply opposed the extension of slavery; and because of this fact the people of that city assembled in public mass-meeting, with the mayor of the city presiding, and appointed a committee of thirteen men to wait upon the publisher of the paper and notify him that he must desist from its publication in opposition to the extension of slavery or take the consequences.

We believe in the freedom of the press in this country, but this committee, headed by Judge Burnet, then ex-Senator of the United States, and a committee composed of the most intelligent, the most influential and wealthy citizens of Cincinnati, told this man that if he did not stop the publication of his paper in the interest of freedom that he alone would be responsible for the consequences. He went on, however, with the publication and did take the consequences, because that night his office was visited by a mob, his type scattered in the street and his presses thrown into the river. They visited his home, intending to do violence to his person, but not finding him they wreaked their vengeance upon the unprotected and unoffending colored people, simply because the paper promulgated anti-slavery principles.

Now, we all know that Ohio is loyal, but yet so strong even in that free State was the sympathy with the slaveholding people of the South that the citizens of their leading city perpetrated this great wrong.

Outrages were committed, and if that could be done in a city and State where slavery never existed, it ought scarcely to be wondered that in Maryland there should be some sympathy shown with slavery and the South.

The great Republican party at that time did not want to interfere with slavery. When they abolished slavery in this District of Columbia, some twenty years ago, they incorporated in the law a provision for the compensation of the owners of the slaves thus liberated.

They recognized then the right of the owners. But I am not here to apologize for slavery. I only speak in behalf of the people of my State—who are not to be wondered at if some of them entertained strong views on that question at that time—and for the purpose of saying before judgment is to be rendered against them, the whole facts in the case should be considered, and you should put yourselves in their place. What did they do when the war went on? Over 55,000 sons of Maryland enlisted in the Army and went to fight the battles of the Union, and were as brave soldiers as ever fired a gun or flashed a sword; and you, Mr. Speaker, so respected, revered, and loved by so many of my constituents who had the honor to fight under your command, as members of the Sixth Maryland Regiment, will testify to the gallantry, courage, and earnest devotion of these men on many a battle-field. Did they shrink from their duty because they were citizens of Maryland? I leave the answer to history.

But Maryland not only did that, it not only filled its quota in the Army, and paid every obligation it incurred thereby, obligations which were assumed in the advancement of the cause of the Union, but, sir, at the close of the war, or rather before the close of the war, in the midst of the war, not waiting for any proclamation effecting it, not waiting for an act of Congress to accomplish it or any constitutional amendment to compel it, Maryland by a vote of its people went to the ballot-box and liberated over 87,000 thousand slaves and placed in her constitution a provision that no payment should ever be made for them. [Applause.]

Now, sir, when the people of my country and the people of my district come here with these claims that have been pending before the Department and before Congress for, lo, these many years, honest claims, claims held by the farmers of that county of Frederick that George Washington once said was the garden spot of America—I say is it unfair that we should ask at the hands of this Congress that some tribunal should be established, that some law should be adopted whereby these people may present their claims, and if they are honest, have them paid, and if they are dishonest, have them rejected and let the claimant pay his costs? I say, Mr. Speaker, if it is true that these claims are just and that they are legal according to the principles of international law, then there is an obligation upon the Government to pay them and we cannot get rid of them by any nervous sensitiveness on the subject of claims.

I want to say a word to my Republican colleagues on this floor. It is one of the cardinal principles of the Republican party that every citizen, whether he is in the State of Maine, or in the State of South Carolina, or in California—I do not care how his home may be hemmed in by State lines—his paramount allegiance is to the Government of the United States; that this is a nation, and that being a nation every citizen owes to his Government his loyalty, his fidelity, and his support in time of peril. Is not that to be reciprocal? Is the citizen, wherever he may be, to render his allegiance to the Government of the United States, and shall that Government be under no obligation to give him protection? Is the money in our Treasury to be expended solely and alone in the payment of interest upon bonds, in the payment of claims growing out of the Geneva award, and those other claims which are pending against the Government before the various Departments and before the various committees? Is the money in the Treasury to be expended alone in the payment of these large claimants, these rich claimants, while the poor honest farmer and the poor man who shod the horses of the Army, putting in honest work for the Government in that way, are turned away because some special agent sent to investigate did not happen perhaps to get acquainted with them, and they did not entertain him so sumptuously as some others. I believe that to be true. As I have said, I have nothing to say against these agents. I might characterize their conduct as I believe it in many instances deserves; but I will not do that.

I say if it is a principle of the Republican party that the citizen owes his allegiance to the General Government, then that citizen has a right to ask and expect that the General Government will give him protection and pay his claim, even though he be but a plain farmer or an humble mechanic.

Mr. Speaker, have I any time left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eight minutes.

Mr. URNER. I promised the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DWIGHT,] to yield him some time. I yield to him whatever time remains to me.

Mr. DWIGHT. It is but little I shall attempt to say in reference to this question in the brief time allotted to me. I must be permitted, however, to say that in my judgment there is no real difference of opinion between honest men in this country in reference to the payment of all claims that are just. I do not believe there is a man North, South, East, or West that is not ready to pay every honest claim against this Government that shall fairly be established as a just claim. The question is, How shall that be reached, and how shall we ascertain whether a claim be an honest one or whether it be one that should be rejected?

My friend from Tennessee on yesterday made an argument that I have no doubt he felt the force of. I do not know but his constituents have suffered in a way that gave him occasion to make that argument. My friend from Maryland [Mr. URNER] who has just taken his seat has seemed to make an argument indicating that there is a difference of opinion here as to the payment of honest claims. I repeat again that I do not believe that is a proposition that need be presented. I believe that every man in this country, every loyal, true man is willing to admit, and not only willing to admit, but is willing to help to secure to every honest claimant every dollar he may justly claim from this Government, and that he can prove to be a fair and honest claim.

The question comes in, How shall we best reach that end? For myself I believe that of all places where a claimant should not be brought, that place is before Congress. I believe it is the worst body that can possibly be indicated for the purpose of determining and properly adjudicating and settling claims against this Government. The case as presented here is an ex parte exhibition. The men who come here with claims are the most ingenious, the most able, the most energetic, if not the most artful of all men who do come here. They come here with all the evidence that can possibly be obtained to show the rightfulness of their claims. But what do we, as members of Congress, know about them? You might as well, Mr. Speaker, go to a grand jury and undertake to take the evidence that is there presented to procure an indictment and convict and bring to judgment and to execute judgment upon that evidence as to undertake to adjudicate a claim on the average testimony that is brought here.

I say, then, let us institute some court. I have not examined the details of this bill very much. But it seems to me that it is defective. It seems to me the gentleman from Wisconsin has rightly characterized some of the dangers that are to be apprehended if this bill should be adopted.

In brief, I would institute a court, and I would institute courts in the different districts of the country where claims shall be brought in the presence of witnesses who understand the facts on both sides of the question; where the living witnesses may confront the court, where they may confront the counsel on either side, where all the facts that are ascertainable shall be ascertained and presented. When such a court shall have decided the case, I would give the right of appeal. I would give to litigants against the Government all the rights which individuals now have with regard to each other. If upon appeal and full hearing the case shall be affirmed, then let Congress make the appropriation. If it is not appealed, then let the case be reported to Congress for the necessary appropriation. I believe that in that way the parties shall have justice and that no claimant will have any occasion to find fault with the Government.

In my judgment, however, there should be a limit to the time when claims may be brought against the Government. I do not know any good reason why the same rules which apply to individuals should not apply to the Government in reference to claims. So believing, in the Forty-fifth Congress I had the honor to introduce a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States for the purpose of limiting the time in which claims should be presented. That joint resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I tried again and again to get a report from that committee upon it, but was entirely unable to do so. With your consent, Mr. Speaker, I will read that joint resolution:

A joint resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of each House concurring therein, That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which, when ratified by three-fourths of such Legislatures, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of the said Constitution, namely:

"ARTICLE XVI.

"SECTION 1. No claim of any character against the United States shall ever be paid unless the same shall have been presented by the claimant to the proper officer, tribunal, or Department within ten years from the time when such claim shall have accrued; and all claims not so presented within said period shall be forever barred.

"SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

Now, I am unable to see why justice to claimants and justice to the Government is not alike involved in such an amendment as this. Certainly a claim that is not presented within reasonable time, by the common consent of the different States and by the consent of all men should be barred on account of limit of time. And for a very good reason. It may be assumed that while the parties are living, while the evidence concerning the facts in the case can be obtained, a claim should be presented and adjudicated. If that is not done, then it is fair to assume that there is something wrong about it. I know of no reason why that principle is not as applicable to the Government in regard to its citizens as between individuals.

Mr. Speaker, I see the hammer is about to fall. Has my time expired?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DWIGHT. I regret that I am not permitted to occupy a few minutes longer. The vast amount of claims that are now pending before this Congress is alarming, and something should be done to secure protection to the Government and secure justice to all its citizens.

Mr. BOWMAN. I now move the previous question; and I give notice that if it is ordered I shall ask unanimous consent that one hour be given to the consideration of amendments under the five-minute rule, there to be only one speech for and one against each amendment, and no pro forma amendment to be offered. Then the succeeding hour is to be taken to close the debate, and I will make such equitable division of that closing hour among gentlemen as will be proper and I think will satisfy them.

Mr. HOOKER. I hope the gentleman will not now call the previous question. This is a very important matter, and should be thoroughly considered and discussed. The bill of the gentleman is a very immature bill.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] has consented that I may offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] consents, the amendment may be considered as offered and pending as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BOWMAN. I consent to that.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the amendment to the amendment will be considered as pending.

Mr. DWIGHT. I would inquire of the Chair if time was not given by unanimous consent to gentlemen who occupied the floor this morning to an extent that would have otherwise allowed me the ten or fifteen minutes additional which I desire?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot tell about that. The question is upon the motion for the previous question.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 76, noes 13.

So (no further count being called for) the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts now asks unanimous consent that one hour be given for the consideration of amendments under the five-minute rule, no pro forma amendments to be offered, and there to be but one speech of five minutes for and one of five minutes against each amendment.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. DUNN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNN. Is an amendment now in order?

The SPEAKER. At this moment no further amendment is in order unless offered as an amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE.]

Mr. BOWMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill. I understand that there is now pending an amendment to that bill, and also an amendment to that amendment. Is that correct?

The SPEAKER. That is correct. And a substitute for the whole bill is also pending.

Mr. DUNN. I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill, not to any substitute.

The SPEAKER. That would not be in order at present. The first question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] The amendment to the amendment will now be read.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. Is the amendment now to be voted upon an amendment to what is known as the House bill, or an amendment to what is known as the Bowman bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again state that the gentleman from Indiana offered an amendment to the bill reported by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOWMAN.] To that amendment the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] offers an amendment. There is also pending a substitute for the original bill, being a bill reported from the Committee on Civil Service Reform by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE.] The Chair holds that under the practice of the House all amendments to the original bill must be first considered and disposed of before a vote can be taken on the substitute. Hence the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is first in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to modify my amendment.

Mr. BOWMAN. I believe the Holman amendment is to my bill and not to the House bill. Am I right?

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to modify my amendment by substituting what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. The jurisdiction of said court shall not extend to or include any claim against the United States growing out of the destruction or damage to property by the Army or Navy during the war for the suppression of the rebellion, or for the use and occupation of real estate by any part of the military or naval forces of the United States, in the operations of said forces during the said war at the seat of war; nor shall the said court have jurisdiction of any claim against the United States which is now barred by virtue of the provisions of any law of the United States.

SEC. —. In any case of a claim for supplies or stores taken by or furnished to any part of military or naval forces of the United States for their use during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, the petition shall aver that the person who furnished such supplies or stores, or from whom such supplies or stores were taken, did not give any aid or comfort to said rebellion, but was throughout that war loyal to the Government of the United States, and the fact of such loyalty shall be a jurisdictional fact, and unless the said court shall, on a preliminary inquiry, find that the person who furnished such supplies or stores, or from whom the same were taken as aforesaid, was loyal to the Government of the United States throughout said war, the court shall not have jurisdiction of such cases, and the same shall, without further proceedings, be dismissed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to substitute for his original amendment what the Clerk has read. The previous question having been ordered on the bill and amendments, the gentleman cannot without consent modify his amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Have I not the right to modify my original proposition?

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the gentleman will have to reach his object in some other way.

Mr. BRAGG. I wish to put a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order to move to recommit this bill with the substitute and all the pending amendments to a special committee, with leave to report a bill at any time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that motion would be in order, with the exception of that portion authorizing the committee to report at any time, which would include the right to have the report considered at any time. But although the motion would be in order, yet as the House has, by unanimous consent, agreed that one hour shall be occupied in the consideration of amendments, the Chair submits that the motion ought not now to be entertained. But before the final vote, substantially such a motion may be entertained.

Mr. BRAGG. It seems to me manifest that a bill made up in this way, by amendments offered in the House, must be incongruous. That is my reason for wishing to send the measure to a special committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the hour given, by unanimous consent, for amendments and debate under the five-minute rule ought not to be taken away except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BRAGG. I give notice of my intention to make the motion I have stated.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I move as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] the proviso which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no claimant shall be found disloyal who resided at the time the claim arose or accrued or property was taken or furnished in a State not in rebellion to the United States Government, nor shall his, hers, or their claim be rejected on that account, unless they have been guilty of an overt act of treason, which shall be proven by the testimony of two witnesses who are credible.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I think it high time now, when the war has been over nearly seventeen years, that we should come back to the rule of the Constitution in adjudicating at least upon the claims of citizens of those States which were not in rebellion. The State of Kentucky was a State which to say the least maintained its loyalty to the Government during the war. It furnished toward the suppression of the rebellion in proportion to its population nearly as many men as any other State in the Union, and according to its wealth furnished probably more money, more of the sinews of war, in aid of the cause of the Government than any other State. It is proper, it seems to me, that such a State should be fairly treated seventeen years after the close of the war in the adjudication of claims. I do not like to see applied in the adjudication of these claims a rule for which I do not find warrant in the Constitution.

The Constitution expressly provides that private property shall not be taken for public use unless just compensation be made. It further provides that the property of the citizen shall not be taken except by due process of law. As the Government intervened by force of arms in many instances in the State of Kentucky and seized the private property of citizens, applied that property to public purposes, and has granted no compensation in any way, and as no process of law was resorted to in the seizure of it, I think it now high time that when the Government provides for adjudicating claims of this sort it should at least apply the true theory and principle of the Constitution to their adjudication, so that citizens shall not be deprived of their property except by due process of law.

I might have extended the amendment further, and provided that no man should be deprived of his claim against the Government, which is his property, unless upon conviction of crime, for that is really the theory upon which the Constitution proceeds. But I have not gone so far. I have simply provided that if a man was disloyal to the Government—and by that I mean if he aided or abetted the rebellion—if he was guilty of any treasonable act which can be proved according to the requirement of the Constitution by two witnesses, then the Government should withhold from him the payment of his claim, although he has never been tried and convicted of his crime.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. That is not the effect of your amendment if the party lived in a State not in rebellion.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. If he lived in a State not in rebellion, certainly the principles of the Constitution ought to be applied to him, because he was under the ægis of its protection all the time.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Under the amendment it is no matter what proof there may be of treason, if the party happened to live in a State not in rebellion.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. If he lived in a State not in rebellion, then unless he can be proven guilty of some act of treason by two witnesses——

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Your amendment does not allow the second branch to operate as to citizens of States not in rebellion.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Yes, sir; it provides expressly that no man's claim shall be rejected unless he was guilty of an overt act of treason which can be established by the testimony of two witnesses.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. But your amendment provides that no citizen of a State which was not in rebellion shall have his claim barred, nor (this is the second provision) shall any one have his claim barred unless his treason is testified to by two credible witnesses.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. The gentleman misunderstands my amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman had better read it.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I have prepared it very carefully. It does not make the provisions which the gentleman understands; and I am sorry he misapprehends it, because he is a fair-minded man.

It provides expressly that nobody's claim where the party at the time the property was seized or taken by the Government was a resident of a loyal State shall be barred. Because, sir, under the law and under the decisions of the Supreme Court, they went into rebellion by States, and every man who lived in a Southern State, without regard to his personal status, became an alien enemy. So, too, where a man lived in a loyal State, without regard to his status, he was presumed to be loyal because of the fact that he lived in a loyal State—one that did not go into the rebellion. Therefore the party who lived in a loyal State, one that did not go into the rebellion, has a just claim where his property was taken, for he ought not to be deprived of that property unless he was guilty of an overt act of treason, as provided under the Constitution.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I had not paid any attention to this amendment until it was offered, but in all fairness, which the gentleman from Kentucky accords to me, I wish to discuss it, and with no sharpness of language at all.

The amendment is this: "Provided that no claimant shall be found disloyal who resided at the time the claim arose or accrued, or the property was taken or furnished, in a State not in rebellion to the United States Government"——

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. That is in a loyal State.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. "Nor shall his, her, or their claim be rejected on that account unless they have been guilty of an overt act of treason, which shall be proven by the testimony of two witnesses who are credible." My friend seems to want to have an amendment like this: no claimant shall be found disloyal who resided in a State not in rebellion, unless his treason is testified to by two credible witnesses. But that is not what he says by any means. His knife is sharpened on both edges.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I am willing to accept any amendment the gentleman from Massachusetts may draft covering the point I wish to reach.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Then I was right.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. No, I think not.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I think it says that.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. A word.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I want to prove I am right. There are two branches. No man shall be found disloyal who resided, for instance, in Kentucky, if you please. That is what you want to talk about.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. No matter what the proof is. That is one branch.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Oh, no.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. The other branch is, "nor unless you shall prove overt act of treason by two credible witnesses." If the gentleman does not mean that, let him have an amendment drafted so plainly we cannot make any discussion about it. That is all I want to say about it.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I will allow the gentleman from Massachusetts to frame the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I do not believe in any such an amendment. I want to say right here that if there was a man in Kentucky disloyal to the Government I would treat him just as if he was disloyal in Georgia.

Mr. HOUK. Meaner.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Would not my friend over there?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. What does my friend mean by disloyal?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Oh! [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Yes; what do you mean by it?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I will not be drawn into that discussion at this late day. I do no want to get into it. I will let it stay in the past; but if my friend has read the history of the country back to 1861 and does not know what disloyalty was, as understood by the American people, I commit him again to the reading of that history.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I commend you to the Constitution of your country, and let the gentleman from Massachusetts read that.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. We heard a good deal about the Constitution of the country.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. And you will hear more about it before you get through with some of the acts committed.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. We know what loyalty was, and what was disloyalty.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. All I want is that the Constitution shall apply to my State as it is applied to the other States of the Union; and that is, if a man has a claim there which arises out of the seizure of his property because he was there, and somebody says he sympathized with the rebellion, although he committed no overt act of treason, that that man shall not be plundered by the Government of his property.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Leaving sentiment out of view and discussing this as a business proposition, because that is what you and I both entered into, you then only want to provide that no person shall be found disloyal, no matter where he lived, except upon the testimony of two witnesses. That is all you ask.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I am willing to put it in that way if the law passes in that shape. But the gentleman knows that in the administration of the law they have drawn a distinction between citizens resident in States which went into rebellion and those resident in States which did not. Every citizen of every State which went into the rebellion ipso facto became an enemy of the country, whether he was disloyal or not, without regard to what part he took in the rebellion. The Supreme Court applied the doctrine——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ROBESON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question as to what he means by the expression "shall be found disloyal."

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. That the court shall not refuse them payment or report them disloyal——

Mr. ROBESON. You mean that, by law, we shall establish a rule of judgment for the court, and you appeal to the Constitution for that?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. No, sir; I mean the court shall follow the rule established here.

Mr. ROBESON. That is the same thing. You cannot do it. The Constitution would prohibit it.

Mr. TUCKER. Let the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 10, nays 65.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, which the clerk will report.

The amendment was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask now, Mr. Speaker, to withdraw that amendment with a view to offering another. I believe the bill is still open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the amendment, therefore, which has been read, and submit the following.

The SPEAKER. The amendment can only be withdrawn by unanimous consent, as the previous question has been ordered on the bill and pending amendments, of which this was one. Is there unanimous consent to the withdrawal of the amendment and the substitution of another?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I object.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I should like to be heard for a moment on the sufficiency of the objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. If this amendment is voted down, then I shall offer another if I am not allowed to withdraw the first one.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. As the House gave unanimous consent for an hour to be occupied in the offering of amendments and debate upon them, I think it will not be held that we are limited to offering the amendments already printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not hold that, but simply holds that as the pending amendments are operated upon by the previous question, which has been ordered, that they can only be withdrawn by unanimous consent. The Chair has not held, however, that other amendments may not be offered.

Mr. HASKELL. Can we not modify that amendment?

The SPEAKER. It may be modified under the rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it can be amended by a substitute, then I desire to offer a substitute.

Mr. CALKINS. If the amendment proposed by my colleague from Indiana is voted down will he not accomplish the same thing; and will he then offer the amendment he holds in his hand?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Have I a right to be heard upon that?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has unquestionably a right to debate pending amendments within the hour allowed by the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. But that amendment, if I am privileged to do so, I intend to withdraw.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. If the gentleman is allowed to withdraw his amendment I have no desire to be heard upon it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that objection has been made to withdrawing the amendment, and will submit the question to the House upon the amendment.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now offer this, to come in after the second section of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

Mr. HOUSE. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOUSE. I understand that the previous question has been demanded.

The SPEAKER. And ordered.

Mr. HOUSE. My substitute was offered as a substitute for the original bill, and for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana. That amendment has now been disposed of; does not my substitute therefore come next in order?

The SPEAKER. The substitute of the gentleman from Tennessee is not in order until the time shall have arrived when the amendments relating to the text of the original bill are disposed of. The rule allows the text of the bill to be perfected before the substitute is voted upon.

Mr. HOUSE. But I offered my substitute to the original bill and to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana. I do not know of any other amendments that are pending to the original bill. Now, I have a section that covers the ground which is sought to be covered by the gentleman from Indiana in this amendment, except that it does not go so far, and it seems to me if we are going to proceed in this matter intelligently we should first decide this question, whether the House prefers the substitute or the original bill. And when that question is settled we can amend the substitute or the original bill, whichever may be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair states that all the confusion grows out of the fact that after the previous question was ordered, by unanimous consent the bill was open to amendment and debate upon amendments for one hour. The Chair holds that amendments may be offered now to the original text of the bill of the committee reported by the gentleman from Massachusetts. When these amendments are disposed of, then the substitute will be in order.

Mr. HOUSE. We will get into confusion that way, I fear.

The SPEAKER. That is the fault of the order of the House. The Chair thinks, however, there will be no confusion.

Mr. CALKINS. Let the amendment of my colleague be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To come in at the end of the second section:

"SEC. —. The jurisdiction of said court shall not extend to or include any claim against the United States growing out of the destruction or damage to property by the Army or Navy during the war for the suppression of the rebellion, or for the use and occupation of real estate by any part of the military or naval forces of the United States in the operations of said forces during the said war at the seat of war; nor shall the said court have jurisdiction of any claim against the United States which is now barred by virtue of the provisions of any law of the United States.

"SEC. —. In any case of a claim for supplies or stores taken by or furnished to any part of military or naval forces of the United States for their use during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, the petition shall aver that the person who furnished such supplies or stores, or from whom such supplies or stores were taken, did not give any aid or comfort to said rebellion, but was throughout that war loyal to the Government of the United States, and the fact of such loyalty shall be a jurisdictional fact, and unless the said court shall, on a preliminary inquiry, find that the person who furnished such supplies or stores, or from whom the same were taken as aforesaid, was loyal to the Government of the United States throughout said war, the court shall not have jurisdiction of such cause, and the same shall, without further proceedings, be dismissed."

Mr. DUNN. I desire to offer what I send to the desk as an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 1, line —, strike out the words "Court of Claims" and insert instead the following: "the district court of the United States for the district in which such claims originated."

In section 3 strike out the words "Attorney-General" and insert instead "district attorneys," and strike out "Court of Claims" and insert instead "district courts of the United States."

In section 5 strike out "Court of Claims" and insert instead "district courts of the United States."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Arkansas desire to be heard in support of his amendment?

Mr. CALKINS. I want to ask the gentleman a question. Does he not think the amendment should have provided that no question of fact in those cases should be submitted to a jury?

Mr. DUNN. My amendment does not provide that. I understand the pending bill provides for the reference of these claims to the Court of Claims. I simply desire to change the reference so that they shall go to the district courts of the United States.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. The bill does not allow the Court of Claims to dispose of the cases.

Mr. DUNN. I only want to send the cases to the district courts instead of to the Court of Claims.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. The bill does not give to the Court of Claims jurisdiction to dispose of the claims. Does your amendment give the district courts that jurisdiction?

Mr. DUNN. No, sir.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Then it makes the United States courts throughout the country clerks to a committee of the House.

Mr. DUNN. It requires them to make the investigation in the part of the country where the claim originated.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not know whether this amendment as it is drawn has sufficient guards about it or whether it ought to be adopted, because one cannot tell in the hasty way in which business is transacted what may be the effect of amendments presented in this manner. But I desire to say I am heartily in sympathy with the principle embodied in the amendment presented by the gentleman from Arkansas, for the reason that, if these questions are to be investigated by a court at all, they ought to be investigated by a court that is nearest to the people who make the claims.

Mr. DUNN. That is what my amendment does exactly.

Mr. CALKINS. That is a proposition that I have decided opinions upon. Now, whether any of these claims ought to go to a court is one question. If they are to go to a court, it would be the part of economy and justice to let them go to a court which is nearest the people and the witnesses where the evidence is. But I am not in favor of any amendment that will allow a jury to investigate and pass upon any point that is involved in any of these claims.

Mr. DUNN. My amendment does not do that, I assure the gentleman; but I will speak in reply to him.

Mr. CALKINS. I am somewhat afraid of the amendment the gentleman has offered, and yet it announces a principle with which I am in hearty sympathy.

Mr. DUNN rose.

Mr. BOWMAN. Is not debate exhausted on the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas?

The SPEAKER. It will be in one minute.

Mr. DUNN. Was the time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] taken out of my time?

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. DUNN. I understood the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] was recognized in opposition to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. He was recognized; the gentleman from Arkansas yielding to him.

Mr. DUNN. I did not intend to do that. I ask unanimous consent to have five minutes to state my position.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to extending the time? The gentleman from Arkansas asks five minutes for the purpose of speaking to his amendment. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BOWMAN. I object, if it is to come out of the hour, as there are several other amendments to be presented.

Mr. DUNN. This is an extension of the hour.

Mr. BOWMAN. In that case I do not object.

Mr. DUNN. I desire to say that when the bill is read as proposed to be amended it will be found simply to substitute district courts of the United States for the Court of Claims, leaving the matter to be disposed of just exactly as it would be disposed of in the Court of Claims. I require in the amendment that these claims be sent to the district court of the locality where the claim originated. It is in the interest of justice and economy. The Government can get the evidence more certainly and cheaper in the vicinity where the claims originated, and it will be more satisfactory and reliable; it is safer for the Government and fairer and more just to the claimant. Then, sir, I have a very decided objection to conferring this great jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims here. We had the other day a case brought to our attention that ought to stand as a warning to us. It was the case referred to by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. REED,] in which a claim of $130,000 had gone by default in the Court of Claims, and subsequent developments showed the fact to be that the counsel for the Government and for the claimant had colluded together and had suffered the judgment to go for want of evidence that was accessible.

Let me say, also, there is an all-pervading dominant sentiment in this District in favor of plundering the Treasury; and I desire to take these claims out of the reach of that kind of influence and that feeling. We have recently seen a verdict here that shocked our sense of justice, based upon the idea that the Government would have to pay it in the end. It is undeniable that public opinion here is in favor of reaching the Treasury by any and all avenues. The management of claims is here one of the applied sciences, and the science all runs against the Government. Let their investigation be removed to the vicinity of their origin, where all the evidence pro and con is accessible and easy to be had.

Protect the Government against ex parte and false testimony and the claimants against extortion and black-mail. We now have a committee investigating charges of that character against officials and clerks in a Department of the Government. The spirit of our institutions demand that the citizen charged with crime shall be tried by a jury of the vicinage, and it is but justice that he should also have his grievances investigated by the court in the jurisdiction of which he resides.

The inducements to crime against both the Government and the claimant will be much lessened by such distribution of the adjudication.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Among those avenues does the gentleman include Pennsylvania avenue?

Mr. BLAND. Does the gentleman from Wisconson think that in any United States court outside of this District Kilbourn could have got a judgment of $100,000; and does not that show that any trial of that kind here is a humbug?

Mr. DUNN. Speaking generally, I contend that these claims ought to be sent to the vicinities where they originated. They are the safest for the administration of justice. There are grand juries in each of those courts to indict perjurers who swear falsely.

The perjurers are in a degree safe from any such prosecution in this District. They may submit perjured testimony taken at distant places, to which your grand jury has no reasonable access at all. Send all claims where justice may be done and where perjury may be punished. It is above all important to take them out of Congress. I am sorry to have to confess that this House is not well fitted for the trial of the class of claims pending before it. According to the views of some gentlemen these claimants more deserve to be hung than to be paid. I think they should have a more impartial and unprejudiced judge to try their rights.

Mr. PEELLE. As I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. DUNN,] it proposes to transfer claims to the district courts of the United States in the various States. But the gentleman makes no provision for the payment of the costs of the marshals or of the clerks of the court.

Mr. DUNN. Does not the existing law do that?

Mr. PEELLE. There is no cost whatever in the Court of Claims. The gentleman by his amendment would be heaping burdens on the claimants rather than favoring them. For that reason, if for no other, I shall oppose his amendment.

Mr. DUNN. The claimant who does not want to pay his costs need not bring his suit.

Mr. PEELLE. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOWMAN.]

Mr. BOWMAN. This is no place to discuss an amendment or a system of this kind. This bill is for the reference of cases to the Court of Claims to find facts. On a little amendment here we cannot establish a system of trial of facts in the district courts of the United States, nor enumerate rules of practice or proceedings. We can only meet this case as it is represented here, as a bill to enable the Court of Claims to find the facts.

Now, as to this district system, this system of allowing local influences to be exercised in prejudicing the decision of a case and such questions as might arise I propose to say nothing. We cannot discuss that great system here. We must vote on this bill and on the system proposed here by the committee, and vote it up or down.

Mr. MILLS. I think we ought to have some tribunal where a claimant, a citizen of the United States, with a claim against his Government, can have his claim ascertained and determined. I have been all the time in favor of the enactment of some legislation of that kind. But I am apprehensive that the bill which is now before the House is too much of a good thing, and I am compelled to vote against it.

If it attempts to confer on the Court of Claims jurisdiction to reopen all the equities that have arisen in consequence of a war, it will be impossible for the court to render complete justice to the claims of parties who have suffered by that war. It seems to me that the wiser and better policy to pursue is to wave the mantle of oblivion over all these claims.

All have suffered by that war. Not only the men whose cotton may have been seized, or whose house may have been burned, or whose beeves may have been taken to feed the Army, but all have suffered by the war. It will be impossible for this Congress, however anxious it may be to do so, to limit justice, to discriminate, to open the doors of the courts and let some parties come in and obtain judgments which all the balance of the people of the United States will have to pay, while at the same time all the people were equal sufferers.

I think that these claims are mere vague and indeterminate equities that ought to be presented only to Congress; and then, when there are exceptionally hard cases, the equity and conscience of the legislative assembly of the Government should be appealed to.

I think that claims for services rendered to the Government, such claims as arose anterior to 1861 and have arisen since 1865, should be referred to a judicial tribunal to ascertain and determine the facts, and if found to be just they should be paid. But when we attempt to reopen this whole war investigation and all the questions about loyalty and that sort of thing, we will be opening the door to hundreds of millions of dollars in amount of claims, to be determined in favor of the few but paid by the many, when the many have suffered as much as the few.

The SPEAKER. The time for debate upon the pending amendment has expired.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask permission of the House to speak for five minutes on the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. DUNN.]

The SPEAKER. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. BOWMAN. I dislike very much to object, but the hour is running, and all these other amendments must be considered.

Mr. HOOKER. I gave notice that I would offer an amendment similar to the one which has been offered by the gentleman from Arkansas, and I ask leave to be heard for five minutes upon it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HOOKER. I suppose the object of the bill introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOWMAN,] and of the committee which authorized him to report it, was to relieve Congress from the burdens which we have all felt to be very great, and of a duty which it is almost impossible for us to discharge; that is the consideration of the innumerable number of private claims which have been presented to this and other Congresses. The object of the bill is to refer those claims to some judicial tribunal to determine whether the Government owes anything to the persons presenting the claims.

I remember that many years ago, before the Court of Claims was established with its limited jurisdiction, I heard that great and eminent jurist of Massachusetts, Judge Story, say that in every other country in the world, even with the most despotic and autocratic of all governments, a citizen of the country had a right to institute in the tribunals of the land a suit against his government to ascertain whether it owed him anything or not, and it was a reproach and a disgrace to this country, which claimed to be the freest of all, that its citizens had no tribunal in which to establish their claims, except by petition to the Congress of the United States.

Now, I suppose that this is the scope and object of the bill, and it is a good one, and I favor it for that reason. But, as I said frankly to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] a few moments ago, I consider his bill in many respects as very imperfect. I think the proposition offered by my friend from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] is the correct and true one; to clothe the district and circuit courts of the United States with power to pass upon these questions. Whenever you submit these claims to a tribunal sitting in the immediate viscinage where the losses occurred or where the contracts were made, you will have no fabulous claims presented against the Government of the United States. You will have none presented to this court except such as can be maintained by evidence. If supported by the evidence of people of the neighborhood cognizant of the losses on which the claims are founded the claims will certainly be entitled to fair consideration.

What have you had before the Court of Claims? What have you had before the Departments? The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] talked about claims presented from the South against what is known as the abandoned-property fund—a fund originally some $24,000,000, of which some $12,000,000 or $14,000,000 now remain—a fund properly belonging to the men whose property the Government took and sent to the great firm of Drexel & Co., in New York, to be sold, the proceeds being paid into the Treasury. I am now speaking of what went into the Treasury; a great deal escaped by the wayside and never got into the Treasury. The Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly decided, so far as that special fund is concerned, that it is a fund in the Treasury which never can be commingled with the general moneys of the Government; a fund lying there to be claimed by the rightful owners, just as estates in England lie in the chancery court for centuries subject to the claims of parties entitled to them. Will it be said that we should establish a tribunal here and deny to these men whose property is thus in the Treasury the right to make claim to it? Here were $24,000,000 taken from the people of the Southern States and put into the Treasury. Would you exclude any person from claiming his share of that money?

In addition to that, as a measure of punishment, an unwise and unjust measure of punishment, which your Supreme Court finally determined to be unconstitutional, you raised from the Southern cotton-producing people of this country $68,000,000 which went into the Treasury. It seems to me it would be an admirable act of justice at the present time to return that amount to the overflowed districts of the Mississippi by expenditures for improving the navigation of that great river.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. DUNN, it was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the amendment as perhaps it was intended, and as possibly some member of the House may understand it. I have no objection to that part of the amendment which requires, as a prerequisite for the prosecution of a claim in the Court of Claims, the most thorough proof of the loyalty of the claimant. I would consent to the amendment which the gentleman withdrew, and recommend its adoption. But there is one clause in this amendment which will prevent Congress obtaining the relief that is sought in this bill. I refer to the clause in which the gentleman provides that no claim which is barred by any law shall come before the Court of Claims. Now, if claimants have a legal case, a legal claim, they do not come into Congress; they go into the Court of Claims; so that if the gentleman, by this simple-appearing amendment, means to provide that claimants shall not have the advantage of the law, and Congress shall not have the relief sought, where the claim is not a legal claim, he defeats the whole object of the bill.

I appeal to members of the House to meet this question fairly and squarely; to vote the bill up or vote it down, but not to allow it to be defeated by any insidious amendment, which appears to be innocent on its face, but in reality destroys the force of the whole measure.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. RAY.]

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a suggestion. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] besides being objectionable in the particulars pointed out by my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOWMAN,] seems to provide for or imply that there shall be two trials of every claim presented in the Court of Claims. That is, the court shall first take testimony and then hear and determine the question of the claimant's loyalty. Secondly, after that question is decided in the claimant's favor, the court shall then proceed to take evidence and try the case on its merits. In my judgment, neither the claimant, the Government, nor the court should be required to go through with more than one hearing in the same cause. It ought to be clearly provided that one trial shall be sufficient to determine each case; that the court, after all the evidence is taken, shall examine first the question of loyalty; and if the loyalty of the claimant be not satisfactorily established the claim shall be dismissed; otherwise it shall be examined and considered upon its merits.

I am requested to state that if this amendment be voted down another of a similar character will be offered, omitting the objectionable features which have been pointed out in the amendment now before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, my amendment contains two propositions. The first is that the Court of Claims under this bill shall have no jurisdiction of any claim for damage to or destruction by the Army, or for the use and occupation of real estate by the Army during the late war at the seat of war, nor for any claim of property that is now barred by virtue of any law of the United States. The second is that the fact of the loyalty of the claimant shall be found by the court before it shall have jurisdiction of the claim. I understand the gentleman is opposed to that first proposition. If so, I wish to say that if the object of this bill is to open the public Treasury and allow war claims indiscriminately to come in, if that is the object of the bill, let gentlemen vote down that proposition and the Treasury will be thrown wide open. If the gentleman intends to throw down every safeguard and open a free highway to your Treasury, the bill will effectually accomplish the purpose.

If the object is to open up your Treasury to the vast body of war claims that have accumulated about this Capitol from all sections of this country, a more satisfactory measure could not have been devised. If that is not the purpose in view of the general provisions of this bill, the only possible safety against it that is left is the limitations I have proposed on the jurisdiction of the court; and I admonish gentlemen from past experience that if this bill with unrestricted jurisdiction shall pass, when these claims come back from the Court of Claims with the amounts ascertained they will come with the force of absolute and final judicial decisions and sooner or later will reach your Treasury.

Mr. CALKINS. Will my colleague permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. HOLMAN. I can only yield for a question; I have but a few moments.

Mr. CALKINS. I merely wish to suggest that the amendment would be perfect if he had provided that claims which accrued after April, 1865, the close of the war, should be considered.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does my friend desire to open up all of the limitations?

Mr. CALKINS. No; but to limit them to that extent and let the other claims go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. I only insist that the bar which has been from time to time provided against claims on the Treasury by virtue of the law shall be sustained, and that all claims coming under the provisions of this bill should be regarded as barred if now by any law barred.

Mr. TUCKER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. TUCKER. If the gentleman would bar by law all these claims, how could the claims have been asserted?

Mr. HOLMAN. How asserted?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes. As I understand the provision——

Mr. HOLMAN. Here is a bill expressly conferring jurisdiction without reservation or limitation.

Mr. TUCKER. But if the court has not jurisdiction at all, how could the claims of parties have been asserted?

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman means this bill strikes down the limitation——

Mr. TUCKER. I say so.

Mr. HOLMAN. The limitation on the existing claims, such as the 4th of July, 1864, claims, the claims that were cognizable before the Southern claims commission and formerly by the Court of Claims, all these limitations are proposed to be stricken down by this bill; and the gentleman from Massachusetts is anxious to strike down every limitation in order that all such claims may come in.

Mr. TUCKER. But what I want to ask the gentleman is with reference to the provisions of the bill he objects to, whether he wants to remove the bar of the statute of limitations. Now, he says he wants to retain that bar.

Mr. HOLMAN. I certainly do, and especially on the cotton claims and the others I have named.

Mr. TUCKER. Very well, then, how could parties have asserted their claims prior to the passage of the law?

Mr. HOLMAN. How? They have had tribunals open to them for the claims I have named.

Mr. TUCKER. What tribunal?

Mr. HOLMAN. The Southern claims commission, the accounting officers of the Treasury under the act of July 4, 1864, and Court of Claims as to cotton claims.

Mr. TUCKER. Oh, pshaw!

Mr. HOLMAN. The cotton claims had the Court of Claims opened; the claims before the accounting officers of the Treasury under the act of July 4, 1864, have their tribunal; the Southern war claims had their commission. This limitation I have proposed does not strike down a single claim except those which have had a hearing or were entitled to a hearing before some tribunal authorized to consider and pass upon them. Now, it is simply proposed that Congress shall leave the limitations heretofore created by law unimpaired, and not one of those limitations were created until the claimants affected had a tribunal opened through which, if their claims were valid, they could obtain relief. Is there anything unjust in these statutes of limitations that they should be now repealed?

For the purpose of having the question determined fairly I shall ask for a division of the amendment. I shall ask a vote upon the question of the limitations on the jurisdiction of the court in the first instance, and then upon the question of the preliminary hearing on the loyalty of the claimant. But I warn gentlemen, in the light of past experience, and judging from the bills that are still coming before the House almost daily based on judgments of the old Court of Claims when the facts alone were found and reported to Congress, that when the facts in these cases covered by this bill are found in the Court of Claims, if this bill without limitations shall become law, although they may have been cases investigated years ago in the tribunals I have named, you throw open the doors of your Treasury for their payment, and the now more than ample resources of your Treasury will melt away before the claims for uncounted millions which wait for their opportunity in this Capitol.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PEELLE. I desire to offer the amendment, which I send to the desk as a substitute for the one offered by my colleague.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the first section add:

"Provided, That it shall be the duty of said court to first ascertain as to the loyalty of such claimant under the law as now provided, and that in case such investigation should disclose the fact that such claimant was disloyal no further investigation shall be proceeded with."

Mr. PEELLE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think if that amendment were adopted in place of the one offered by my colleague it will remedy the defect, and perhaps the only defect in the bill now pending. The amendment of my colleague, if adopted, would have the effect to bar out every claim against the Government; and it is a well-known fact that these claimants can come to Congress and procure the enactment of laws, paying them the amount of their claims, regardless of any bars which may have been previously set up.

In other words, Congress can control that matter; and this bill simply makes it permissive for either branch of Congress or any committee to refer a claim to the Court of Claims for investigation as to the facts. I apprehend that if a claim should be presented to this House that would be manifestly unjust and wrong, or if the claimant were disloyal and known to be so by the House or the Committee, such a claim would not be referred to the Court of Claims at all.

Now, should this amendment be adopted, it will still leave it permissive for us to see what claims should be referred to the Court of Claims; and when referred to that court its first duty shall be to determine the loyalty of the claimant; and if it finds as the first fact that he is disloyal, it reports the fact to the House, and that is the end of the case.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PEELLE] and am in favor, with a modification, of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN;] and if the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PEELLE] shall be voted down, I shall move to amend the amendment of his colleague [Mr. HOLMAN] by striking out the first part of his amendment, which provides a bar. The bar I propose to strike out simply excludes from the court the very claims we are trying to refer to that court.

Mr. HOLMAN. If you open that bar the millions of war claims which have gathered around this Capitol will come down upon your Treasury.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I propose to give every just claim a day in court. I do not propose that any claim which is just and which is the claim of a loyal citizen shall be barred. Where the claimant has been knocking at the door of Congress and has a thoroughly just claim I propose to establish a tribunal which shall adjudicate that claim. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] would deprive those claims of a tribunal and prevent the court from hearing the very claims that we propose to refer to that tribunal.

My purpose therefore is if the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PEELLE] should be voted down, to move to strike out the following words in the amendment, proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN:]
